Sigurd's thoroughly heathenish belief that the presiding deity of the world can never do good except incidentally, and from the greater desire to inflict some evil necessarily involved in that good, and his conviction that he can hardly fail to enter himself, when he leaves this earth, into the very centre of the malignant influences he discerns above it, is expressed here with singular force, while the genuine horror with which he regards Thordisa as still more malignant, on account of the spell with which she appears to control his own malignity, is a stroke of true genius. We may add that the closing scene of this fine poem is full of beauty, dignity, and strength.

This is a volume which, alike in its serious and in its best comic verse, will add to Mr. Merivale's reputation,—though there are one or two of the smaller pieces which do not pretend to be more than trifles, and which seem to us hardly interesting enough for perpetuation.

MR. WALLACE'S EDITION OF THE PSYCHOLOGY OF ARISTOTLE.*

"In England, the contributions to Aristotelian literature have borne no sort of proportion to the extent to which minds have been educationally imbued with certain of Aristotle's works. The unproductiveness of Oxford in this respect is certainly a matter of reproach to that University." In the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, in the article "Aristotle," Sir Alexander Grant thus gave expression to a feeling which was certainly in the minds of all who had ever thought on the matter. For some, at least, of Aristotle's works had been taught and lectured on in Oxford for many generations, and yet, both for textual criticism and for philosophical commentary, students of Aristotle had to leave England, and go to Germany. It is not easy to account for this state of matters. Certainly, the classical tradition of Oxford is second to none, and could not have been unequal to the task of expounding Aristotle as a classic is usually expounded. But for a true exposition of the works of Aristotle, more is needed than a merely classical culture. Above all things, the expositor of Aristotle must be one accustomed to metaphysical thought, read in the history of philosophy, and able to walk freely on the elevated table-land of abstract speculation. While Oxford has been indeed great in Classics, it is simply matter of history to say that few are the names belonging to Oxford which find a place in the history of human thought, and not one, do we remember, whose writings mark an epoch in philosophy. It may be that the reason why Oxford has been so unproductive in Aristotelian literature, is precisely that reason which has made her classical tradition so great, and her philosophical one so meagre.

* Aristotle's Psychology, in Greek and English. With Introduction and Notes, by Edwin Wallace, M.A. Cambridge: University Press.

Of recent years, however, a change has come over the spirit of Oxford, and she has begun to take the place which rightfully belongs to her as a worker in philosophy, and a leader in pure thought. Those of her sons, such as the two Wallaces, Mr. Nettleship, and the late Professor Green, who have found a home and a sphere of work within her ancient halls, as well as those who, like Professor Edward Caird, of Glasgow, have gone elsewhere, have done much to redeem her failure in the past. Of present workers in philosophy, Oxford can claim not a few of the highest names. It is not a little curious to reflect, however, that this most hopeful state of matters has not arisen from the pure Oxford tradition, but from an influence which was not native to Oxford, but which, to her honour be it spoken, she gladly and warmly welcomed. How much of the new work done in philosophy by Oxford men is to be traced to that class of young students with whom Max Müller read Kant's great work, a good many years ago! Very quietly and incidentally, in his preface to the translation of the Critique, Max Müller mentions this fact, and gives the names of Appleton, Caird, Nettleship, and Wallace, as among those students who read with him Kant's Critique of Pure Reason. Little did Bunsen think, when he helped to bring Max Müller to England, that he was taking a step of first-rate importance for the revival of the study of philosophy in our land and language. But to the work done by Max Müller in enabling these young men to read Kant may be traced, among many other writings of importance, this edition of Aristotle's Psychology. For though the editor of this work is not the Wallace who read Kant with Max Müller, yet he is his younger brother, and has evidently studied philosophy in the same school. Here, then, we have the great Classical tradition of Oxford harmoniously united with that Philosophical movement in Germany which is always associated with the names of Kant and Hegel. And the result is manifest in this edition of Aristotle's Psychology, which of itself will largely help to take away the reproach attached to Oxford by Sir Alexander Grant.

While textual criticism has not been the main end which Mr. Wallace has had in view, yet no slight attention has been given to the text itself. With becoming modesty, Mr. Wallace says that the various readings are only a selection from the fuller list given in Trendelenburg and Torsström. He has maintained his independence, and the text he actually gives us has been chosen on good critical grounds. His Oxford training in exact scholarship has given him the requisite sureness of step and delicacy of critical perception. The notes are exactly what such notes ought to be,—helps to the student, not mere displays of learning. By far the more valuable parts of the notes are neither critical nor literary, but philosophical and expository of the thought, and of the connection of thought, in the treatise itself. In this relation the notes are invaluable. Of the translation, it may be said that an English reader may fairly master by means of it this great treatise of Aristotle. It may not come up to the ideal standard of what such a translation ought to be, but compared with what has been attained in similar efforts it stands in the front rank, and is of quite conspicuous excellence. The one criticism we would venture to make is this,—we observe a tendency on the part of Mr. Wallace to translate the technical terms of Aristotle by the technical terms of the Kantian philosophy. For example, the Greek term διαλεκτικός is rendered by the term transcendentalist. Now, the term transcendentalist suggests to the student of philosophy a whole world of ideas which are quite foreign to the philosophy of Aristotle, and are peculiar to the history of philosophy subsequent to Kant. If we could get rid of the Kantian connotation of this word, it might not be unsuitable; but as words are used at present, the word is an anachronism. Nor is this the only instance in which terms which imply the Kantian and Hegelian philosophy are used. This may be permitted when Mr. Wallace is setting forth, as he does in the introduction, his own conception of the problems of psychology, as these presented themselves to Aristotle; but in the translation itself, the use of words which imply thoughts which were never, and could never be, in the mind of Aristotle, ought to be avoided.

The Introduction is a piece of work thoroughly well done. Instead of entering into any detailed description of it, we quote the general estimate with which it concludes:—

"(1.) To begin with, Aristotle was the first who constituted psychology into a special science. He mapped out the phenomena of mind as the subject of a particular ιστορία, and gave a definite turn to the humanitarian studies of Socrates, by showing that the knowledge of man involved particularly a knowledge of the nature of man's ψυχή. But (2), while holding that psychology was to be studied as an independent science, Aristotle further saw that the study of soul could not be successfully conducted, so long as it was confined exclusively to the human manifestation of it. Man's ψυχή, in fact, Aristotle found was simply one phase of that general tendency which Nature at each stage of life displayed,—a tendency to concentrate the specific functional activity of that stage in some definite form. And the law of such stages of life was, he found, one of regular subordination, so that the faculties of thought implied the possession of sense, and these, again, the faculties of nutrition. Thus (3), he called attention to the semi-physiological and corporeal character of some mental phenomena; he was especially struck by the material, bodily side of the feelings; and he maintained that the body was not to be studied as an abstract entity, but with particular reference to the bodily organisation adapted to it. (4.) He recognised and yet partially solved this dualism in man's nature by his own definition of the ψυχή as the implicit realisation or truth of body. While unable fully to explain the union of the antithesis, he yet showed that soul and body were not so much two contradictory forces, as two complementary counterparts in human nature. But (5), he did not merely content himself with such an abstract explanation of man's ψυχή: he expanded and illustrated it by an enumeration of the different stages in the development of this soul from lower forms; and by his explanation of the relation of these faculties to one another, he advanced considerably beyond the stand-point of Plato. (6.) He sketched with considerable success the object, organs, operations, of the several senses. His analysis of sound and colour especially deserves notice for its anticipation of modern research. But (7), he also showed the need of rising above sense, in order to explain its intimations. His theory of a central or common-sense, though mistaken in ascribing to sense what sense as such is unable to bestow—the distinction, comparison, and interpretation of sensations—directs attention, nevertheless, to the presuppositions of every purely sensational system of cognition. And the unity of consciousness which he claims for the exercise of sense goes some way in explaining how the different faculties of soul become an indivisible personal self. Still more is this brought out (8), in his theory of a creative reason, as the presupposition of the exercise of ordinary thought. For, fragmentary though the theory is, it is, nevertheless, an emphatic assertion of the priority of thought to matter in the universe. How, Aristotle finds himself obliged to ask, does thought think things,—how does an immaterial force come to receive and know material phenomena? And his answer is, as we have seen, that thought knows and thinks things only in so far as things are thought, so far as they are the work of reason, so that our subjective thought is but finding itself in outward things. Lastly (9), Aristotle's theory of will forms a natural pendant to this same theory of reason. In place of the vague conception of θυμὸς in Plato, we find the will conceived not as a single faculty, but as the concurrence of reason and feeling; while, at the same time, Aristotle never loses sight of the fact that mere appetite, as such, does not lead to action, but requires to be constituted by thought as a rational desire, before it can issue in conduct."

The quotation is unusually long, but we feel bound to insert it as it stands, because it sums up in terse and vigorous form the results won by Mr. Wallace, and because it will reveal to readers of intelligence, who know the mode of speech of current systems of philosophy, the philosophical position of Mr. Wallace. In every sentence of the foregoing passage, the influence of Hegel is apparent, and the volume throughout bears traces of the moulding influence on the thought of Mr. Wallace of the English Hegelian school. So much is this the case that we are constantly haunted with the suspicion that he has read Hegel into Aristotle, and at least rounded out the rather fragmentary discussions of Aristotle into the fulness of Hegel. If, in this way, the real exposition of the thought of Aristotle seems sometimes to be overloaded with the thought of other thinkers, yet the reader has it in his power, in the volume itself, to get at the real meaning of Aristotle from the text, translation, and notes. And the Greek index is so complete, and the references so adequate, that any passage may be readily found. In fact, Mr. Wallace has made us independent of his own view of Aristotle's psychology, as he has set it forth in the introduction, by giving us ample material for the formation of our own unbiassed judgment. It would be unpardonable, however, to forget to call attention to several features of the introduction. We refer more especially to the lucid description of the relation which this psychological treatise of Aristotle bears to his other works, and to the section on the pre-Aristotelian psychology. Here, Mr. Wallace is at his best, and his exposition is calm, lucid, and objective.

ENGLISH SCENERY AND LOCAL HISTORY.*

THE title of this volume, and the title alone, reminds us of that delightful book, Field-Paths and Green Lanes, in which Mr. Jennings takes his readers through the lanes and woods of Surrey and over the Downs of Sussex. He need not fear that

* The Green Lanes of Hampshire, Surrey, and Sussex. By the Rev. G. N. Godwin, Chaplain of the Forces. London: Griffith and Farran.

Mr. Godwin is poaching on his territory. His pages, which have little to do either with Surrey or Sussex, treat, according to the introduction, "of a little corner of Hampshire," and are dedicated to the praise of the Anchor Hotel, at Liphook. This praise, sung, in the first place, by Mr. Godwin, is echoed apparently by members of his family; but the division of labour is not defined, neither is the quality of the writing equal. The style is, in many instances, slipshod, and the expressions are sometimes vulgar, witness chapter ii., written by a young lady, in which she writes of a "stiff glass of brandy hot, with or without," and adds, "you know we girls never talk slang, but we can't help picking up these horrid expressions from our brothers." Sitting upon the box-seat of the "Rocket," she passes judgment on the team in the language of the stable, considers that the near wheeler is "well put together in every way," and observes,—"It has been all collar-work for the last mile or two, and our team are evidently not sorry to have an opportunity of washing out their mouths at the 'Royal Huts.' Some of the gentlemen seem to find the same process very agreeable. I should have liked it very much, but then it would have looked so, you know!" Now and then we meet with interesting or amusing statements which we have not seen elsewhere; but the best portions of the volume, with the exception of the narrative in chapter xi., which is due to a former occupant of the Anchor, consist of passages from White's Selborne, and of copious extracts from several well-known journals. Mr. Godwin's book is a clumsy manufacture, and the best that can be said for it is that a visitor to the Anchor at Liphook—which, by the way, is unnecessarily puffed in an advertisement—will find ample information about an inn that has some associations, literary and historical. Samuel Pepys spent a night there once with his wife, en route for Portsmouth, having an old man for a guide in the coach with them, and reached the inn, "with great fear of being out of our way, it being ten at night." John Wilkes is also said to have slept there frequently, on his way to and from the Isle of Wight. There, too, several crowned heads, foreign, as well as English, have found a pleasant resting-place; and there, in 1815, the Allied Sovereigns were entertained at luncheon. The tourist who wishes to explore a lovely district might spend a week at the Anchor with advantage. He is in Gilbert White's country, and Selborne itself is readily accessible. Woolmer Forest is not what it was in Queen Anne's time, when it contained about 500 head of red deer, which the Queen saw "with great complacency," the whole herd having been driven by the keepers before her as she reposed on a bank; neither is it even what it was in White's time, for the waste of fern and heather of which he speaks has been cultivated and planted. No one, we may observe, ever succeeded more thoroughly in appropriating a special tract of country than White. His book, the simple record of his life's pursuit, has the quality about it which promises immortality. Its peculiar charm cannot be affected by the progress of knowledge, and it is no rash prophecy to say that the Natural History of Selborne will last as long as the place itself.

The house inhabited by Gilbert White has recently been "restored," but, prior to this restoration, it was the home of Professor Bell, a man of great scientific attainments, a born naturalist, and a profound admirer of White, whose book he republished in a beautiful edition shortly before his death. It seemed fitting that such a man should have spent the last twenty years of a long and active life in a spot so beautiful, and which possessed for him a thousand interesting associations. Selborne is the centre of a delightful district, and embraces, perhaps, the loveliest scenery of Hampshire, with the exception of the New Forest, which is still, to our thinking, despite the art practised to deform it, one of the most beautiful spots in the South of England. Hampshire has a great reputation. Does it not boast of Portsmouth, one of the most important towns in the kingdom; of Southampton, one of the most charming; of Winchester, which belongs to ancient as well as to modern history—it was once the first city in the island, and is still famous for its cathedral and its school—of Christchurch, which lives, and can afford to live, on the reputation of its priory church; and of Romsey, which flourishes on a similar reputation? A large portion of this large county is painfully devoid of natural attractions, but a similar complaint cannot be made with regard either to Sussex or Surrey. Tourists, indeed, who know only the long sea-coast of Sussex might come to such a conclusion. Barren and unpicturesque is the scenery round Brighton, and the coast-line to Worthing offers little to the eye in search of beauty. Littlehampton and Bognor attract visitors who are in search of that quiet which is another word for "dullness," but to our thinking, Hastings and Eastbourne share between them all the beauty that Nature has bestowed upon Sussex watering-places. Charles Lamb said there was no sense of home at Hastings; but Lamb during his stay there was probably troubled with ill conditions, or he may have fixed his tent in an unfortunate position. Hood, who went thither as an invalid, gave this famous old town a different character, and, we think, a more just one. As far as fashion is concerned, Hastings is obscured by St. Leonard's; but all that is picturesque and home-like is to be found in the east end of the old town, with its church of All Saints, its old London Road, its narrow and quaint High Street, and, above all, its cliff, which commands a view, beloved by many an artist, of the town nestled in the valley. And then, on a bright spring or autumnal morning, what walk can be more delightful than the familiar cliff walk to Ecclesbourne and to Fairlight? There is nothing like it at Eastbourne, the only possible rival of Hastings for beauty of position; for although Beachy Head and the Downs that lead to it have fine views, the character of the scenery is different and inferior. One advantage, however, and no slight one, those Downs possess,—they can be visited on horseback.

But no tourist will know Sussex who does not turn his back upon the coast, and explore the interior of the county. He can scarcely go wrong, whether he make his starting-point from Midhurst or from Arundel, from Lewes or from Balcombe. The pedestrian will find an infinite variety of excursions, especially on the hills; and Murray is right in saying that the South Downs, which extend for fifty-three miles, with an average height of about 500 feet, are quite as interesting as many parts of the Continent which enjoy a far higher reputation. It was these Downs that appeared so "tremendous" to Cowper, and were termed "Alpine mountains" by Horace Walpole. Southey's eldest daughter, on the contrary, when she left her Keswick home for Tarring, thought the height of the Downs insignificant. So much do we judge by comparison, in our estimate of scenery.

In the walk from Petersfield to Midhurst, which forms a pleasant chapter of Mr. Jennings's Rambles among the Hills, the writer lingers for a moment at Harting, which he describes as "beautifully situated under the Downs, with abundance of fine trees near it and about it, and a pretty church, with a deep, sloping roof." He adds that time out of mind Harting has been a favourite place of residence with gentle and simple, and well it may be; but he neither seems to be aware that the rector of the parish, the Rev. H. D. Gordon, has written an interesting history of the place, nor that it can boast some important literary associations.

The Caryll family possessed an estate at West Harting from the end of the sixteenth century to the accession of George III., and there must at one time have been a large and bibulous household to provide for, for we learn from an account-book quoted by Mr. Gordon that a thousand gallons of ale were consumed in one month. This was in "the good old times," when a dish of ale was drink for a king. Later on, the family had more refined tastes, and Lord Caryll, Secretary to Mary of Modena, produced a play of Richard III., which was acted by Betterton. His nephew, the Squire of Lady Holt, has gained a sort of immortality as the friend of Pope. He was the resident Squire at Harting for about forty-seven years, and connected with the place for fifty-four. It was Caryll who introduced Steele to Pope, and Steele who introduced Pope to Addison; and these introductions, which have no small significance in literature, are intimately associated, in Mr. Elwin's judgment, with the settlement of the West-Harting estates, a full account of which is given in Mr. Gordon's history of the village. Pope frequently paid a visit to Caryll's seat of Lady Holt, on one occasion with Gay, and it is supposed that much of the Iliad was translated there. "If Lady Holt's shades afford me protection," Pope writes, "it is there Homer's battles must be fought." Mr. Gordon considers that the surroundings inspired many of his poems; but scenery had never any perceptible influence on Pope's verse, and we look in vain for proofs of such inspiration.

What White did for Selborne, Mr. Gordon has done, in his measure, for Harting. We do not compare the two volumes, for White, in his peculiar line, has no equal, but the great interest of Mr. Gordon's narrative leads us to agree with the writer that the story of a country parish ought to be written separately. The wealth of information that may be gained in this way is astonishing:—"So great is the wealth of public historical documents in England, as compared with France (which, in this respect, lost irretrievably by the wanton destruction of her records in the Revolution), that search of the most ordinary diligence will be sure to recover some historical title-deeds for the dullest hill-side."

The desultory character of this article will be accounted for by the volume that suggested it. We have but touched lightly upon a subject that will admit of being treated again and again, and always from some fresh standing-point. Harting affords a striking illustration of the interest that may attach to a parish which, to judge from the fact that it is not mentioned in Murray, is regarded as insignificant. But Sussex, especially in the villages nestling under the cover of her Downs, abounds with historical and antiquarian lore, that will well repay the researches of a local chronicler; while the wealth of natural beauty is such, that the pedestrian who follows any of the routes pointed out by Mr. Jennings, or more formally by the handbooks of the county, may be sure of a delightful excursion. We may add, in conclusion, that in omitting, not for lack of matter, but of space, all mention of Surrey, we have done no injustice to Mr. Godwin's description of the county, since it is almost wholly borrowed from other writers.

SAMUEL PALMER.*

THE story of this artist's life and work, which has just been written by his son, and published by the Fine-Art Society, forms, in the simplicity of its record, as notable a contrast as could be desired to the noisy art charlatanism which is a marked feature of the present day. We seem transported into another age than that of the nineteenth century, when we read of the calm, unhurried life of "plain living and high thinking," which the subject of this biography led for more than seventy peaceful years. We can scarcely believe that within hearing of London's "want and woe," it was possible to live from youth to manhood, and manhood to age, a life which was one of idyllic simplicity, and yet neither ignorant nor unintellectual. Artists who have despised popular applause, and lived for themselves and their work, we have heard of ere now, though their names of late years have been few and far between; but an artist like the late Mr. Palmer, whose interest extended almost equally to all intellectual pursuits, and yet who was contented to spend his days in the narrow groove of suburban and rustic life, and to find his greatest pleasure in reading aloud some favourite author after the day's work was done, is rare indeed.

On reading this memoir, we are struck most vividly with the fact that this little-known, unpretentious artist, this dweller amongst rustics in a little-known country village, had undoubtedly discovered the secret which the wisest and the wealthiest seek in vain, and had learned how to live. Intense joy and continual interest in every variety of Nature, an unfailing power of work, perfect contentment with small means, a heart full of affection for his children and his friends, and a constant pleasure in their society, and above all, an ever-fresh delight in the works of his favourite authors, these made up the pleasures of his life. An artist, a musician, and a scholar, he was above all a man, taking a simple, healthy pleasure in all that occurred round him, and preserving to the end of a long life his interest in the art and works with which his life had begun. For him, there seem to have been none of the ordinary trials and deficiencies of the artistic nature, and it is as if, touched by his single-hearted devotion, the stern goddess of Art had laid aside her character of Nemesis, and become only a pleasant companion, and a devoted friend. The story of the life, in so far as its incidents are concerned, can be told in a sentence. A quiet boyhood was passed in studying to be a painter, a quiet manhood and old age spent in painting. The record is so perfectly uneventful, that the most important landmarks therein are the removal from one place of residence to another, and a two years' trip in Italy, taken after his marriage, in company with Mr. and Mrs. George Richmond.

Out of his seventy-seven years of life, Mr. Palmer spent twenty-six in the prime of his manhood in the suburban districts of London, but of these years his son tells us scarcely anything. They seem to have been devoted to painting, and training his eldest son, and they were closed by the one great sorrow of the painter's life, the death of that son from over-work. After this event, the painter never lived near or in London again, but settled down in a picturesque part of Surrey known as Mead Vale, in a house which stands upon a range of sandhills near Reigate, and overlooks the Kentish and the Surrey Downs. Here, for the last twenty years of his life, the artist lived and worked, and it is chiefly of this period which his son speaks in the memoir before us. Here is his account of the manner in which the day was spent:—

"Though fond of reading and designing, sometimes rather far into the night, he was seldom late in rising, and at this time he competed with the writer who should be the 'lark,' or first to appear in the morning. After breakfast and prayers, he would spend, perhaps, half an hour in the garden, and then would return into his study, to work intensely until an early dinner; that over, he would usually take a short nap, reading till he fell asleep, and awaked, he would go to his work again till tea-time. Then the garden once more or a short walk, and finally the 'sacred hours' to be devoted (when there were no visitors) to literature, letter-writing, or designing."

To gain any idea of the peculiar charm of Samuel Palmer's work, it is necessary to bear in mind the object which the painter had in view, and it will be according as the spectator prizes or despises that aim that he will care for or disregard the work in question. For beyond nearly all painting with which we are acquainted, that of Samuel Palmer is the most fully penetrated and interfused with the spirit of its author; and for those who either do not understand or do not sympathise with that spirit, its attractiveness is very slight. The enormous technical skill which is manifested in various respects will not suffice to arrest the imagination of those whose artistic feeling revolts from the conventionalism of the composition, and the intentional surrender in many places of realistic truth. And it is also likely that many of those who are opposed to the prevailing realism in Art will find that here the ideal is too closely wedded to the natural, to satisfy their taste. Every one, it is true, can appreciate the vivid power with which Mr. Palmer's sun shines through interlacing boughs and leaves, and most can see the delicacy and depth of his chiaroscuro; but to those, and they are very many, who do not rejoice in colour and see it clearly, the rainbow hues of the painter's skies and landscapes are only a source of offence, and are dubbed unnatural or unpleasant, without more ado.

The main beauty of the work, however, is scarcely to be sought for in its technical excellence, great as in most respects that is, but in the spiritual power of the painter, which subdues into one complete expression of feeling the various scattered unities with which he deals. He uses colours and forms as a poet does words, to build up some poetic conception. His composition is not constructed upon a barren theory—geometrical or æsthetic—but with a view to enhance the meaning of the scene, or the words which his pictures have to illustrate. The late Mr. Rossetti wrote, some time back, on this subject:—

"Such a manifestation of spiritual force absolutely present—though not isolated, as in Blake—has certainly never been united with native landscape-power in the same degree as Palmer's works display; while, when his glorious colouring is abandoned for the practice of etching, the same exceptional unity of soul and sense appears again, with the same rare use of manipulative material. The possessors of his works have what must grow in influence, just as the possessors of Blake's creations are beginning to find; but with Palmer the process must be more positive and infinitely more rapid, since, while a specially select artist to the few, he has a realistic side, on which he touches the many, more than Blake can ever do."

It is this spiritual meaning that few people will be able to interpret in Palmer's pictures. What does the present generation of picture-buyers and picture-seers know or care about the song of Tityrus, or "Meliboeus's Restoration to his Patrimony"? What, indeed, does it care for the inner flavour of the Miltonic poems of "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso"?

Now, these pictures of Palmer's are (without seeking for alliteration) pure, peaceful, and pleasant. They smack of by-gone times, of uncomplicated lives. There is a fading-classic flavour about them, as of a rustic Claude, but no trace of the weariness, worry, or nineteenth-century hopelessness of Turner. They are not of life, they are beside it. They partly accept and partly disdain the world of reality; they live in it at second-hand, as it were, seeing it through the medium of a poet's fancies. Their strength is that throughout their dreaming there runs a solid streak of meaning. The artist was nourished on Milton, Shakespeare, and Nature, and in his pictures we have the three combined. More difficult and more dangerous, in these present critic-ridiculing days, is it to see or say how far these pictures are modified by or hint at the musical genius of their painter. That there is curious harmony about them, as of modulated sound, can scarcely be denied; and perhaps between the harmonies of colour which were Palmer's birth-right, and the harmonies of sound which seem to have been his second nature, there does exist some strange connection. In any case, the rhythm of Milton's poetry appears to be fitly reproduced, or to have a fitting analogue, in many of these pictures; there is in them all the dignity, the impressiveness, the concentration, and the splendour which we are accustomed to associate with the work of the author of "Paradise Lost." More than this, they have that strange "timelessness" of character which removes work from all chance of being outgrown,—by fading fashion or altered opinions. They depend in no way upon the tastes of a minute, but upon something which, to the artist at least, seemed eternally true and beautiful. There is in them no caprice, no self-assertion, no slovenliness. The work, whatever we may think of it, has been built up bit by bit, with love and patience, on the most solid foundation that its author could see:—"Whatsoever things were noble, whatsoever things were lovely, whatsoever things were of good report," he has endeavoured to introduce therein; and with all patience and all humility, for more than sixty years, this artist worked day by day, without striving for name or seeking for wealth, to give to his compositions one little added spark of beauty, one finer touch of meaning. And now,—

"After life's fitful fever, he sleeps well."

MR. R. W. DALE ON THE EPHESIANS.*

THE student who has carefully followed a good commentary on the Epistle to the Ephesians, Bishop Lightfoot's, for instance, or Bishop Ellicott's (Mr. Dale expresses his special obligations to the latter), cannot do better, if he desires to gain a harmonious view of the whole, than make himself acquainted with these admirable lectures. We often study details, especially when the details are so full both of difficulty and of interest as in the letters of St. Paul, till the general bearing and scope of the document are obscured. To this tendency, Mr. Dale's exposition, with its masterly and comprehensive grasp of the subject, supplies an excellent corrective. The terse and vigorous style, rising on occasion into a manly and impressive eloquence, of which Mr. Dale is well known to be a master, gives lucid expression to thought that is precise, courageous, and original.

We naturally turn to what the lecturer has to say on some burning questions of modern theology. The Epistle to the Ephesians contains the words on which, more than anything else, the Universalists found the Scriptural argument for their teaching. God is "to sum up all things in Christ." Mr. Dale is distinctly opposed to Universalism. He enunciates, among the articles of the "unity of doctrine," which he perceives among the past and present divisions of Christendom, the dogma "that the doom of the impenitent is irrevocable." He believes this dogma to have been unmistakably set forth in the teaching of Christ and his Apostles, and to have formed part of the groundwork of belief which St. Paul took for granted in those whom he addressed. "It would be understood," says Mr. Dale, "that while those who had incurred irrevocable exclusion from the life of God were to receive the just punishment of their sin, and to perish, the rest of the moral universe was to be organised into a perfect unity for eternal ages of righteousness and glory." It is not made quite clear to us what is meant by this "moral universe." Mr. Dale's language in describing the "restoration of all things" becomes, for once, somewhat vague and unsatisfying. It certainly does not touch the central difficulty of the subject. St. Paul and his converts believed in a speedy triumph of their Lord over all opposing powers. We are confronted with the fact, that after nearly two thousand years the triumph is still immeasurably distant, that "exclusion from God" appears to be the doom of the vast majority of men, even on the largest supposable conditions of union with him, much more on any conditions that would approve themselves to Mr. Dale's fellow-religionists. The "moral universe" may, of course, include many other orders of beings besides man; but if we think of man only, of man as he is and has been since the foundation of Christendom, the "all things" that are to be "summed up in Christ" are reduced to a very small fragment of creation,—unless, indeed, we can believe, as Mr. Dale, it seems, cannot, that there are states of probation beyond that which appears to leave so many reprobate here.

When Mr. Dale comes to speak of one of the causes of this deplorable fact, the "taint of blood" which seems to shut out so many from all hope of better things, he does not get beyond the conventional language of the preacher. Surely, it is little better than idle to say to the man who complains that, under the pressure of inherited tendencies to evil, he "cannot do the things that he would," "Place yourself in God's hands." If these words have any meaning at all, they signify a resistance to evil inclinations, a breaking through of evil habits, that constitute the very difficulty against which the man struggles in vain. How is a man whose moral fibre is so weak that he cannot keep himself free for a day from drunkenness or lust, to rise to the supreme effort of resigning himself to God?

In an interesting passage in Lecture xv., Mr. Dale refers to the subject of the ultimate sanction of morals. He would establish, it would seem, two methods of appealing to the conscience. Where this is not already hardened, it should be taught "to love righteousness for its own sake," without an appeal to the divine authority. If St. Paul, in writing to the Ephesians, does appeal to this authority, it is because they lacked "the true moral discernment and the delicate moral sensitiveness" to which only the other method is appropriate. But is this distinction really founded on fact? If God revealed in Christ is all that the lecturer in such eloquent language proclaims Him to be, must He not be the foundation of all morality? And if conscience is His voice, can it be right to appeal to it without a reference to Him?

It is natural, in reviewing such a book as this, to deal chiefly with points where we find ourselves to differ from the writer. But we are glad to express our hearty sympathy with Mr. Dale's general teaching. We would refer our readers especially to what he says on the relations between Judaism and Christianity, and on the attitude of mind with which we should regard the Old-Testament Scriptures (pp. 211-219), and to his admirable observations on Christian unity (pp. 289-293). The central idea of this unity has never been better expressed than in the following words:—

"The unity of the Church has been manifested in a new and original type of the religious life, which, notwithstanding local, temporary, and accidental variations, has been the same in all Christian countries, from the earliest Christian centuries down to our own time. The prayers of the Church, its hymns, its devotional manuals, the sorrows and joys of saints, are all penetrated by the same spirit, and bear witness to a unity which is unbroken by differences of race, of language, of civilisation, by differences of theological creed, and differences of ecclesiastical connection."

But we are inclined to accord the first place among these lectures to the tenth, bearing the title of "Salvation by Grace." It is from beginning to end a noble exposition of a truly evangelical theology, and we may appropriately conclude this notice with a quotation from it:—

"The original idea of the Divine grace, according to which we were to find all things in Christ, and Christ was to be the root of a perfection and glory surpassing all hope and all thought, was tragically asserted in the death of Christ for human salvation. Our fortunes—shall I say it?—were identified with the fortunes of Christ; in the divine thought and purpose, we were inseparable from him. Had we been true and loyal to the Divine idea, the energy of Christ's righteousness would have drawn us upwards to height after height of goodness and joy, until we ascended from this earthly life to the larger powers, and loftier services, and richer delights of other and diviner worlds; and still, through one golden age of intellectual and ethical and spiritual growth after another, we should have continued to rise towards Christ's transcendent and infinite perfection. But we sinned; and as the union between Christ and us could not be broken without the final and irrevocable defeat of the Divine purpose, as separation from Christ meant for us eternal death, Christ was drawn down from the serene heavens to the shame and sorrow of the confused and troubled life of our race, to pain, to temptation, to anguish, to the cross, and to the grave, and so the mystery of his atonement for our sin was consummated. In his sufferings and death, through the infinite grace of God, we find forgiveness, as in the power of his righteousness and as in his great glory we find the possibilities of all perfection."

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.*

THE long-expected Tory magazine, the National Review, has appeared in very good time, excellently got up, and with a long list of capable contributors; but it will hardly, we fear, satisfy expectation. It has an odd air of a prefatory number. Mr. A. Austin disclaims the idea of a programme for it, but he writes one, promising that the magazine shall help in propagating "right reason;" and several of his contributors—in especial

* The Epistle to the Ephesians; its Doctrine and Ethics. By R. W. Dale, M.A., Birmingham. London: Hodder and Stoughton. 1882.

* The National Review. London: W. H. Allen and Co.

Lord Carnarvon, Mr. Courthope, and Mr. A. J. Balfour, and the unknown author of the first article—are anxious to point out the relation between Toryism and their special subject. The last-named, indeed, does write a programme, pledging the Review, under the form of advice, to note the encroachment of Radical ideas in the Liberal Cabinet, to bring into strong relief this dangerous tendency, and to fight for the great national interests, "Religion, Agriculture, Commerce, Art, Learning, and Refinement." That prefatory tone is all very natural in a first number, but it leaves a sense of expectancy, as if the guest were waiting till grace were done and the covers removed. For the rest, the magazine seems to us quite readable, but a little thin. The articles are all fairly good, and all marked by a distinct wish to avoid violence and partiality, but there is no one among them which will make any deep mark. The cleverest, perhaps, is "A Dialogue," with which the Review opens, in which a Tory, disguised as a Whig Peer, and a very inept Radical discourse on the prospects of the Liberal Party. They are very bad. The Liberals have succeeded recently by departing from all their principles, and adopting Lord Beaconsfield's Jingoism, and but that Mr. Gladstone stands between them and the nation, they would be found out. The party, in fact, lives by and in him alone:—

"Gladstone [says the Whig Peer] has a foot in every camp, even the camps he is supposed to have left. He is loved by Churchmen and worshipped by Dissenters; followed by Jingoists and supported by Quakers; obeyed by me, superstitiously deferred to by you. He holds with perfect consistency the most irreconcilable opinions, and advocates with conclusive logic the most contradictory policies. He can employ people to act for him without making them his agents. He can treat with people without entering into a treaty. He can conduct a campaign without going to war. He can silence his opponents in the name of liberty. He can imprison Irishmen, and call it a policy of conciliation; disarm them, and call it a message of peace. He can denounce a course which aimed at protecting the interests of England in the East, and then protect our interests in Egypt to the exclusion of those of France, with the utmost disinterestedness. If ever there was a heaven-born Minister, it is he. My dear Corkhouse, persuade him to wear a great-coat; for after him, the—Tories."

After him, there is no one. Lord Hartington is a "second Melbourne," in a time unsuited to Melbourne; Sir W. Harcourt impossible, because "in these days, in order to lead, you must mislead; and Harcourt misleads nobody," being a transparent farceur, fitter for the Woolsack than any one since Lord Westbury; Mr. Chamberlain is only "a dexterous person, who is not one to excite enthusiasm," and who would be a "worse than useless leader;" and Sir Charles Dilke is an "opportunist," who will in the end pass from one camp into the other, and be, as Lord Beaconsfield prophesied, the Premier of the Conservatives. All that is fair satire, now and then not without brilliancy, but it is only sheet-lightning. It kills nobody, any more than the "moral," which is substantially the necessity of raising Tories to power by distinguishing between Whigs and Radicals, will enlighten anybody. The definition of Conservative objects by Mr. A. Austin, however, will. Tories are to preserve the Monarchy, "as the most efficacious of all known guarantees against political instability,"—in which we, who are rather Radical than otherwise, agree—the House of Lords, which, the writer says, is not privileged, as if any privilege could be higher than the claim by right of birth to make laws; and the maintenance of existing English society, "in opposition to that mischievous and misleading mirage of so-called Equality." Mirages are not forces, and can oppose nothing, but never mind that; we welcome the statement that one great object of Toryism is to preserve the existing hierarchical order of society, as evidence of honesty in the new Review. That is one of the objects of Conservatism, but it is not often that its defenders say so thus frankly, and invite great masses of electors to vote for lords, titles, and the distinctions of society. Mr. Mallock will, we hope, be as frank, but as yet he has hardly got into his subject, which is to expose and oppose the ultimate object of Radicalism. At present, he is only distinguishing among Radicals, who form, it seems, three sets—the Radicals of the Cave, or philosophic Radicals, represented by the Pall Mall Gazette; the Radicals of the Temple, or religious Radicals, represented by the Spectator; and the Radicals of the Market Place, or secular Radicals, represented by Mr. Chamberlain. The first party are very few, the second much more numerous, but both are mere hangers-on of the third, which is accordingly to be smashed in the next number. There is a good deal of keenness in the distinction drawn, but Mr. Mallock will find that in practical politics the secular Radicals fall more under the influence of the religious Radicals than he suspects, and that the religious Radicals care more for the physical well-being of the masses than he is inclined to allow. All the elder Quakers were religious Radicals, and they cared intensely for the overthrow both of oppression and of restrictions on well-being. Mr. Mallock, we may note, as he touches the earth of politics thinks less of himself as of something apart, and, so to speak, deified, and so gives his shrewdness more than usual fair-play.

The literature in the National Review is neither better nor worse than in other magazines—the sketch of Bishop Berkeley strikes us as specially good—and the only other political paper is Lord Middleton's, on Ireland. It is most moderate in language, but its drift is that there should be no more remedial legislation in Ireland, but only firm government. He maintains that the Liberal Party has, in the main, governed the country since Catholic Emancipation, and has, with its panaceas, produced the anarchy recently visible. That anarchy, however, has been tempered by another result, which Lord Middleton describes thus:—

"Unfortunate as the course pursued has been, Ireland has, in spite of it, made material strides towards prosperity within the lifetime of the present generation. Wages have more than doubled. Artisans and labourers are better fed, better housed, and incomparably better clothed than their fathers were. There are whole districts in which the baker now plies a thriving trade, where, not more than twenty-five years ago, not one in ten of the population ever tasted wheaten bread. Beef and butter, the staple products of a large portion of the country, have risen in price from 50 to 130 per cent. The savings of the industrial classes are known to be thrice what they were in 1848, and are suspected to be very much more. And this, it is to be borne in mind, is the case with a population which has been largely reduced. The occupier of land has been placed by legislation not only on a more favourable footing than the English farmer, but in a better position than has been accorded to him in any civilised country."

Why has this beneficial change been produced in spite of the Liberals? Why not in consequence of them?

CURRENT LITERATURE.

NOVELS AND TALES.—Patty's Partner. By Jean Middlemass. (Tinsley Brothers.)—We do not object to an honest and above-board imitation of Dickens, such as we find in all the novels of Miss Middlemass, just as we used not to object to Mr. Sketchley's Mrs. Brown, although she had been first heard of as Mrs. Gamp. Miss Middlemass "studies" her great ladies, her Frenchmen, and her eccentric characters, after Dickens, and she does not do it badly. Patty's Partner is a readable story, with some clever "character" sketches, and a not unattractive picture of middle-class manufacturing life in England.—Odd or Even? By Mrs. Whitney. (Ward, Lock, and Co.)—The peculiar difficulty that besets us in the reading of a certain class of American novels makes itself severely felt in the case of Odd or Even? Everybody is so desperately self-conscious, the talk is so very "tall," the local colour is so unfamiliar, and the phraseology has such an uncomfortable effect—no doubt, because we are narrowed by our habits of "dialect"—that the effort to follow the fortunes of Israel Heybrook, the prince of ploughmen, and France Everidge (one longs for the s, but must not have it), the "drawing-room girl" (this is one of the elegancies of English undefiled), is like that which Martin Chuzzlewit made to follow Mrs. Hominy. The story is not very dull, and the people are not, on the whole, objectionable; but it is hard work to read it, because it is suffused with pretentiousness, and conveys the idea that the author's aim is to express what she means in the least ordinary, the farthest-fetched words she can find. Here is a specimen sentence:—"Do not think, girl-reader, that I am asserting or implying that in the world of wealth and elegance there are not women of lovely life, who wear these things as they wear their clothes, because they are there to put on, and it does not lie in their way to use home-spun; but close to and intermixed with the range of such lives, that simply grow where they were put, realising the greater demand laid upon them because their outward things are made easy and beautiful, there is a little under-world, that makes a seeking and a business of its uprising into the externalities in which alone it discerns the life above it, verily supposing it to stir and feel only in its cuticle as itself does; that strives for the putting on, not the putting forth, for the raiment, and not the righteousness that may be in the raiment; not knowing that to find the first shall be to have the clothing of it in 'the things' that the Father sees are needful for its most beautiful revelation."—Bevis: the Story of a Boy. By Richard Jefferies. (Sampson Low and Co.)—The only drawback to the pleasure with which readers who are not boys will follow the delightful adventures of

Bevis and Mark in a kingdom of imagination, where all the objects are real and all their uses fanciful, is the apprehension that readers who are boys may fail to appreciate to the full what Mr. Jefferies has done for them. In his finely minute, real, and yet poetical portraiture of nature, his close and friendly intimacy with the animal world, his easy knowledge, so enviable, so fascinating, of the face of the earth, and all that grows and lives upon it, Mr. Jefferies is "without a rival or an equal," the Kean of that stage of whose representations we are never weary. All his well-known qualities are combined in this book, and it exhibits some others which are new to us,—exuberant imagination, and a gravely humorous sympathy with the fancies and the ways, the good points and the defects, of the very best kind of boy. The Catamaran, the Council of War, and the Battle of Pharsalia ought to live long, among the healthy, happy, humorous conceits of an observant lover of nature, who has a great kindness for human nature also.—The Bankers of St. Hubert, and Other Tales. By Sylvanus Ward. (Remington and Co.)—The first and most important of these tales is merely a frame in which to place a picture of the oddities and defects of the local laws of St. Hubert, an island which we take to be Jersey. There is no striking originality about the frauds to which the bankers of St. Hubert resort to sustain their failing credit, but the story is tolerably interesting, and ingeniously contrived to exhibit an anomaly which ought to be abolished.—Cosmo Gordon. By Mrs. Leith Adams. (Chapman and Hall.)—A greater and more annoying fault than the absence of humour, is the assumption of it. Mrs. Leith Adams labours under the former disability, in common with the great majority of lady-novelists, and she is also a terrible example of the latter. Her most extravagant stories are stupendously dull as well, and Cosmo Gordon is no exception. It is a book to be forgotten, anywhere that one might leave off in the reading of it, although the hero, who goes about muttering "Ma reine, ma reine!" is "a rather blasé-looking man," but "a fearless and gallant soldier," a "rara avis in terris;" while the quality of the heroine may be estimated by the following description of her demeanour while a pair of ponies are running away, with herself and the rara avis in the carriage behind them:—"Was death coming, Margaret thought, in some swift, awful form? She felt no fear, no wonder, was conscious only of a feeling of quiet thankfulness in that this peril was shared together." So much for the author's notion of the sweetly natural. Her notion of the humorous is to call two little birds in a nest "twin ornithological specimens," and to describe a dog who has stolen a fowl ready for cooking as "a convulsed mass of white fur [...], holding madly on to a chicken's body." Of course, there comes a time when the lovers are happily reunited, and what can be more natural than that an Englishman, meeting the girl he loves, "after long grief and pain," should "gather her in his arms," and "murmur" to her, "Ma reine, nothing shall ever part us more!" and that she should reply, "Never, mon roi!" The latter, indeed, is a happy thought, for the heroine has not been in the habit of talking French to the circumambient air.—Fetters of Memory. By Alfred Leigh. (Remington and Co.)—This is a pretty story. The phrase looks common-place and meagre, but says exactly what we mean, and no other would say it. The author has no very remarkable power, but he possesses facility and good-taste. There is no bad grammar in the book, and most of the people are respectable; there is not much plot, but it is developed with care, and the pretty young lady whose various fortunes it brings at last to a prosperous condition is very superior to the ordinary novelist's young lady of the period.—Under the Downs. By Edward Gilliat, M.A. (Sampson Low and Co.)—This is a pleasant novel, not very skilfully put together, but readable and lively. There is no great originality about the device by which Mr. Norman Valence's bride is driven to run away and hide herself from him on their wedding-day, but the manner of the restoration of the young couple to faith in each other and their subsequent fresh start are decided novelties. We wish the author had not given his vulgar, rich, cruel baronet such a horrid name as Tripe, for, after all, the beautiful Ioné (why does Mr. Gilliat use the accent?) has to bear that name when she marries him, and her son inherits it. Sir James Tripe's fate is a satisfactory piece of poetical justice. Norman Valence is a prig, and not a blameless one, until he is converted; but his priggishness is used with effect to bring out the convictions of the author on various questions of the day, and yet not to the detriment of the story, as a story.—The Price She Paid. By Frank Lee Benedict. (White and Co.)—Mr. Benedict has not realised the promise of his remarkable novel, "St. Simon's Niece." He has written nothing since which we could heartily admire; and though his present novel is in every respect an improvement upon its predecessors, it falls short of what we expected from this writer, who made his mark by one book at a time when American novelists were almost unknown in England. The Price She Paid has the merit of being a story of life in America; we are not deeply impressed by the charm of "P. French," as the heroine thinks it witty to call herself, and there is too giggling and spasmodic a sprightliness about the perpetual talks, for our taste; but the story is cleverly contrived, and the moral atmosphere of the book is fresh, bright, and pleasant. We get glimpses of a kind of country life and of social relations very unlike anything within our own experience, and the closing chapters are admirably written. The artistic merit of the book has suffered by the obligatory quantity of "copy."—Daisies and Buttercups. By Mrs. J. H. Riddell. (Bentley and Son.)—Mrs. Riddell's very silly selection of a title for her novel, which is by no means silly, is to be regretted; it makes one open the book with distaste. The author of "George Geith" ought not to be tempted to walk in the foolish ways of the authors of "Comin' Through the Rye," and "All Among the Barley." This book is not one of Mrs. Riddell's best; it conveys somehow the impression that her personages are not clearly visible to her, and that she is but languidly interested in them. The first volume is the best, and the narrator of its story, Mr. Cheverley, the most lifelike and most distinctly characterised figure in it.—Leone. (Trübner and Co., London; Osgood and Co., Boston.)—This is a volume of the "Round-Robin Series," handy-sized books, bearing "a strange device"—the original Round Robin, we presume—with the legend, "Perhaps it may turn out a song, perhaps turn out a sermon," a vista of uncertainty that reminds us of Rath Pinch's beefsteak-pudding, which might, she feared, turn out to be not so much a pudding as "a soup, or a stew, or,—or something." The particular volume before us contains neither a song nor a sermon; it is a story of very hazardous adventure among artists and brigands in Italy. The celebrated bandit who devotes his leisure to the peaceful calling of a painter's model is an original and interesting personage, and the author has contrived a very pretty love imbroglio out of the situation. The style is occasionally crude, but the story is well conceived and the characters are well drawn.—Out of the Shadows. By Crona Temple. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.)—This is a nice little book, and we hope there are many good little girls who will read it with both pleasure and profit. It is not too pietistic, and its sentiments are all sound.—Born to Luck. (Remington and Co.)—Evelyn Joyce is the fortunate person who fits this title, and it must be said for the chronicler of her history that no labour has been spared to make her fit it well. The story is most improbable, but it lacks the charm that a lofty and rich imagination can confer on improbability. The persons who undergo the vicissitudes of fortune which the reader follows with but languid interest are, with one exception, poor creatures, mean of motive and in action; the exceptional person, Charity Joyce, is too close and unvarying an illustration of that Christian virtue whose name she bears. The treatment of the story is too thin to be artistic; nevertheless, there is a promise of better things in Born to Luck.—Hearts of Gold. By William Cyples. (Chatto and Windus.)—Unless Mr. Cyples is of the opinion once expressed by a talented Irishman that a man's language is his own, and grammar has no right to interfere with it, we hope he will consider the claims of orthography and syntax a little more liberally in his future literary productions. "Transmittible" does not meet the popular views of spelling, and the following sentence might serve as a specimen of the misuse of pronouns:—"Barbara was in Clara's confidence in this wooing matter, and it may possibly be that she was influenced by a dreamy intuition of something of the same kind awaiting herself, that she had, wonderful to record, made no mischief out of it." Presumably, "a dreamy intuition of something of the same kind awaiting herself," means that "Clara" thought it likely she should have a "wooing matter" of her own to confide to somebody, one day. We can only say that we have never seen that universal and laudable expectation of all the Claras of fact and fiction so clumsily expressed. We cannot say much more for the story of Hearts of Gold than the style says for itself.

Questions and Exercises for Classical Scholarships. (Thornton, Oxford.)—This is a useful compilation of fifty critical papers, including a supplement of questions on literature, and nearly a hundred pieces for unseen translation from Greek and Latin. The more difficult questions are indicated by a special way of numbering them, but the whole book is intended, as its title indicates, only for those who have made some progress in scholarship. It differs from Mr. Gantillon's "Classical Examination Papers," in that it merely tests knowledge already acquired, and is not furnished with notes or references. Those who work with success through the unseen passages will have little further to dread in that line.

James Burn, the Beggar Boy: an Autobiography. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—Mr. Burn began his life with some very curious experiences. His stepfather followed the occupation of a professional beggar. To this he added a private taste for drink and for theological argument, and he was a little hazy about the distinctions of property. No little trouble resulted, and the two "became acquainted in the space of two years with the inside of every gaol in the south of Scotland." Mr. Burn was afterwards employed as a cowherd and as a Cheap Jack's assistant. He enlisted in the Militia, manufactured hate, leased a tavern, kept a spirit cellar, returned to the hat business, made a third trial in the tavern line, became a dock labourer, then turned to the bookselling trade, and finally seems to have alternated between making hats and making books, achieving more success, we gather, in the latter occupation. All this helps to make up a sufficiently readable book, which would, however, have been far better if Mr. Burn had asked the help of some friend bold and candid enough to wield an unsparing pair of scissors.

Illustrious Shoemakers. By William Edward Winks. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Mr. Winks opens a rich vein of literary material. Much has been written about illustrious "soldiers and sailors"; why should not the "tinkers and tailors" have their turn? We may expect a long series of volumes devoted to the "trade" divisions of the human race. Nor shall we complain if they are as amusing as the one before us. Mr. Winks' list of shoemakers is certainly long and imposing. The "gentle craft," a name which has also been applied, probably in sarcasm, to the profession of the critic, has had some famous votaries. There have been shoemaker Admirals, as Sir Cloudesley Shovel, and Sir Christopher Mings, one of the heroes of the Anglo-Dutch war in the days of Charles II., shoemaker divines, and above all, shoemaker poets, Thomas Cooper and Whittier being the most conspicuous of living examples. Mr. Winks has dealt skilfully with his great mass of materials. He makes much of a really good subject, as, for instance, the life of Lackington, the bookseller, one of the most interesting autobiographies we have, and even in his briefer notices does not fall into the dreariness of a mere catalogue.

Leisure Readings. By Edward Clodd, Andrew Wilson, and others. (Wyman and Sons.)—This volume contains a number of interesting essays, originally published in the new journal, Knowledge, supplemented sometimes by the correspondence which their appearance called forth. Mr. Proctor explains what he said about the comet which was to put an end to the earth. As a pointed reference is made here to the Spectator, we may quote again Mr. Proctor's words:—"Without saying that I consider there is an absolute danger of a similar outburst in the case of our own Sun, when the comet of 1843 shall be absorbed by him (a result which will, in my opinion, most certainly take place), I will go so far as to express my belief that, if ever the day is to come when 'the heavens shall dissolve with fervent heat,' the cause of the catastrophe will be the downfall of some great comet on the Sun." This is not a prediction, but it is certainly a suggestion; and in its context it was something more. We never exaggerated in the least Mr. Proctor's statement. Among other papers is one by Mr. Clodd, on "The Antiquity of Man in Western Europe," a very amusing account, explained by illustrations, of common optical illusions, by Mr. Proctor; another essay, by the same writer, on "Betting and Mathematics;" and a skit which those who, like the present writer, have suffered many things from the solar-myth theory, will appreciate, "Nature Myths in Nursery Rhymes."

Dzierzon's Rational Bee-keeping. Translated from the German by H. Dieck and S. Stutterd. Edited by C. N. Abbott. (Houlston and Sons.)—Herr Dzierzon is a veteran authority on bee-keeping, a subject about which he began to write in various journals nearly forty ago. "The Father of the New Era of Bee-keeping," he has been called; and this volume, containing, as it does, the later results of his long experience, is worthy of his position. The natural history of the insect is given in outline, the practice is treated at length and in great detail. The value of the work, which is characteristically exhaustive and complete, is further increased by the notes of Mr. Abbott's. The circumstances of bee-keeping are not quite the same in Germany and in England, and consequently the author's statements and precepts require occasional modification or correction, before they can be practically useful to the English follower of the art.

The Life of John Duncan, Scotch Weaver and Botanist; with Sketches of his Friends and Notices of the Times. By William Jolly, F.R.S.E., F.G.S. (Kegan Paul and Co.)—As Mr. Jolly was the discoverer of the Scotch weaver-botanist, it is natural that he should not willingly let his hero die. Already he has told us all about the worthy old man, in Good Words and Nature, and his appeal to the benevolence of the public was so effectual, that the poor weaver was able to spend the few last months of his life in comfort, and with the consciousness that at last he had been appreciated. There was really little more to tell about him than had already been told, but Mr. Jolly has evidently been ambitious to rival Dr. Samuel Smiles. He has certainly all the enthusiasm and perseverance of the biographer of Thomas Edward and Robert Dick. He has evidently taken a vast deal of pains to ferret out all that could be learned, not only about Duncan, but about his friends and enemies, and the social and political conditions of the earlier years of the century which coincided with Duncan's youth and manhood. Mr. Jolly has thus been able to bring together a vast array of facts illustrating the characteristics of the village and country life of Scotland about fifty years ago, the strange mixture of Calvinism, Radicalism, and loose morality which characterised its weaver and agricultural population, and the quaint aspects of its boroughs and small towns. The career of Duncan himself is traced in the minutest detail, and a fine example it is of the successful pursuit of knowledge under what, to an onlooker, would seem the most disheartening conditions. Duncan himself never seemed to think his lot a hard one, so long as he had an opportunity of adding to his collection of plants. In the exercise of his weaving craft and in his frequent autumn excursions as a harvester, he traversed the greater part of Scotland, ever on the outlook for fresh specimens. By dogged perseverance he acquired a knowledge of systematic botany, beginning with Culpepper and ending with the elder Hooker. The Latin names of plants he could give off as glibly as a professor of botany, but with a pronunciation that would have horrified an Oxford Don. In other directions, too, he pushed his laudable inquisitiveness, and in his early years established an astronomical observatory for himself, in the accommodating upper branches of a tree. Yet he could not read till well advanced in years, and never fluently. In character he was upright and religious, but evidently deficient in sympathy, and with little of that sense of humour native to most Scotchmen, in spite of the famous and now rather stale taunt. Altogether, under the conditions, the man's life was an admirable one, and he deserved all the liberality which softened his last months. But his genius seems to us to have been mainly of the acquisitive kind; he had little of the force and originality of either Edward or Dick. Had he possessed the advantage of a liberal education, he would have been known as a man of unbounded knowledge; but we doubt if he could have initiated anything new. His story deserved to be told, certainly, but Mr. Jolly has made far too much of it. In the first place, had the book had adequate revision, and had all the redundancies been deleted, it would have been reduced to half its present size; then, had Mr. Jolly's moral common-places been eliminated, together with the small-beer chronicles which abound, a still further reduction would have been effected, which would have told in favour of the book as a piece of literary workmanship. For one of her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, Mr. Jolly's style and diction are at least remarkable, and the reader will often be reminded of Mrs. Malaprop. He evidently thinks that the piling-up of indiscriminate adjectives of all degrees of comparison produces a graphic effect; but inartistic confusion is the result. Altogether, the book may be described as "fine, confused reading," containing very much that is interesting, highly creditable to Mr. Jolly's industry and enthusiasm; and this makes us inclined to tolerate his malformed and extraordinary style.

Weird Stories. By Mrs. J. H. Riddell. (J. Hogg.)—Manufacturing ghost-stories—we suppose these are manufactured—is a profitable occupation. They are not thrilling, and to be thrilling is their raison d'être as stories, unless we suppose them to be veritable records, if not of facts, at least of impressions. Some of Mrs. Riddell's ghosts, too, seem unaccountably anxious to promote the happiness of pairs of lovers. "Old Mrs. Jones," however, is a good story of its kind, and might be true, if such things are true. And "Sandy the Tinker" is "weird" indeed. A Scotch minister dreams that he has been taken down to hell. The Evil One lets him depart, but only on the condition that he will return the next Wednesday, or send a substitute. Whom should he send? There is a certain Sandy in the parish, a drunken infidel. His doom, thinks the minister, is fixed, anyhow. Let him be the substitute. To his dismay, Sandy appears next Sunday at church, the first time that he had ever been known to attend any place of worship. The minister is tided over the fatal "Wednesday before midnight" by help of an opiate, but Sandy the tinker is found dead.

American Notes, 1881, by A. Sutter, C.E. (Blackwood), is a sufficiently entertaining little book for general readers, though specially interesting to members of the writer's own profession, who will better understand many of the terms and most of the illustrations in it. The "Advice as to Emigration," which forms the last chapter of the small volume, seems likely, from its sensible tone and gathering of really necessary information, to be very useful; and some remarks on the suitable diet for hot climates may be even more widely serviceable. He says, "During my visit, the heat was greater than anything ever known. I had excellent health, nevertheless, and have been asked to give my general diet. This may be stated in a few words,—fish and vegetables. I used lemons largely. They were very cheap, and refreshing beyond words. . . . Lemons, water, ice, and sugar certainly refresh the frame of man more than words can express."

Nadine. By Mrs. Campbell Praed. (Chapman and Hall.)—The career of Nadine is stated to be founded on fact; but even remembering this, and acknowledging that it is an unusual career, and full of a certain tragic interest, we cannot believe that such a story is a desirable one to tell, especially to young readers. The last lesson one would wish girls to learn would be that their emotions are not under their own control; and although novels are intended for recreation, and one that is in two thin volumes has a very innocent appearance, yet the kind of life depicted here is one to sigh over, rather than to be amused with. The heroine seems never to have enjoyed, even in her youth, a period of light-hearted innocence.

The Soil of the Farm. By John Scott and J. C. Morton. (Bradbury, Agnew, and Co.)—This small volume belongs to the "Handbook of the Farm Series," and is the fourth instalment of the whole number of six which will constitute the complete set. We cannot say that this book represents, even to the extent which the narrow limits imposed upon the authors would have allowed, the present state of our knowledge of the soil. In fact, the title is misleading. These pages give us very little information about the soil. They say, indeed, a good deal, and that with the obvious directness derived from practical knowledge, of the tillage of the soil, its treatment, and its uses. But the story of the formation of soils; the description of different soils, and of their physical and chemical properties; the account of the constituents of soils, and the explanations which are needed to understand the rationale of each of the various operations to which soils may be submitted,—all these things are not even seriously discussed in the book before us. Much of the little that is here said on these matters is obsolete or imperfect in form, while positive mistakes are not infrequent. This volume suffers much by comparison with Mr. Warington's sound and useful "Chemistry of the Farm," a book belonging to the same series. Instead, however, of supplementing that work by developing more fully the treatment of the subject of the soil, the book under review refers its readers to Mr. Warington's volume, in which the chemistry and physics of the soil were necessarily very briefly discussed.

In the Black Forest, by Charles W. Wood (Bentley), is a small volume recording the writer's impressions of the scenery and inhabitants of the part of Germany indicated in the title; but the numerous illustrations, though in a curiously neat, foreign style of engraving, give a better idea of both than the letterpress. One of the most attractive incidents is on page 175, where he "admired, too, the coolness and contrivance of a tourist, evidently walking through the country, who had laid his knapsack on the ground, and having slung a net between two trees, was lying at ease therein, reading some favourite volume, and luxuriating in the shade of the firs, which kept out so well the heat and glare of the afternoon sun." We are left in doubt whether the tourist's "coolness" was of the body or the mind, but the vague style is characteristic of the book.

A Girl's Destiny, by E. C. Clayton (Tinsley Brothers), is a tolerably interesting tale, though the incidents throughout are of a well-worn type. A charming girl, devoted to a somewhat mysterious father; a fine young man, who comes home to a very disagreeable mother; a will, found in an unlikely hiding-place, which contains remarkable provisions in reparation for a long-past injury,—such are the materials of the story, which is also diversified by a theatrical episode in connection with a wandering son. It is a pity that the style is so careless, the word "idiotical" being used much too often. It shows also a want of acquaintance with the habits of ladies, to send one out in the morning wearing a costly diamond bracelet.

Practical Lessons on Insect Life. By T. Wood. (J. Hughes).—An interesting and attractive volume, illustrated by a number of woodcuts, and containing much useful information concerning the life-history and habits of many of our insect friends and foes. Had the author consulted Miss Ormerod's works more frequently, his pages would have represented more fully the present state of our knowledge of popular entomology,—something more useful, for instance, might have been said concerning the crane-fly (p. 165) and the weevil (p. 62). The absence of an index is to be regretted.

Health Lectures, delivered in Manchester. Fifth Series, 1881-2. (Heywood).—The Manchester and Salford Sanitary Association has not only continued its system of delivering evening lectures, but has added thereto the very useful supplement of short discourses to workmen, after their mid-day meal, on the subjects discussed in the several lectures. Criticisms on the part of the workmen followed, and the suggestions then made have been utilised in preparing the lectures for the Press, doubtless adding to the clearness and directness of the language employed. Preventable diseases were considered in the course here presented, in the form of a small book, issued at a very low price. One lecture, on "Infant Feeding," is no exception to the general drift of the series, since infant sickness and mortality may be enormously reduced by a better knowledge of the proper principles of feeding.

Love's Martyrdom: a Play and Poem. By John Saunders. (Kegan Paul and Co.)—As a letter from so able a critic as Charles Dickens is printed with the play, this short notice refers merely to the poem. The author could not write a tale, in prose or verse, without importing into it a great deal of interest for his readers, but we still prefer his prose. Yet there are fine lines and passages in the poem, which would, however, be much more effective if the ideas, language, and customs portrayed were more in harmony with the time assigned to the action; they are so modern, that the mention of a literal martyrdom, and even the wearing of arms by Franklyn and the other gentlemen, come upon one as a surprise. Nor are we quite interested enough in the principal characters to rejoice as we should that the "martyrdom" was not completed.

Messer Agnolo's Household. By Leader Scott. (Longmans).—This tale deals with the domestic life of Florence in the time of Lorenzo dei Medici, and a most graphic and pleasing picture it gives of respectable citizen interiors in the cinquecento period. One feels in a glow of warm interest, from the introduction to the lions and their keepers at the beginning of the story, till the satisfactory, yet naturally told, reconciliation with which it ends. Only, any one who can write so well should not allow the faulty possessive on p. 14, or "conventional" for "conventual" to remain on p. 2. It is long since we have seen either fact or fiction which has given so well, so sunnily, the innocent side of Italian life; yet there is no milk-and-water innocence, but plenty of shade, as well as sun.

The Sun: its Planets and their Satellites. A Course of Lectures upon the Solar System, read in Gresham College, London, 1881-2. By Edmund Ledger. (Stanford).—Gresham College is generally regarded as an educational Nazareth, from which little good is expected. In the coming reform of the Corporation of London, doubtless, something will be done to carry out the spirit of the will of the liberal founder. Mr. Ledger has done right to address his lectures to a larger audience than is likely to find its way to the Gresham lecture-room; whatever they may have been in the delivery, they are at least worth reading. He has evidently put himself to much trouble in their preparation, and the result is a readable and trustworthy popular account of the leading discoveries with reference to the Sun itself, and the planetary system of which it is the centre and sustainer. Mr. Ledger has taken special pains to master all the recent researches by means of the spectroscopic, and the summary he gives of the methods and results appears to us trustworthy, up to the latest date, and is certainly interesting. He has brought together a very large number of well-executed illustrations, several of them coloured (showing, among other things, the solar prominences), and many of them photographic. Any reader wishing to pursue the subject farther will find abundant assistance in the numerous references given to standard works in the various departments.

We have received the sixth half-yearly volume of The Antiquary: a Magazine Devoted to the Study of the Past. (Elliot Stock).—It is full of interesting matter. Among the articles may be mentioned "The Domesday of Colchester," "Accounts of Henry IV." (Henry's expenditure seems to have been considerably in excess of his income), "The Great Cause of the Impositions" (impositions may be described as extraordinary customs dues), and "Guernsey Folk-lore." Some of the shorter notes are very valuable. Here, for instance, is one, on the "value of land in Warwickshire." At Claverdon, in that county, is the tomb of a certain John Matthews, who died in the reign of Henry VII., leaving an estate for the repair of the parish church. The income derived from this estate has been inscribed on the tomb from time to time, and the record stands thus:—"1617, 12 nobles (£4); 1707, £12; 1825, £78; 1868, £130." The value of land has certainly increased in a much larger proportion than the value of money.

NEW EDITIONS.—We have received a fifth edition of The Tripartite Nature of Man: Spirit, Soul, and Body, by J. D. Heard, M.A. (T. and T. Clark), a valuable contribution to religious philosophy, which we rejoice to see finding so much acceptance from the public. —Messrs. Wilson and McCormick (Glasgow) publish, in a very elegant little volume, in which type and paper are equally agreeable, Sir Arthur Helps' Thoughts in the Cloister and the Crowd, published, we see, in 1835, and therefore passed out of copyright.—The fifth edition of Mr. R. W. Millington's Selections for Latin Prose (Longmans) contains those pieces only which are intended for more advanced students, together with some grammar papers. Both are accompanied by copious notes, and the "Key" is withdrawn from circulation, a step which we heartily commend.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

MR. GLADSTONE left Cannes on Monday, thoroughly refreshed, it is believed, by his Southern holiday, which has only been impaired by the gigantic microscope held over him. He arrived in Paris on Tuesday, and devoted the next few days to making the acquaintance of all the leading French politicians, and endeavouring to remove the "tension" which undoubtedly exists between the two Governments. There are difficulties about Egypt, the Commercial Treaties, Madagascar, and Congo—as to which last the British Foreign Office favours Portuguese claims—that together make up a serious aggregate. Mr. Gladstone cannot directly remove any of them, but he can ascertain exactly what the French want, and can remove the sensitive suspiciousness which has developed itself in Paris as to British designs. He values the entente cordiale, he sympathises with the Republic, and he may be able to remove the impression that the British Government rather enjoys seeing France baffled at every turn. If he can do this, he will have simplified affairs very greatly, and paved the way for a renewal of the entente cordiale on a fresh basis. The old one, the joint action in Egypt, has fallen through.

It was rumoured yesterday, on the authority of many French papers, confirmed in part by the Freeman's Journal, that Walsh, the man accused by James Carey of organising the Invincibles, had been arrested at Havre, and had "confessed." That requires confirmation, but it is certain that the Government have demanded the extradition of Byrne from France, and of Sheridan from the United States. In the former country the Extremists, and in the latter the Irish, loudly threaten a refusal; but in both, we imagine, the Judges will decide according to the evidence. It ought to be strong, and to be evidence of complicity in actual crime, or we shall be overwhelmed with applications from Russia, Spain, and France. Whether it would not be wiser to include membership of a murderous league among the crimes thought worthy of extradition, is another matter. At present, there is no such clause in the Treaties, and evidence must be given as to acts other than membership. If that is available, we do not believe that Courts will decline to execute the law, or that the Governments of great and friendly States will fail to act on their decisions. The popular notion that murder is something else than murder, if the victim is a King or an agent of authority, is no more recognised by any Court or Government than it is by any moralist worth attention.

Two more societies of Anarchists have been discovered, through the premature explosion of chemical mixtures, one in Belgium and one in Spain. The Belgian society is apparently an offshoot of the French one, but the Spanish is native, and very formidable. The Anarchists, it is stated, are taking advantage of the distress existing in Andalusia, where the tenure is very bad, and labourers can get neither land nor good wages, and are threatening the holders of property. They have been guilty, the Minister of the Interior says, of many outrages, and obey the orders of a society calling itself "The Black Hand," the object of which is the destruction of capital and its owners, and which numbers 500 leaders and 7,000 known followers. This form of fanaticism, with its strange contempt for human life and still stranger touch of sordidness in its objects, seems to be running like an epidemic through Europe. We presume the truth is that, as in the days of the Jacquerie, which also burst out everywhere, and was marked by extreme ferocity, some class exceptionally miserable has become suddenly conscious of its misery. That would explain the readiness with which agents are found, but the belief of the leaders of the Societies that you can build by mere destruction remains inexplicable. It is not probable that the disease, for it is rather that than anything else, will last long. There is too much readiness in making revelations.

We are informed that of all questions now pending in Egypt, the most urgent is that of the indebtedness of the peasantry. Foreign companies and foreign usurers have for some time past offered their loans upon terms which, to the poor fellahs, always liable for taxes, or arrears, or backshish, have proved too tempting. They have taken money on the security of their lands so generally that if the mortgages are foreclosed the majority of the population will be evicted, and Egypt thrown into utter disorganisation. The usurers, strong in the expectation of European Courts, and anxious for the rice and sugar lands, are disposed to evict; and so grave is the situation, that the Government is seriously advised to take the tremendous step of declaring peasants' lands unsaleable. They will hardly go quite so far, because without lands to pledge the peasantry could not, in bad years, pay their full taxes; but it is certain that some very serious step must be taken. A land-mortgage bank will be set up, to lend money at low interest; but, as its loans must be very limited, it is doubtful if this will suffice, unless the bank is preceded by some decree declaring the peasants' bankruptcy. Disinterested observers declare that so fierce is the temper of the people on this subject, that all would be anarchy if the British troops were withdrawn, the peasantry following any leader who promised to annul their bonds. All this is probably true, for it all occurred in Sonthalistan and in the Decann; but the difficulty of remedy is very great. The Egyptian Government will not make the peasantry independent, and the British Government has no power, on its present theory, to pass permanent laws for Egypt.

Mr. Parnell's speech yesterday week was little more than a bare disclaimer of all responsibility for the Irish outrages,—which he took care not to reprobate with anything like true moral censure, concluding with a furious attack on Mr. Forster and the Government for adopting and putting in force Mr. Forster's policy of a Prevention of Crimes Act,—a policy, as Mr. Parnell described it, of "the gallows and the rack." Mr. Trevelyan, in reply, lamented that Mr. Parnell,—to whom he himself had desired to be fair, as he did not think Mr. Forster did desire it, and had eagerly listened, in the hope that he would explain away the appearance of the connection between the policy of the Land League and the policy of outrage,—had "dried up those hopes of conciliation" which are always more or less present to the minds of the Irish Government. Mr. Trevelyan added that whatever the defects of the Prevention of Crimes Act, it had really struck at the practice of agrarian murder, and saved scores of confessedly innocent people who would otherwise have fallen victims to conspiracy and violence. Mr. Trevelyan then praised too much the speeches of Mr. Gibson and Mr. Plunket,—we trust he is not going to lapse into the purely repressive type of Irish statesman,—and for the rest showed that the Government had never interfered with the freedom of the Irish Press except when there was real danger that specific outrages were hinted at, and might be expected to follow. Mr. Trevelyan declared that the Queen's Warrant runs now in Ireland with at least eight times as much freedom as it did a year ago.

After these speeches, the debate returned to the Kilmainham channel, Sir Stafford Northcote professing to believe that the Government last May preferred pleasing Mr. Parnell to pleasing their own colleague, Mr. Forster, and Mr. Chamberlain replying, in a very spirited speech, that there had been no division in the Cabinet as to the Prevention of Crimes Bill, that the Cabinet was perfectly unanimous for such a measure, that twelve out of its thirteen members, including Lord Spencer, Lord Kimberley, Lord Carlingford, and Lord Hartington, all of whom knew Ireland, were in favour of the release of Mr. Parnell, believing, what had turned out to be the fact, that their release would tend to the pacification of Ireland; and, in a very powerful passage, he asked how it could be expected that the Liberal Party should support a Government which should lean on measures of repression alone, like those which caused order to reign at Warsaw. Mr. Raikes concluded Friday's debate, in one of the insolent little speeches for which he is earning an unpleasant reputation, by declaring that on his own showing the difference between Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Parnell was only one of degree, and that Mr. Chamberlain had confessed himself the author of the policy impugned by the amendment,—the fact being that Mr. Chamberlain had absolutely denied the smallest shade of difference between himself and the eleven other Cabinet Ministers with whom he agreed. But Mr. Raikes is disposed to take negatives as affirmatives, and affirmatives as negatives, whenever it suits his purpose.

On Monday, the debate commenced on Mr. Parnell's amendment to the Address attacking the Prevention of Crimes Act, which he accused of having alienated Ireland, when Ireland was beginning to soften towards the British Government; but as we have elsewhere stated, Mr. Parnell's attack appeared to be almost deliberately and intentionally weak, and hardly led up in any degree to the strong language of the amendment. He insisted chiefly on the number of arrests under the Curfew Clause which resulted in an immediate discharge of the prisoners by the magistrates, and on the challenging of Catholics on the juries. He did not even affirm his own belief that any single person executed for murder under the Prevention of Crimes Act had been innocent. The Attorney-General for Ireland warmly repudiated the statement that religious belief had anything at all to do with the Crown challenges of jurymen. They found it necessary to challenge all whom they thought to be liable to intimidation, and it so happened that many of the more independent and wealthier persons, who were thought to be less liable to intimidation, were, as a matter of fact, Protestants; but it was not as Catholics that Catholics were challenged,—on the contrary, the Crown would greatly have preferred Catholics of standing and position for these juries. Eventually, Mr. Parnell's amendment was rejected by 133 to 15.

But the debate on the Address was not yet to close. On Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, Mr. McCarthy's and Mr. O'Connor's amendments relating to the Irish distress were discussed, Mr. Trevelyan showing how grossly the system of distributing help and granting outdoor relief had been abused in Ireland, and how oppressive the system was to those poor people who could only just support themselves by their industry, but who could not afford to pay for the outdoor relief of others. By one poor Irish Union, £25,000 is owed at this moment to the Imperial Exchequer for potato-seed recklessly distributed to tailors, shoemakers, and all the idlers in the streets, under the impression that the Union would never be asked to repay a penny of it. The Government were determined to enforce self-reliance on the Irish Unions, as the only really beneficent policy for Ireland. In an interesting speech delivered on Wednesday, Mr. Childers, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, pointed out the very great importance to Ireland of encouraging the flow of capital to that country, and the enormous advantages which Ireland would gain if her own Railway Companies could borrow, for productive expenditure, as the English Railway Companies can, at three and a half per cent., rather than that the British Government should lend money to Irish proprietors at five per cent. Mr. Childers expressed himself heartily favourable to any well-considered scheme of carefully-planned emigration by families, which would not only relieve the barren and over-populated districts, but prevent the districts so relieved from being overrun again by a similar evil.

The eleven nights' debate on the Address were at length brought to a conclusion on Thursday, after a fresh speech of Mr. Parnell's on Ireland—this time on the distress—in which he attacked Lord Spencer and Mr. Trevelyan rather angrily for discouraging outdoor relief as a temporary and local remedy, but was otherwise extremely reasonable and moderate, making a very strong appeal to Parliament not to refuse to consider the complementary measures needed to complete the effect of the Land Act and Arrears Act. At length, Mr. A. O'Connor's amendment to the Address was negatived, and the Address and Report agreed to, after a loss of exactly eleven nights—just the same number as (as the Solicitor-General has shown) sufficed for the whole seven Sessions of the last Parliament to discuss Addresses in answer to the Queen's Speeches—eleven nights spent on purely abstract discussions. It would be far better to put an end to these straggling and unpractical discussions altogether, and to allow the grievances which they raise to be discussed à propos of some genuine attempt at a remedy. The Address in answer to the Queen's Speech is getting to be a mere expedient for killing time.

On Saturday, Mr. John Morley was returned for Newcastle-on-Tyne by a majority of 2,256 over the Conservative candidate, Mr. Bruce. Mr. Morley polled 9,443 votes, against 7,187 given for Mr. Bruce. The usual Liberal majority at Newcastle-on-Tyne is, of course, very much larger than 2,256. In 1880, Mr. Ashton Dilke received 10,404 votes, against only 5,271 given for Mr. Hamond, the Conservative. But then, in 1880, the Irish electors, who are numerous, voted for the Liberals; while in this election they, with as many of the working-men as Mr. Cowen's paper could influence, went over to the Conservatives. The victory, therefore, is quite as good as, under the circumstances, we had any right to anticipate; and in Mr. John Morley the Liberals will gain a very great accession of intellectual strength, which is of even more consequence than voting-power. Mr. Morley will certainly make for himself a reputation of his own.

Under the present county franchise the county of Dublin at least remains Conservative, nay, has given more Conservative votes than ever. On Wednesday, Colonel King-Harman was returned for the county with a poll of 2,514, as against 1,428 for Mr. MacMahon, the Home-rule or Nationalist candidate; majority for the Conservative, 1,086. At the last contested election, in 1874, Colonel Taylor received only 2,183 votes to 1,235 given to Mr. Parnell. So that while Mr. MacMahon has improved on Mr. Parnell's poll in 1874, Colonel King-Harman has improved still more on the vote given to Colonel Taylor. At Portarlington also, on Wednesday, the Conservatives had another triumph, Mr. Brewster (Conservative) being returned by a majority of 13 over the Nationalist candidate, Mr. Mayne. As between reaction and revolution, these two constituencies appear to prefer reaction.

As the Committee of Selection are to have the power of nominating the Grand Committees, it was naturally felt that it should be reinforced from below the gangway on both sides of the House, and not left to the somewhat too official body of which it has hitherto consisted. Mr. Dillwyn, on Tuesday, moved the addition to its numbers of two members, who are to be Mr. Illingworth, to represent the independent Liberals, and Sir H. Wolff, to represent the independent Conservatives, and the addition was carried by a great majority (213 to 54). A very hot debate arose on the proposal to nominate Mr. Mitchell Henry, as the representative of Irish interests on the Committee of Selection, the Parnellites repudiating him very warmly as a true representative of Ireland; but Mr. Newdegate aptly observed that Mr. Parnell had stated, only a few nights previously, that he would not be guided in his conduct by any reference to the opinions of that House. Now, it would never do to have on the Committee of Selection a man who would not be guided in his conduct by any reference to the opinions of that House, and hence it seemed desirable to take an Irish Member who would be so guided. This very sensible remark recommended itself to the House, and Mr. Mitchell Henry's name was carried by 157 votes against 22.

Sir Stafford Northcote gave notice yesterday week that he would on an early day move for a Select Committee to inquire into all the circumstances connected with the release last May of Mr. Parnell, Mr. Dillon, and Mr. O'Kelly from prison, and to report them to the House; he would move that the Committee should be named by the Committee of Selection, and should have power to examine witnesses upon oath. On Monday, in reply to a question from Sir Stafford Northcote, Lord Hartington declined to give any of the time at the disposal of the Government for a discussion thrashed out to the last grain long ago, and on which no inquiry can throw any fresh light. It seems to us that Sir Stafford Northcote's proposal to take power to swear the witnesses,—all the more important of whom would be, we suppose, Cabinet Ministers,—as if they could not be believed on their honour, was rather an unworthy attempt to cast insinuations on his opponents. We hardly expected Sir Stafford Northcote to set the example in mud-casting of that kind.

Lord Randolph Churchill delivered himself at Woodstock on Tuesday of a string of accusations against the Government, which it is not easy to understand passing the lips of a gentleman, concerning any men whom he would be willing to meet in society, and with whom he would not think it his duty to decline all acquaintance. Here are specimens:—"You have to do with a Government of imposture, an Administration of make-believes, whose every act is either a sham or a fraud." "Never, since the days of the infamous Cabal, has this country witnessed such a set of political impostors in the councils of the Crown." "In their Government of Ireland, however, they have abandoned the paths of political imposture, and have entered on the high-road of political crime." "At a particular time, so base was their policy, that they forced the Crown to rely for their authority in Ireland on the assassins of the Phoenix Park." Did even the tenants and labourers of the Duke of Marlborough like to listen to foul language of this kind, concerning a Government in the integrity of which the vast majority of the English people believe with implicit confidence? Or did they only regard it as Lord Randolph Churchill's political idiosyncrasy to paint with a rich supply of soot out of his own fancy those whom he erroneously thinks it his professional duty to revile? Anyhow, this outrageous political Billingsgate was received with shouts of laughter and cheers.

On the same day, Lord Carlingford made a speech at Coventry in singular contrast to Lord Randolph Churchill's. It was, if anything, over-moderate. The Lord Privy Seal declared on his honour that there was nothing to reveal about the release of Mr. Parnell, for that the public already knew all, but admitted fully that as to the expediency of that release there was room for difference of opinion. He showed without the slightest heat that so far from the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish having produced the Crimes Bill, the Bill was being drawn up by a Committee of the Cabinet before Lord Spencer left England, and Lord F. Cavendish was himself present at its consultations. Finally, while deprecating any idea of living in a fool's paradise of optimism, he declared his full belief that the Land Act had given to large numbers of Irish tenants "encouragement in their industry, and increased contentment with the laws under which they live;" and that, although there is still in Ireland "great traditional dissatisfaction and suspicion of this country," we are on the way to the cure of the disease. Lord Carlingford speaks too seldom. Few men understand Ireland as he does, and fewer still are able to keep themselves free from the rancour which Irish subjects, more than any other, provoke. His is pre-eminently a sane judgment.

The taste for luxury and magnificence in English society has been curiously illustrated this week. The Crown Prince and Princess of Germany have been celebrating their Silver Wedding, delayed by the death of Prince Charles, and entire columns of description of the festivities have been telegraphed to London, including minute accounts, not only of the ladies' diamonds, but of the men's costumes. The Correspondents seem positively intoxicated with the splendour of one reception in the White Saloon, at which every one appeared in fancy dress, the Times man in particular declaring that one party of masqueraders, who represented the English Queen Elizabeth and her Court, but forgot Shakespeare, Raleigh, Bacon, and Burleigh, "came like speechless, yet eloquent shadows, and so they departed." An "eloquent shadow" dressed as a Beef-eater must have been worth seeing. The celebration of the Silver Wedding is a graceful custom, and the ceremonial was, doubtless, worthy of record as an incident of foreign Court life; but the appetite for finery which cannot wait even for letters, but insists on telegraphic bulletins about "puffed doublets" of red velvet, is, in an age like this, a strange one. There are evidently people extant who not only take delight in seeing a great dress pageant, which is natural enough, as natural as delight in any other exhibition of colour, but in reading a description of one. The Court of Germany, we perceive, omits in its triumphs the slave who told the Roman conqueror that he, too, was mortal, and yet Berlin could easily supply one. The first Socialist found in the next street would answer admirably, and need only say, "I am the outcome!" to be more impressive than the slave.

The United States Senate is in a fever at recent proceedings in Chili. It appears that the Ministers of England, France, and Italy, deploring the continuance of the endless and now purposeless war between Peru and Chili, met at the house of the American Minister in Santiago, and discussed with him a plan of joint intervention. The plan, according to the telegram, was of his proposing, not theirs. The Senate, however, hearing a rumour of the affair, demanded explanations, and President Arthur informs them that Mr. Partridge has acted without instructions, that he has been ordered back by the first ship, and that the Governments of London, Paris, and Rome have been informed of this new aspect of the facts. If the Government of Washington is to assume this kind of Protectorate over two continents, it should assume also some responsibility for the protected States. As it is, it is actively intervening to prevent Peru from obtaining help anywhere, yet professes non-intervention to such an extent that it will not even remonstrate with Chili. As a result, Peru will be thrown back into barbarism, while Chili will be exhausted by a profitless occupation.

The "General" of the Salvation Army is not happy just now. His processions in London have been stopped, practically by violence. His raid on the Continent cannot be considered a success, and Mr. Spurgeon, who has hitherto been neutral, has pronounced decisively against the Army and its works. Moreover, there is trouble about funds. The General has over-built and over-purchased himself, and has publicly announced that he has borrowed money for his edifices to the amount of £20,000, at six and a half, seven, and seven and a half per cent., showing that the security is not quite perfect. He asks friends of the cause, therefore, to lend him money on deposit, promising life annuities equal to five per cent. per annum, or five per cent. for long loans, or three per cent. for deposits withdrawable at a month's notice. That last offer might ruin him, if the Bank rate were two per cent., and altogether he had much better not convert the Army into a Bank of Deposit. If he does, he will find that the most interesting feature in his organisation, his own absolute power, will speedily disappear. Creditors will have accounts.

Sir Fitzjames Stephen writes to the Times, protesting against the new attempt in India to subject Europeans to the direct jurisdiction of native magistrates. He says the Code of Procedure, which guarantees the European privilege, after working satisfactorily for ten years, was re-enacted in 1882, and should not be modified so soon; that the privilege was specially discussed and resanctioned by a Committee; and that no cause has since arisen for a new departure. He further objects to the principle of the change, arguing with truth that personal privilege is the basis of all Indian law—for example, if native ladies could be summoned into court as witnesses, all India would be in insurrection—and that absolute equality between Native and European is a dream. If a foundation exists for it, the European Government, whose only moral claim is its inherent superiority of morale, ought to depart. We doubt if any of these arguments are so strong as the one we advanced, that it is essential to keep up European confidence in the law; but they are pleaded by a strong Judge, intimately acquainted with the working of the Indian code. The Europeans in India, we perceive, are holding unanimous meetings against the Act, and threatening to dissolve all Volunteer Corps; but, as Lord Hartington has refused to ask for the previous sanction of Parliament, they have no lever.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE FIRST DANGER AHEAD.

THE Session has hitherto been Irish, and a great many people, with the Times for their mouthpiece, believe it will continue Irish still. We trust it will not, even if the Government have to apply the Closure resolutely, or to introduce it in its French form, under which the leader of the majority proposes it on his own responsibility, as he would any other measure; and we wish to explain why, for our reason is very different from that of the Times. We do not think the Irish Extremists "impudent," in forcing Irish questions to the front. They think Irish questions all-important, and may fairly say just now that they are all-important, not only to Irishmen, but to all inhabitants of the United Kingdom. Lord Hartington said precisely the same thing three weeks ago, in even stronger language, affirming that the question of Ireland was more pressing than all other questions put together, and there is not an Englishman or a Scotchman competent to form an opinion who does not know that he was right. We may, indeed, believe that further Parliamentary discussion is not the way to settle Ireland, but we can hardly in reason expect an Irish Parliamentary party to admit the accuracy of that view. Or we may believe that the Parnellites are not sincere, and are pressing their one topic not in the hope of benefiting Ireland, but in the expectation of wearying England into separation; but then that is a policy which they have always more or less clearly avowed, and though it may be treasonable, it is not impudent. As a matter of fact, we imagine they do hope to weary us, and also hope to obtain certain concessions; and the condition of Ireland being what it is, that is not "impudent," by any means. If Scotland were in semi-rebellion, we should hear of nothing but Scotland; and though "sectional questions," as the Americans call them, are infrequent in this country, we have repeatedly given Session after Session to discussions, such as those on the Free-trade laws, which were really continuous arguments about the application of a single principle. Nor are we so clear as some of our own friends are that the Tories are so wicked in creating Irish debates. A majority of Tories sincerely believe that while the Government, and especially Mr. Gladstone, may be well-intentioned, they are in Ireland acting on principles which can lead to nothing but disaster, possibly even to the separation of the Islands. They think, in fact, what Sir J. Hay openly said on Tuesday, that the only way to govern Ireland is by force, steadily applied as in a Crown Colony; and that every remedial measure, and especially every remedial measure increasing freedom, tends to encourage sedition. They regard "Kilmainham Compacts," which, in some sort of fashion, they believe to exist, not, indeed, as "covenants with Hell," after the style of excited Orangemen, but as concessions which, instead of pacifying rebels, only inspire them with fresh courage. So believing, they want to discourage conciliation and strengthen repression, and, as they fancy, with their usual ignorance of all but Society, that this policy is popular, they press it, in season and out of season. They are doing grave mischief, but we doubt if they see it; and if they do not, they are not stepping outside the usual lines of party warfare.

The true reason for objecting to so much Irish discussion, and indeed for repressing it by something like force, is the danger lest the people of Great Britain, who number twenty-nine millions to the Irish five, should lose confidence in the House of Commons as an instrument of government. The notion, so incessantly repeated, and, indeed, acted on by many newspapers, that the public interest in the House is "waning," is, as we believe, substantially unsound,—as unsound as a kindred belief that the interest in theology is waxing faint. The attention paid to special debates or to certain kinds of sermons may be dying away, but the work of legislation, like the problem of the Whence and Whither, will remain for ever a subject of close and warm human interest; and just as we see that vivid argument on theology instantly brings repute, so we shall see that sincere debating in the House of Commons on subjects of vital interest is as attractive as ever. But it is undeniable that the British people are weary of infructuous Irish debates, and angry with the failure of the House to do what they consider its proper work. They are not angry at serious attention to Ireland. They recognise, just as fully as Lord Hartington, that Ireland is the grand difficulty; and if any serious politician has anything fresh to say, they will listen, not only with attention, but with eagerness. But they have been trained for generations to regard the House as an irresistible machine for securing the political and social improvements they desire; and finding that it is unable for Session after Session to continue this work, they are growing first perplexed and then irritated. The perplexity can go no deeper, but the irritation can; and if the hope created by the Closure is finally disappointed, it will, until it becomes dangerous. What form the danger will assume we do not pretend to know, though we have a suspicion; but of this we are certain, that the British people in anger is seldom wise, and that in anger it always wisely or foolishly insists on action. The Tories fancy that action will take the old and customary form of turning out the Government, in the hope that the next one will be more successful in doing work; but their hopes, quite natural in men who do not even yet recognise how unlike the Householder Demos is to the Ten-pounder Demos, deceive them. They forget that the Electors are not only irritated by not getting any out-turn at all, but by not getting the out-turn which they want, and which they know the Tories will not give them. Men like Lord Cranbrook think the electors will be indignant because Liberal promises are not kept, and that, therefore, the Tory promise of other things will delight them; but that is not so. The millions want certain things, instinct tells them that the Tories will not give them, and being, as compared with the old electors, a multitude, their instinct will be stronger and more operative with them than any argument. They will desire to change not the Government, but the machine through which it works, and by which it is foiled; and they may try to do this in one of at least three ways, any one of which we would entreat sensible Irishmen and sensible Tories to think over well, for they are all more or less directly dangerous to them. The electors may insist on a Closure so sweeping and stringent that it would virtually amount to a suspension of the right of discussion, in favour practically of legislation by the Cabinet. That plan does even now exist in a rude form in France, whenever the Government is supported by a majority, and results in incessant Cabinet overthrows, or "crises," as they are called; and it would be in England, whatever its other merits or demerits, the most sweeping of revolutions. We should be governed virtually by plébiscites given from outside, pressed upon the Cabinet by majorities, and passed without deliberation, and those plébiscites would not be to the advantage either of Conservatism, or of the constructive Radicalism the Spectator tries to represent. There is positive danger of an impulse in this direction, which would not be unwelcome to those Radicals who are really Reds, and those who, like a vestryman the writer once heard, are inclined on all occasions to cry out "Damn talking,—lets 'ave a show of 'ands!" Or the electors may insist on silencing without expelling the Irish Extremists, and so at last giving Ireland a genuine grievance, without at the same time creating for her a new government. No one who listens to the talk on omnibus knife-boards will venture to say that this danger is impossible. Or, finally, the electors may do as they did on the last occasion when their machine would not work,—they may demand its "reform" in a spirit which, new force and not new wisdom being exclusively sought, could end only in undiluted democracy, democracy determined first of all to "waste as little time" as possible in either reflection or argument. Do reasonable Conservatives, or, for that matter, unreasonable Conservatives, wish for that? because we sincerely believe, if the anticipations of the Times are fulfilled, and this Session is wasted like the last, and the Closure is evaded or impeded till it will not act, this is the most probable result. The English people are very apt to move on accustomed lines, and they are accustomed to think a Reform Bill the true remedy for any paralysis of Parliament. If they raise the cry, they will do it seriously, there is no resisting force anywhere, and instead of a wise Reform Bill, such as is required, we shall have a sweeping measure, which will restore force to the House of Commons at a price which Conservatives, at all events, will be most unwilling to pay. Things may go much better than the Times fears, for Mr. Gladstone has returned, and the Closure, once applied, may work well; but if they do not, if the Parties will not let the House of Commons work, if aimless talk about past history is to absorb all the nights not devoted to actual Supply, the result will not be the supersession of the House of Commons, but a change of some kind within it which most certainly will not be approved either by Conservatives, or by Irishmen, or by those Radicals who still believe deliberation by Representatives essential to wise government. The gainers will be the Democrats, pure and simple.

MR. PARNELL.

MR. PARNELL is a very curious study. An Irishman with hardly a grain of the Irish temperament in him, a leader of a violent and loud-mouthed faction, who has hardly anything of the temperament of the agitator in him, a politician much more naturally inclined to be acrid and bilious than to be daring and dashing, and yet one from whom all his followers expect daring and dashing words, there would be something almost pathetic, if one could feel any genuine sympathy with him, in the way in which he occasionally doles out a carefully-prepared denunciation, and then subsides, with a sort of relief, into the frigid reserve with which "willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike, he hints a fault, and hesitates dislike." Nothing can be more remarkable than the contrast between his speech of yesterday week, after he had been unwisely baited by Mr. Forster into a great effort to revive the rancour of the feeling between England and Ireland, as his followers expected him to do, and his speech of last Monday, when he brought an indictment against the Crimes Prevention Act so feeble,—so carefully, elaborately, and intentionally feeble, as it appeared,—that it was difficult to believe he was not delivering the nearest thing to an apology for that Act which, in his position, he dared to deliver; nothing more extraordinary than the contrast between the denunciation of England and the English Government with which the first speech concluded, and the appeal to the English Parliament to do its best to complete its most useful legislative achievement for Ireland which ended the second speech, and which constituted the chief part of the third, on Irish distress. On February 23rd this was his address to Mr. Trevelyan, on whose inability to follow in Mr. Forster's footsteps he half complimented and half taunted him:—"We say he (Mr. Forster) was deposed from his position, and the right honourable gentleman apprenticed, though a very willing one, in his place. I feel that the Chief Secretary must say to himself, in the words of Scripture, 'I am not worthy to unloose his shoe-latchets.' It would have been far better to have the Crimes Act administered by the sound politician now in disgrace. Call him back, send him to help Lord Spencer in the congenial work of the gallows in Ireland, send him to look into the secret inquiries of Dublin Castle, and to superintend the impost for blood-money. We invite you to man your racks. Send the best men forward in the task of misgoverning and oppressing Ireland. For my part, I am confident in the future. I believe that our people will survive the present oppression, as they have survived many and worse ones. I think our progress may be slow, but the time will come when this House and the people of this country will admit once more that they have been mistaken; that they have been deceived by those who ought to have been ashamed of themselves; that they have been led astray from the right method of governing a noble, generous, brave, and impulsive people; and that they will reject their present leaders with just as much determination and with just as much belief as they rejected the services of the right honourable gentleman the Member for Bradford." Well, that passage had something of the verve of true hatred in it, though it cooled down, showing Mr. Parnell's characteristic inability to keep up above the line of inveterate dislike, towards the close. But after such a denunciation of the régime of the gallows and the rack,—a curiously unfortunate touch of rhetoric, since no Irishman has even ventured to ask a question suggesting the use of the rack in Ireland, numberless as are the fabulous oppressions which Irish questions have suggested to the House of Commons,—one would naturally have expected from Mr. Parnell on Monday such a string of assertions at least as to the iniquities wrought by the Crimes Act, as would have turned the heads of credulous Irish readers with horror and wrath. What do we find? A list of cases in which people had been apprehended on suspicion, under what is called the Curfew Clause of the Act, and dismissed by the Magistrates because there was no substantial evidence against them,—a declaration that one of the Jurors in the Dublin murder cases had entertained the impression that if he refused to convict he would be boycotted in his business, that is, would lose the custom of the Castle officials,—a demonstration that the great majority of the jurors were Protestant,—a statement that no Irishman could have trusted the impartiality of these juries,—and then a strong appeal to Parliament to amend the defects in the Land Act. There was not even so much as a confident statement of Mr. Parnell's own belief that any one of the persons executed for murder in Ireland was innocent of that crime. There was no attempt to deny Mr. Trevelyan's statement that fifty notoriously and confessedly innocent people had been murdered in Ireland, for the five convicted criminals whom some Irish partisans pretend to think innocent, nor that the execution of these criminals has practically stopped the assassination of innocent persons. In a word, it is difficult to read Mr. Parnell's speech of Monday, which should have been delivered to make out the case for his peroration of Friday, without entertaining a certain doubt whether Mr. Parnell really wished to justify the insinuations of that peroration, and did not rather propose to go as near as he safely might to toning them down. And the speech of the day before yesterday, except for a few discreditable sneers at Lord Spencer and Mr. Trevelyan, was the most moderate and conciliatory of the three. It is impossible to forget, to use a metaphor applied, we think, to the Land League by some one during the debate, that Mr. Parnell stands in a most perilous position between the devil and the deep sea of Irish unpopularity, and that it is almost impossible for him to avoid falling into the latter, if he wishes to escape in any degree from the clutches of the former. Therefore, we incline to think that his language must be construed with a good deal of reference to his very painful position. He knows that it is very dangerous to denounce heartily the outrages of the outrage-mongers, since the Land League would never have attained to the power it did attain without these outrages; and, therefore, while disclaiming all responsibility for them, he carefully avoids speaking of them with detestation, or even with the least shade of moral disapproval. But he does not really like the outrages; he would, we believe, have been very thankful if the outrages could have been put down without the stern machinery of the Crimes Prevention Act, and yet, well knowing that that machinery has practically put a stop to assassinations, he denounces it bitterly one day, only to draw the feeblest of indictments against it the next. The truth undoubtedly is that Mr. Parnell's heart is not in his position. He has raised a spirit in Ireland which makes him cower as Faust cowered before the vision elicited by his own spells. Mr. Parnell has neither the courage to risk everything by openly deploring any sort of encouragement which his agitation has given to crime, and trying to lead the Irish back into the path of strictly just and honest combination for reasonable political ends, nor the evil passion which would delight in taking the lead of the spirit which his methods have evoked, and in bounding it on to worse achievements. As it is, he hesitates between two totally different lines of action, repudiating the alliance with such a statesman as Mr. Trevelyan, when he sees how completely it would paralyse his influence to accept it, and again making dubious advances which seem to beckon on Mr. Trevelyan's reforms, so soon as he seems to himself to have broken too completely with the reformers.

We have never thought well of Mr. Parnell, but we do say this, that he is neither good enough to make a great effort for Ireland which might really be the beginning of peace, nor bad enough to make a great effort for a rupture which might be the outbreak of war. He vibrates between the two policies, and shrinks back from both. He is not strong enough to say that he has done wrong in the past and will devote his life to the attempt to undo that wrong in the future. Nor is he unscrupulous enough to declare that he has done nothing but right in the past, and that the demon of malice which his policy has evoked ought to be fed daily with fresh acts of acrimony and hatred. On the whole, we not only blame but also pity Mr. Parnell. And we cannot but think that Mr. Forster made a serious blunder, when he increased last week, by the inopportune revival of a discreditable history, the difficulty which Mr. Parnell obviously finds in repressing his own more violent followers, even where his own obvious preference for milder methods would have induced him,—so far as, in his position, he dare advocate these milder methods,—to deprecate his adherents' violence, and to meet the British Government half-way.

POLITICAL EPILEPSY.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL probably supposes that in such speeches as he made at Woodstock on Tuesday he is following the example of Mr. Disraeli, and making himself famous by his virulent invective. The truth is, however, that he does not in the least understand his model. Mr. Disraeli spoke with extraordinary violence before he got a seat in Parliament at all, believing that this was the way to attract popular attention to an unknown man; but long before he had reached a position as conspicuous as that which Lord Randolph Churchill now occupies below the gangway on the Tory side of the House, he altered his style, and reduced his invective, whether in the House or out of it, within the limits which the country naturally expects from persons who aspire to a weighty influence in its counsels. Mr. Disraeli would have never been the man he became, if he had been capable of delivering such a speech as Lord Randolph Churchill's Tuesday's speech at any epoch in his career corresponding to that now reached by Lord Randolph Churchill. And, indeed, it is a speech which will injure no one but himself, but may seriously injure himself. It is all acting, of course, as the Times, in its indulgent criticism on it, said; no one suspects Lord Randolph of believing twenty consecutive words of it. But then a political actor should follow decent models, and not act epilepsy when he intends to act passion. When the present writer read the speech, there was one famous description of something like it which rushed at once to his mind. We can imagine a respectable Duke whose own bias is always to moderation using the very words, "Have mercy on my son, for he is lunatic and sore vexed; yea, oft-times he falleth into the fire, and oft into the water." If metaphor be allowed at all, nothing could better describe Lord Randolph Churchill's performances at Woodstock, which might be said to consist in the representation of convulsion fits, dashing him by turns into the fire of Tory fury, and the cold water of the revolutionary deluge. "Never since the days of the infamous Cabal has this country witnessed such a set of political impostors in the councils of the Crown." "They have abandoned the paths of political imposture, and entered on the high-road of political crime." "So base was their policy, that they forced the Crown to rely for its authority in Ireland on the assassins of the Phoenix Park." Compare all that with the wild shriek of real or affected revolutionary passion with which Lord Randolph declares,—"They pretended to fear that in bombarding Alexandria, in sending 40,000 men to Egypt, in slaughtering several thousands of Egyptians, and in brutally suppressing a genuine national movement, they were acting in the interests of peace and liberty." What will Lord Randolph's Conservative friends say to that last paroxysm? Sir Wilfrid Lawson, nay, Mr. O'Donnell himself, has never gone beyond that. Lord Randolph, if he acts at all, should try to act a little coherence. Both parties will shudder equally at his epileptic politics, if he goes on like that. Indeed, he could hardly have been more cruel than he was to his Tory allies, when he sneered at the Government for "doling out" to Greece only "one-half of the territory assigned her by Lord Beaconsfield in the Treaty of Berlin," and forgetting to remark that Lord Beaconsfield himself and his Foreign Secretary Lord Salisbury presented the chief obstacles to any redemption, however partial, of their own verbal "assignment." Lord Randolph Churchill, in his false notion that young politicians need think only of making men gape at them in astonishment, appears to be bent on horrifying all parties alike, though perhaps not equally, at his convulsion fits, for they must be more painful by far to the party whose reputation suffers by any exhibition of the silly fury of one of its members, than to the party who only see in them the evidence that a distinguished opponent is subject to temporary paroxysms of mental alienation.

The most effective criticism on furious raving of this kind is that passed by the Solicitor-General, in his striking speech at Egham last week, when he asked what persons who choose to use language of this extraordinary kind, can think of the judgment of the great people to whom they appeal. Lord Randolph Churchill, if he be not possessed of a devil,—a great "if," no doubt,—knows perfectly well that the majority of the British people believe in this Government as implicitly as they have ever believed in a Government at all, and that in such elections as that at Liverpool this confidence has been reaffirmed since those events happened which Lord Randolph Churchill exhausts the vocabulary of his political Billingsgate to describe. Now, even supposing that the Liberals are wrong, even supposing that the Tory judgments on most of the events of the last three years are right, how will it tend to convince those to whom the Tories appeal that they have been mistaken, to tell them not merely that they have misjudged matters on which a right judgment is very difficult, but that they have been, all through, supporting a pack of thieves, hypocrites, and imbeciles? That is the thesis of Lord Randolph Churchill's speech, and we cannot for our lives understand what conceivable object he can have in making such a speech, unless he really wishes to discredit his own party, and to increase the influence of ours. It is so obvious that nobody will listen to a man who tells him that he has not only been wrong, but comely wrong, stupidly wrong, viciously wrong, for years in every moral judgment he has formed of his rulers, that we really do not know how a man conceives of the public opinion to which he appeals, when he takes that line to bring it over to his own side. If you tell a public meeting, "You are either rogues or madmen, I don't know which," the public meeting naturally declines to hear more. What is the use of hearing more? If they really be rogues, they won't be converted by reason; if they be madmen, they can't be; so whichever horn of the dilemma be assumed, it is perfectly clear to them that that speaker has no business to address that audience. Yet this is precisely what a speaker like Lord Randolph Churchill does, who appeals from the judgment of the British people in 1880 to its judgment in 1883, on the assumption that every political judgment formed by the people has been shown in the three intervening years to have been the product of either folly, ignorance, or wickedness.

To our minds, nothing is more curious and difficult to explain than the sudden increase of impotent fury among Tories, at a time when the Press of this country has become so very much more moderate and subdued in tone, alike on the Conservative side and on the Liberal,—when the leading Conservative paper is the Standard, which every Liberal politician finds, in its own way, sane and sagacious; and when the leading Liberal paper is the Daily News, with which the majority of Liberals are disposed chiefly to find fault that it is hardly Liberal enough. Yet, just when these things are so, when men who address the great public, appear to have convinced themselves that the first condition of commanding influence is to be studiously moderate, and when members on the Liberal side, especially the Radicals, are studiously moderating their tone,—we can recall no politicians more moderate in tone than Mr. Burt and Mr. Broadhurst, and men of that type,—we have these strange Tory outbreaks of fury, which sound almost like the ravings of a lunatic. What is the explanation of it? Is it that the old representatives of privilege are really "desperate," and since they cannot get their way, resolve to "unpack their heart with words, and fall a-cursing"? In Lord Randolph Churchill's case, it looks very like it. And unless he changes his course,—and if he does, the public will very soon have forgotten these dismal follies,—he will soon lose all the chances which his birth and his occasional smartness have won for him.

MR. GLADSTONE IN PARIS.

THE bulletin-makers are very careful to tell us that Mr. Gladstone, while in Paris, settled nothing with the French Foreign Office, and, no doubt, that is technically true. Mr. Gladstone is not Foreign Secretary, and is not at all the kind of man to appoint himself informal Plenipotentiary, and take Lord Lyons' work out of his hands. Nevertheless, we are justified in expecting that positive good will result from his communications with the French Ministry. He is the head of her Majesty's Government, and it is just now most expedient that the views of that Government should be made known in Paris through a channel which is in a way authoritative, and yet is less suspected of finesse than in Paris every diplomatist is. It is useless to deny or smooth away the fact that the only one of Lord Salisbury's charges which had any validity in it is the only one he did not press,—that the Egyptian policy of the Government had impaired the entente cordiale with France. That is no discredit to the Government or to its policy. Talleyrand and Metternich together could not have so managed affairs that a Government which had kept its agreements as ours did, and a Government which had evaded its agreements as the French did, should remain on as cordial a footing as before. Nor was it possible for France not to be annoyed at the consequences of its own conduct in Egypt, or for Great Britain to be content with a friend who, partly, perhaps, under compulsion, exhibited every day some new evidence of inconvenient, if not discreditable vacillation, and who finally broke his word. Still, it is certain that in all such conflicts, some needless personal irritations must arise and some unfounded suspicions must be begotten, and it is most expedient that both should be dissipated by personal intercourse between men who have authority to speak, but yet are not directly responsible for the controversies. There is a notion in Paris, for example, that Lord Granville is not sorry in a grave and gentle manner to read France a lesson on the value of consistency and good-faith, and a notion in England that it is impracticable to deal with a Power which changes its foreign representative once a week. Mr. Gladstone would be able not only to give and receive assurances which, coming from him, would be of the highest value, but to persuade officials who have, while Ministries shift so fast, unusual power, yet are very seldom brought into contact with the leading statesmen of other countries. If Mr. Gladstone can convince permanent Chiefs like President Grévy, and the heads of Departments, of what is undoubtedly true, that the British Cabinet, though compelled to act for itself in Egypt, has no desire whatever either to humiliate France, or to injure France, or to impede France, he will have done much to restore a relation which is nearly invaluable to both countries. A joint control in Egypt is impossible. Two friends might as well agree to divide the ownership of the door-step of one of them. They would quarrel if they were the best of friends, the sweetest of tempers, the most disinterested of men; or if they did not, their servants would. But that is no reason why the relative position of the two Powers in Egypt should not be arranged, or why, when the arrangement has been made, they should not again be bound in the informal alliance so necessary to both. The substantial truth of the matter is that in the present position of European affairs, when England and France quarrel, France is throttled and England uneasy, and that of itself is a sufficient reason for renewing the entente cordiale. With England alienated, France has only enemies on her borders; and with France alienated, England is left alone in a dozen quarters, notably, for example, in Constantinople and Peking, where she has every day to settle questions of the last difficulty and importance. At this very moment, the supposed tension between the Powers is encouraging the Sultan to break up the modus vivendi in Syria, which depends on the reappointment of Roustem Pasha; and if that is broken up, the "question of the Lebanon"—upon which the Catholic Church, all Southern Frenchmen, and all Russians are alike furious—will be reopened once more. We say nothing of the important questions of extradition between the two countries; it is sufficient that, if they quarrel, France stands alone in Europe and England alone in Asia, and that the loneliness is a burden. Mr. Gladstone, of all men, is certain to feel this, and to do his best to prevent separation by every concession that can be considered reasonable. That he will make unreasonable concessions, as Tories are hinting, we do not fear, believing that on this subject they utterly misread his character. Mr. Gladstone hates war, and is, perhaps, over-anxious by the British liability to panic; but a man less likely to be turned from his course by foreign menaces never held power in this country. They would strike him as immoral.

There is another reason why personal contact between Mr. Gladstone and the French Government may prove most beneficial. He will not be deceived, as most diplomatists are, by the rise to power of the new couche sociale. The feeling that a State cannot be guided steadily, except by gentlemen, is strong all over Europe; but it is nowhere so strong, not to say unreasonable, as in the Diplomatic Services. Ministers and Secretaries of Legation not only feel a distaste for the new men, which is natural enough, but they disbelieve in them, think them incompetent, and cannot understand that a man who can hardly bow properly, or is as sensitive to slight as Franklin was, can, nevertheless, be, like Franklin, a very dangerous adversary. They do not see that such new men would not have got up in the world, if they had not been strong. Just at present, this error is serious, for France is ruled only by new men; and M. Challemeil-Lacour intends to introduce them freely into a service which in France, through all her changes, has remained a stronghold of the aristocracy. We question if he is wise in so doing, for Europe is still governed by individuals who can be best managed through the social tact and political tenacity which belong to aristocrats; but that is a mere opinion. M. Challemeil-Lacour will go his way, and weed out "Orleanist" Ambassadors and Permanent Secretaries of Legation, and so produce a change of tone in all Embassies which will perplex, perhaps irritate, half Europe. Mr. Gladstone will weigh the new men who are at the top with eyes which are not diplomatic, and which have seen "risen" men in high positions before, and will understand them and their objects as the diplomatists do not. Very likely he will approve neither personages nor designs. He has always said publicly that the administration of a country by its "leisured classes" is good for that country, and would fret under Franklin possibly more than Lord Granville would. But he will understand them, and the permanent danger between England and France is, first of all, misapprehension. The two countries are now so situated that if they can only understand one another, the chance of their quarrelling is slight, and every incident which assists comprehension becomes most valuable. Mr. Gladstone has seen, it is said, not only the French Ministers, but the heads of all French parties, and will be able to form judgments on them, which will, at all events, be additions to the judgments formed in the Embassy at Paris. Moreover, he will himself have been seen of them. The defect of new men is always suspicion, but such men in France are keen judges alike of statesmen and their motives. They will not believe, after hearing Mr. Gladstone, that one great object of the English Government in Cairo is to break the prestige of France, or fancy that English dislike of the proceedings in Madagascar is based at bottom on apprehensions for the future of the sugar trade. We should not wonder even if they came to understand that England was not preoccupied with the desire for Commercial Treaties, and discovered that when the British Premier made a speech on that subject, he meant substantially what he said. Enlightenment of that kind on both sides is pure gain, and we expect much of it from Mr. Gladstone's short intercourse with the men who are trying once more to govern France, and who are beginning to say that in foreign politics France "has been too nearly effaced."

MR. LABOUCHERE ON "THE COMING DEMOCRACY."

WE have rarely read a more dangerous political pamphlet than the one which Mr. Labouchere has printed in the Fortnightly Review for March. It is written with the reckless cleverness which marks much of its author's writing, and shows, in many passages, that kind of insight often found in men of detached minds who have seen many cities, and it will therefore be quoted everywhere by all Tories, and many timid Liberals, as the truest expression of secret Radical thoughts. If Lord Cranbrook knew his business, he would have told us already that Mr. Labouchere had "let the cat out of the bag," and had confessed that the ultimate object of Radicalism was plunder. That would be true, too, in part at least, if that programme were either possible or desired by many, and the answer that it is neither will be forgotten in the heat of party controversy. Unless we are greatly mistaken both as to the fury and as to the adroitness of our opponents, Mr. Labouchere will find that he has furnished Conservatives with a weapon of which they will make the fullest use, if not to defeat the Radicals, at least to frighten property-holders into abhorrence of the party.

With the first part of Mr. Labouchere's argument we have no particular quarrel, though we differ strongly as to details. We think, with him, that the tendency of politics in the United Kingdom is towards Democracy, and that the next Reform Bill probably will enthrone Demos in irresistible force. Whether the method of enthronement will be through equal electoral districts, with no provision for minorities, with paid Members, and with triennial Parliaments, is a matter of comparatively trifling importance. We dislike all three proposals, believe that the second will be defeated by the distaste for disreputable adventurers, and doubt if the third is or will be an object of any popular enthusiasm; while if it is not, the instinct of self-preservation in the Members is certain to defeat it. With the general proposition, however, that the body of the people mean to take power into their own hands in some way, we agree, as we do with the further statement that the House of Lords will, in some fashion or other, be swept out of the road. That it will be simply abolished, we doubt—though it may be, owing to the statesmen's wish for a more useful Second Chamber—as we doubt also whether the Throne will be placed on subsistence allowance, for we believe that the English, like the Scotch, Democratic as they both are, dislike breaking with the past, care very little—too little—about expense, and are instinctively disinclined to part with the ornamental part of the Constitution. If we know them, they will keep bright flowers in their windows, unless advised that they are distinctly injurious to health. We are not so certain as Mr. Labouchere is that his birth does not help to seat him for Northampton, and if it was our business to defeat Mr. Bradlaugh, would try not a fiercer Democrat than himself, but a Radical eldest son. All that, however, is detail. In the main argument, that the people in the broad sense are about to assume power in England, and will not be foiled by the Peerage, we agree, and it is only as to the use to which they will put that power that our difference with Mr. Labouchere is irreconcilable.

He says, apparently with approval, that the Democracy will pillage in all directions for the benefit of the State; that it will reduce the Crown to about £20,000 a year; that it will not only disestablish the Church, but take away its whole revenue to relieve the Education rate; that it will turn the occupants of the land into owners—though this is subsequently explained, so that the true meaning may only be fixity of tenure—and that all taxation will be placed upon those who can best afford it, mainly by an income-tax of fifty per cent. upon the rich. Mr. Labouchere does not precisely define “the rich,” and his minimum limit might possibly be a high one, say even £10,000 a year; but there is no mistaking the meaning of the following sentences:—“The sums that are now levied on industry by means of customs and excise will be raised by a progressive income-tax and a progressive succession duty. It is very clear that no individual can want more invested capital than such an amount as will produce in interest an income sufficiently large to enable him to gratify all his real and all his acquired wants. More as surplusage, and the owner of this surplusage has no real right to demand that society should be taxed to secure him in the possession of it. What can a man with a fortune beyond the very dreams of avarice do with his money? He has to compete in thousands with others as rich as himself for the possession of china cups and saucers, which may be intrinsically worth as many pounds, or he employs it in some other equally silly manner. Very large fortunes—as the Americans are learning—are a positive danger to a Democratic State. To take from the individual all above a certain amount, however just in theory, might, however, have its disadvantages. To take one-half beyond the amount regarded as alike safe to the State and sufficient for the individual, would be beneficial to both, and 50 per cent. might be laid down as the limit to which an income-tax should in any case extend. It may be said that in this case, accumulation would cease beyond the fixed amount. No harm would ensue if it did, but as a matter of fact, it would not.”

We claim to be as good Democrats as Mr. Labouchere, and believe most earnestly not only that the people will rule, but that they ought to rule, but we utterly repudiate that suggestion, as bad morally, bad financially, and in practical politics impossible. It is bad morally, because the majority have no right to take from one class more than they take from another, merely to make their own burden less. That is theft. Their right to tax incomes or successions is, of course, limited only by expediency or the needs of the State, and we can conceive of circumstances, such as imminent danger of invasion, under which a fifty per cent. income-tax on all possessed of more than bare livelihood would be perfectly right, though it could hardly be expedient, from the disorganisation into which it would throw the labour fund. But subject to that limitation about the means of livelihood, all must either be taxed exactly alike, or in proportion to the expense of protecting them, or the people, even if they vote by millions to tens, will be simply stealing. The Eighth Commandment is not abrogated because fools give thousands for Sevres cups, any more than it is abrogated because still greater fools give shillings for bad gin. Nonsense about superfluities! Everything is a superfluity in the eyes of the man who has less. Silver spoons are superfluities, for we can sip coffee with horn; but does that give all the Smiths in the parish a moral right to take half the spoons, in order that they may be more comfortable? To take them is plunder, even if they are gold, and the fact that the majority is the taker does not alter the morality of the matter. Mr. Mill's suggestion as to the right of the State to the unearned increment of landed property, which Mr. Labouchere may quote, was a totally different one, he alleging, not that the State had a right to take such increment because the owner possessed too much, but because he was not rightfully owner at all. In practice, Mr. Mill's scheme will not work, first, because nobody could get at the unearned increment—say, of Consols, which is so enriching Consols-owners just now—without destroying property altogether; and, secondly, because the State which takes the unearned increment of value must be responsible for unearned decrement in value, which just now, as regards land, would be a ruinous speculation. But morally, Mr. Mill's idea stands on a totally different basis from Mr. Labouchere's, while the latter is even more impracticable. Mr. Labouchere says accumulation would not stop under a tax of fifty per cent., and we dare say he is right.

It would be worth while to heap up Consols, even if they yielded only one and a half per cent., instead of three,—and that would be the difference. But though accumulation would not stop, it would be transferred from country to country. Suppose the confiscating tax to begin at £100,000 Consols, then the man who has £200,000 will put the second hundred thousand in Rentes, instead of Consols, and escape taxation for that half altogether. If he were unscrupulous, he would not return his foreign income; and if he were scrupulous, he would live abroad. That is, we believe, what does happen, under the much more moderate tax levied in Geneva. Of course, the owner of land could be caught; but that would only make the moral wrong worse, for not only would the plunder be confined to the rich, but to the rich in one kind of property. Mr. Labouchere might just as well seize all gold watches, on the plea that pinchbeck was good enough.

But we shall be told that, moral or immoral, wise or foolish, the Democracy will do this. Where is the proof of it? There are a dozen English democracies in the world, all independent for taxing purposes, and not one of them makes any attempt of the kind. The Americans did not do it in the hardest financial throes of their Civil War, but, on the contrary, taxed themselves, their own luxuries, their own incomes, in a manner which positively shocked economists; and are paying their Debt, after being formally asked to sanction partial repudiation. The English Colonies notoriously will bear no income-tax. The French peasantry, in the fullest possession of power, actually make a most severe tax on the transfer of their own patches of soil the sheet-anchor of their finance. That a democracy may fall into a currency craze quite fatal to property is, of course, conceivable, for we know grave men who cannot be taught that inconvertible paper is not a trifle better than cash; and we can conceive of an equal property-tax which would gradually destroy all wealth, for if Finlay is right, that happened under the Treasury laws of Rome. But a blunder of that kind is not the same as plunder, any more than the Moravian view of property is the same as the Anarchists' view. So far as we can see, Democracies respect property more than Monarchies do—for the Hapsburgs levied taxes in Venice equal to a fifteen-shilling income-tax—and hesitate even to attack excessive accumulation by a peremptory distribution at death. Is New York not a Democracy? Yet Mr. Vanderbilt pays no separate income-tax, and may bequeath his enormous superfluity to one son, if he has a dozen, just as his father did before him. That in England, the land of extreme disparities, where the multitude have nothing and a few too much, Democracy will try to produce more equality by a wider division of fortunes after death, we think probable—though the difficulties are great, and some of them ingrained in the temper of the people—but that it will try to remedy disparities by stealing for its own benefit, we see no evidence whatever. If Mr. Labouchere is right, and the first object of Democracy is to make itself comfortable on unearned gain, he has produced an argument for resisting that system of government of which the bitterest French Legitimist might be proud.

SPOILING THE LAKES.

ON Tuesday, Lord Mount Temple gave notice that he would oppose the Second Reading of the Braithwaite and Buttermere Railway Bill. Ordinarily speaking, this is not a course which it is expedient to take with Private Bills. There are few proposals so absolutely and hopelessly vicious, that to hear what can be said in their favour by their promoters is a sheer waste of time. The proposed line from Braithwaite to Buttermere is an exception to this, as to a good many other rules. It will run from the Braithwaite Station, on the Keswick and Cockermouth Railway, across the Vale of Newlands, and then, after skirting the western shore of Derwentwater, will be carried up Borrowdale to the Honister Slate Quarries. To all who are familiar with the district, these are names to conjure with. No more beautiful drive, and no finer walk, can be found among the English Lakes than that which leads from Keswick by Lodore and over the Honister Pass to Buttermere, and thence back to Keswick, by what is known as the “Derwentwater Round.” The line from the Slate Quarries would be carried just above the last-named road, besides crossing it at three places. There are some kinds of scenery to which a railway, apart from its stations and sidings, does little harm. It may be carried to a great extent through deep cuttings or almost continuous tunnels, and be scarcely visible for the larger part of its course. But when a railway is taken along the side of a lake and up a narrow pass, the case is different. It is always full in view, and being in view, it changes the whole character of the landscape. In the great Alpine Passes, the mischief done is bad enough, but it becomes infinitely worse when the scenery it injures is on so small a scale as that of the English Lakes. In Switzerland, Nature is too vast to be easily vulgarised. The avalanche and the landslip are always at hand, to assert her ultimate supremacy; and as one view after another is spoiled by human agency, the lover of solitude, though he has to go further afield in search of the distinctive enjoyment which mountain scenery affords, is still certain of finding it. In the English Lakes, this resource is in a great measure denied him. The vulgarisation of a lake or a pass may be a wholly irreparable loss. If the particular scenery injured has no fellow, its destruction means that the pleasure which it once imparted is no longer within reach. Fortunately, the motive which has carried railways through the Alps is no longer operative in the English Lakes. It cannot be pleaded that the necessities of through communication demand the construction of a line which ends in a slate quarry. The existing provision in that way is large enough for the wants of the country. The traveller has an ample choice of routes between England and Scotland, and he can be set down at any point he likes on the edge of the Lake District, if he wishes to visit it. Nor can it be said that railways are wanted to bring a larger number of people to the scenery. The most common-place or the most indolent of tourists does not want a railway to take him round a lake or up a pass. If he is too lazy or too weak to walk or ride, he has no difficulty in finding carriages on those frequented roads to which those who neither walk nor ride naturally and wisely confine themselves. Consequently, the reason which is ordinarily alleged in favour of the destruction of natural beauty does not apply here. Whatever else the Buttermere and Braithwaite Railway may be wanted to do, it is not needed to introduce visitors to Borrowdale.

The real reason is a remarkably simple one. The proprietors of the Slate Quarries at the upper end of the Honister Pass want to send their slates to market more easily and quickly than they can send them at present. Braithwaite is the nearest point at which they can place them on a railway, and Braithwaite is some eight miles distant. The slates are now taken to the station in carts, and the object of making the proposed line is to enable the slates to be put into the railway trucks as soon as they are out of the quarry. In itself, of course, this is a perfectly legitimate object. Rapidity of carriage is one element of cheapness, and if the Honister slates can be carried from the quarry to their destination at a smaller cost than heretofore, those who want to use them will get them for less money than they now have to pay. But this object is only legitimate in the sense that it would be legitimate for a man living on the north side of St. Paul's Churchyard, to wish that he could get across to the south side without having to go all round the Cathedral. A desire which is innocent enough, so long as the impropriety of gratifying it is admitted, ceases to be innocent from the moment that it is seriously proposed to take means to give effect to it. The proprietors of the Honister Slate Quarries are now in the position of a dweller in St. Paul's Churchyard who should ask leave to run a street through the Cathedral, in order to pass from one side to the other more quickly. They propose to spoil the finest Pass in the English Lakes, in order to save themselves eight miles of carriage by road. The loss is altogether out of proportion to the gain; and what is more, the loss is sustained by the whole nation, while the gain is appropriated by a few quarry-owners. Without the aid of Parliament, the line cannot be made, and it rests, in the first instance, with the House of Lords to say whether a transaction in which the community makes the sacrifice and the individual reaps the benefit, is of a kind to deserve legislative sanction.

In this matter, the local public have been neither silent nor idle. In Manchester, which contributes probably the largest number of visitors to the Lakes, there is a strong feeling against the project, which has found vigorous expression in the newspapers of the city; while at Ambleside a "Derwentwater and Borrowdale Defence Fund" has been formed, as well as a Committee to direct the determined opposition which it is intended to offer to the Bill. The points upon which the address of the Committee dwells happily admit of being stated with great terseness. The Bill "is promoted solely in the interests of the proprietors and lessees of the slate quarry above Buttermere;" it is "for mineral traffic only, and is not projected to serve any public end;" and it will "permanently injure the scenery of the finest lake and valley in England—at once the least spoiled and most visited portion of the Lake District." There are some parts of the country which it is of great local importance to keep uninjured; there are others which cannot be injured without far more than a local loss being incurred. The wild country of Surrey is an instance of the first kind. Its destruction would be a disaster of the first magnitude to Londoners and to the dweller in the tamer districts of South-Eastern England; but it would not affect the people of the Northern towns in the slightest degree. A Manchester or a Sheffield man does not come into Surrey for the refreshment of mind and body; he goes to the Lakes or to the Yorkshire Moors. But the Lakes belong pre-eminently to the second kind of scenery. They are the property, not of the North only, but of all England; and it is for all England to resist every attempt to destroy the seclusion, without which their characteristic charm cannot be maintained. In the present case, there is not, as there was in the Thirlmere project, an object of real public importance to be gained by consenting to the Bill. Even that proposal was objectionable, because the Corporation of Manchester had not shown that the water supply of the city might not be provided from some other source. But supposing that Manchester had not been able to get pure water in any other way, the gain would have been so great, that it might have been considered by some worth the sacrifice even of Thirlmere. Nor is the injury inflicted by the Thirlmere project worthy to be named in the same day with that which would be inflicted by the Braithwaite and Buttermere Railway. The former scheme left the solitude of the district undisturbed, the latter carries a railway right up a pass. The former made a single embankment at the lower end of the lake, the latter furnishes eight miles of embankment and viaduct. In the interest of every one who hopes to visit the English Lakes again, or has any wish that his children may have them to visit, when their turn comes, this mischievous Bill should be resisted. Even if the Lords should read it a second time, there will be no need to be disheartened, for the stages of the Committee and of the third reading will remain; and when these are passed, there will still be the House of Commons to appeal to. But it would be far more satisfactory to have a second reading denied it in the Lords, because the defeat would be more conspicuous, and might consequently deter the future authors of similar proposals from endeavouring to foist them on the country.

THE LITERARY DIFFICULTIES OF TORIES.

IT is impossible to read a publication like the National Review, the new Conservative magazine, without perceiving how heavily all Tories, and especially high Tories, are now handicapped in literature. Some of their strongest ideas hardly admit of literary expression, some are so hopelessly inconsistent with their party action that their spokesmen must keep them in the background, and others, though they allow of the highest literary development, would involve, or it is fancied they would involve, a fatal unpopularity. One grand root of Toryism, for example, perhaps the only root that can be trusted to feed the tree, is Content; and to express content attractively, or amusingly, or at any great length, is difficult indeed. A sigh of repletion is not musical, nor can it, however long-drawn, be made to delight the bystanders. If they have not dined, they are annoyed; and if they have, though they may sympathise, they are not thereby attracted to the sigher. They, too, might like to sigh, but they think of the man who yields audibly to the weakness as something of a pig. The poetry of political content is not extensive, or, at least, of content that covers all classes, and is free from the wish that impairs the Toryism latent in Tennyson's description of England,—that freedom may ever "broaden slowly down from precedent to precedent." Tories think it has got to the bottom, and want to say so. The most contented song in English, Mrs. Hemans's, on "The stately homes of England," and the middle-class homes of England, and the cottage homes of England, has still but few rivals, and rather lacks, if criticised by a discontented mind, the true lyric cry. There may be and has been much eloquence spent in prose over the British Constitution, but somehow, in our day it falls a little dead, and a frequent reiteration of the truth that the Constitution is a "holy thing" soon palls, even if it does not suggest Dickens to the irreverent. To make much of the virtue of content, as the authors of the Church Catechism, for instance, did, is, of course, possible, for there is such a Christian virtue; but content, to be politically useful, must be accompanied in the poor by resignation, and political leaders are unable to preach that. They cannot ask people to "bear the ills they have," however much they wish to, while they are teaching that the first "ill" is a Gladstone Government, and that it ought not to be borne. A fine sermon on Content could, no doubt, be preached in a Magazine, say, by a Rector with private means, or a Peer with culture, or an author who had succeeded beyond his own idea of himself—we heard one the other day descant on the wisdom of the book-buying public—and it would not only be readable, but very good reading for everybody; but then to prove the deduction, that, being content, one ought to scarpify Chamberlain, would require much artistic skill. Repose is the logical inference from content. Much, we fear, will never be made in a literary way of content, though Tennyson did sing with such magical sweetness of the lotos-eaters, sweetness as of a poet from another planet where it is always afternoon. The British Householder has not eaten the lotos, and would resent advice to eat it as tending to laziness, the one vice which he condemns without the faintest soupçon of secret envy. And yet, but for content, what would Toryism be in the world, or who would beits convinced votaries, heartily hating change? And how weakening it must be for the orator or writer always to be evading the thought which, nevertheless, inspires his energies. It is as if the millionaire were condemned always to talk political economy, yet always to evade a reference to the utility and beauty of aggregated capital.

Of another Tory feeling, the fear of change, it is needless to speak, for, though it might produce very fine literature, the active leaders of the party have given it up. Their motto is no longer the grand one of the Barons, "Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari," but the poverty-stricken version, "Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari, Consule Gladstone." The Premier once disposed of, they say they would be for all movement demanded by the people, would be for progress as much as Radicals or Mr. Forwood, and would, with the alteration of only one word, inscribe on their banners Tennyson's embodiment of the democratic idea, "Let the great world swing for ever up the ringing grooves of change." There was literary capability without end in the old idea, as Asiatics who have accepted it as divine, know so well. What more philosophical than evidence of the danger, in a world like this, so full of complexities, so empty of foresight, of removing anything? Who knows which is Indra's brick, or whether the ugly little anomalies in the mortar may not be the hairs which make of water and powdered limestone a cement as durable as Time? What more pathetic than the cry, "Our fathers never did this thing, shall we be wiser than they?" What more poetic than the worship of the past, or, we may add, more effective, for it is in us all, however wild our dreams; and we would back Krapotkine or Patrick Ford to rage, if the railway "for the people" swept through his mother's grave? "As it was, is now, and ever shall be, world without end," is still the most solemn of refrains, and unchangeability, without shadow of turning, still the most supernatural attribute we can assign to God. There was literary foundation enough there, but alas! it has dropped through. Tories dwell no longer on the past, but on a drab and decorous future, to which they say when Gladstone is gone they shall be leisurely advancing, and which is to be to the Radicals' Utopia, what Swinburne's "lilies and languors of virtue" are to the "raptures and roses of vice." We are not glad of their change. Peace be with the old idea, the eventless, happy, leisurely world, where yesterday was and to-morrow will be as to-day, and man grew as the oak, invisibly and in silence, fearing neither sun nor storm. As Proteus has sung, there is "an old wisdom by our world forgot," of which Tories might make much:—

"Children of Shem! Firstborn of Noah's race,
But still forever children; at the door
Of Eden found, unconscious of disgrace,
And loitering on while all are gone before;
Too proud to dig; too careless to be poor;
Taking the gifts of God in thanklessness,
Not rendering aught, nor supplicating more,
Nor arguing with Him when he hides his face.
Yours is the rain and sunshine, and the way
Of an old wisdom by our world forgot,
The courage of a day which knew not death.
Well may we sons of Japhet in dismay
Pause in our vain, mad fight for life and breath, Beholding you. I bow and reason not."

It was a great idea once, and will be again, when Cranbrook has ceased, like a General or a shop-walker, to bellow "Forward!"

and Northcote has left off muttering on the charm of discontent, and the Carlton loses that endless murmur, now heard in its halls, of "Progress, with discretion."

But the worst fate of all is that of the High Tories, for they possess in fullest measure one of the greatest of literary instruments, scorn, and they are afraid to use it. If they had only the courage to tell us how they regard the mob, how they look on the low-born, what they think of cadts confronting grandees, of that sea of mud in motion which Radicals call Democracy, how effective they would be! They would give us bright sentences then, living prose, or it might even be, little as Mr. Lowther looks it, glowing verse. Think what Lord Salisbury let loose would say of Mr. Chamberlain, and how he would say it, and how trenchant that literature would be! We wonder some Peer, with no constituents, no party, and no future—say, for example, Lord Sherbrooke—does not do it, does not pour out his scorn of that plain on which every thistle is a tree, and delight us all by embodying the passion which must be in a thousand souls, as Shakespeare once embodied it,— "Cor. He that will give good words to thee will flatter Beneath abhorring. What would you have, you curs,

That like nor peace nor war? the one affrights you,
The other makes you proud. He that trusts to you,
Where he should find you lions, finds you hares;
Where foxes, geese: you are no surer, no,
Than is the coal of fire upon the ice,
Or hailstone in the sun. Your virtue is
To make him worthy whose offence subdues him
And curse that justice did it. Who deserves greatness Deserves your hate; and your affections are
A sick man's appetite, who desires most that Which would increase his evil. He that depends Upon your favours swims with fins of lead
And hews down oaks with rushes. Hang ye! Trust ye?
With every minute you do change a mind,
And call him noble that was now your hate,
Him vile that was your garland. What's the matter,
That in these several places of the city
You cry against the noble senate, who,
Under the gods, keep you in awe, which else
Would feed on one another? What's their seeking?"

Cor. You common cry of curs! whose breath I hate
As reek o' the rotten fens, whose loves I prize
As the dead carcasses of unburied men
That do corrupt my air, I banish you;
And here remain with your uncertainty!
Let every feeble rumour shake your hearts!
Your enemies, with nodding of their plumes,
Fan you into despair! Have the power still
To banish your defenders; till at length
Your ignorance, which finds not till it feels,
Making not reservation of yourselves,
Still your own foes, deliver you as most Abated captives to some nation
That won you without blows! Despising,
For you, the city, thus I turn my back:
There is a world elsewhere."

We wonder, if any man dare now utter Toryism in that honest form, what his political fate would be. Remembering Mr. Lowe's, we are not quite sure, and there are men from whom more would be borne than from Mr. Lowe. The mass loves sympathy, but has still something of the feeling embodied in Macaulay's line, "Rome may well bear the pride of him of whom herself is proud," and sometimes, when raging before the hustings, respects vitriolic scorn. At all events, we might have vigorous literature from that side, but for the hand-capping. The leaders are afraid to speak out scorn, lest they should lose votes; and their journalists, however sincerely Conservative, do not feel like Coriolanus, or hate the Plebs so hard, or think that only in the Patrician can political virtue be embodied. It is embodied in themselves also, and the reflection leads to others which have a weakening effect. There is somewhere in London, we believe, a journalist left who is a true Old Whig, and could pour out Whiggery with force; but then he is not a Grey, and has a sense of humour which would disable him from playing Coriolanus. Austin would satirise him, Tennyson would sketch him, Courthope would make a parody on him, Carroll might put him in a new "Hunting of the Snark,"—and the end would be laughter, and not influence. The Tories have fallen truly on evil literary days, and as yet we do not see that the keen weapon which Lord Carnarvon says must replace alike sabre and bludgeon, Addison's finely-pointed rapier of gentle wit, comes readily to their hands. Perhaps it will; but as yet, the ownership rests, if with any one, with Lord Granville; and he directs it, too infrequently but yet with rare skill, against the men who, had they but the courage of their convictions, should be the masters of scorn. After all, is any change so great as this, which no man made,—that the Coriolanus of to-day pours scorn in the name of King Demos, and withers the Patriciat away?

“JOHN INGLESANT” ON HUMOUR.

MR. SHORTHOUSE, in the fine piece of English which he has contributed to Macmillan's Magazine on “The Humorous in Literature,” has, as we understand him, tried to make out a case for the necessarily close connection between the source of laughter and the source of tears, in all true humour. He holds, apparently, that “the condition of true humorous thought is individuality,” and that you can never get close to the sources of any individuality without getting at the common source of what is ridiculous and what is pathetic, without a blending of that which stirs laughter and that which stirs tears. Now, we have no objection at all to the doctrine that one of the finest and highest kinds of humour does play on the involutions of these blending chords of bright and sad feeling, and awaken them in the closest connection, and therefore in the most vivid contrast. Undoubtedly, this is one of the highest kinds of humour, and we entirely agree with Mr. Shorthouse that if Jean Paul Richter is to be taken as the type of perfect humour, it is in feats of humour of this particular kind that the perfect humour has manifested itself. But what we do not see our way to conceding is that true humour is limited to humour of this special kind, which we understand to be the drift and tendency, though not the express assertion, of Mr. Shorthouse's essay. He does not say that Dickens is no true humorist because his pathos often rings false; but that is what we should certainly gather as the general meaning of his essay, which appears to insist on “the tremulous change from the comic to the pathetic” which is so perfectly distinctive of Thackeray as well as of Jean Paul Richter, as the most important of all the criteria of humour. This is where we cannot follow Mr. Shorthouse. It seems to us that this, though a criterion of one of the noblest species of humour, is a criterion of one species only. Humour consists in all variations played on the feelings by the subtle caprice of man, and appears just as truly in Charles Lamb's sudden answer to the omnibus conductor's question,—“All full inside?” “Well, I can't answer for the other gentlemen, but that last apple-dumpling at Mrs. Gilman's did the business for me;” or in Sydney Smith's grave question to the doctor who ordered him “To take a walk on an empty stomach,” “On whose?”—as in Thackeray's curious power of “tremulous change from the comic to the pathetic.” It is the power of suddenly and grotesquely varying the tone of feeling struck, in which the humorist's skill consists. And that may be done as effectually where neither of the chords of feeling brought into sudden contrast is pathetic, as where one of them is pathetic and one comic. When the omnibus conductor's question was accepted gravely by Lamb as a thoughtful inquiry as to the sufficiency of his own last meal, there was no pathetic chord touched at all,—nor was the touching of any such chord possible,—and yet no one could deny that it played such a variation on the feelings with which the conductor's common-place business inquiry had been heard, as to be in the very truest sense humorous. Indeed, if we understand Mr. Shorthouse's drift aright, it would shut out England's greatest humorist, Dickens, from the ranks of great humorists altogether. The cases in which Dickens's humour displays itself by suddenly passing from the livelier to the sadder phases of human things, are comparatively very rare, and, even when they occur, are not by any means the best specimen of Dickens's humour. His great power was not, like Thackeray's, one of “tremulous change” from the lively to the sad, but rather, like Shakespeare's, the power of throwing a strong light on the mingled self-importance and emptiness of men, till it seems as if your whole mind were lost in amazement that emptiness can be so self-important, and self-importance so empty. Shakespeare's Malvolio, his Polonius, his Dogberry, and a hundred other portraits of that class, are surely great feats of humour, whatever we may think of Dickens's great creations,—which, to our mind, are even greater feats of humour of the same general type,—but they are not feats of humour of the kind which Mr. Shorthouse selects as the most characteristic of the quality; and to tell the truth, we doubt whether Shakespeare often does touch the common source of laughter and tears after the fashion which seems to Mr. Shorthouse the very highest. Mr. Shorthouse speaks of the wonderful humour in Hamlet; and, of course, strong contrasts,—like that, for instance, between the gravedigger's coarse and jovial indifference to death, and the grief felt for the hapless Ophelia,—are the sort of contrasts to which he alludes; but there is no “tremulousness” in that transition; it is not the gradual and finely-shaded passing from one feeling to the other, such as Mr. Shorthouse very justly admires in Thackeray, in which Shakespeare excels. On the contrary, he likes to introduce the contrast in the sharpest possible form, to give us Hamlet musing over the skull of Yorick, and suggesting that the dust of Caesar may be used eventually to stop a bung-hole. If this sharply-drawn intellectual contrast between the smallness and the greatness of human nature be what Mr. Shorthouse means by the highest humour, we admit that Shakespeare, as a humorist, comes up to the standard of Mr. Shorthouse. But we hold that these sharply-drawn intellectual contrasts between the greatness and the littleness of life, such as Hamlet, for instance, so often indulges in, and such as Shakespeare still more often effects by bringing purely comical natures into close contact with grand natures, are not efforts of humour, properly so called, at all, because they are all results of explicit intention,—all intellectual contrasts,—from which the capricious shimmer of humorous feeling is conspicuously absent. Mr. Shorthouse refers all Pope's, and apparently most of Swift's, achievements in this field to the sphere of wit, rather than of humour,—and quite rightly at least in the case of Pope,—we suppose because it is so evidently the spell of the intellect, and not of the feelings, by which these achievements are effected. But surely it is the spell of the intellect with which Hamlet works wonders, when he muses over the skull of Yorick, or in the soliloquy, “What a piece of work is man!” and it is only by the device of referring everything of special individuality in man to his humour, that Mr. Shorthouse contrives to suggest that Hamlet's finest soliloquies are the soliloquies of a great humorist, rather than the soliloquies of a great thinker. We should have preferred to say that Shakespeare, as a humorist, is seen not in such great creations as Hamlet, but in what are distinctly recognised as his comic characters, and that the kind of humour which Mr. Shorthouse most admires, though it is often found in Shakespeare, as, for instance, in the description of the death of Falstaff, is not particularly Shakespearian,—that that tremulous shimmer amongst subtly contrasted and yet subtly allied feelings which was so wonderful in Thackeray, is not by any means one of the most characteristic moods of Shakespeare.

The difficulty of Mr. Shorthouse's theory of humour,—that it is coextensive with individuality, and shows itself especially by commanding at once the source of smiles and the source of tears—comes out especially in the close of his essay, when he tries to show that the Gospels, in touching the deepest springs of human nature, must also give examples of the deepest humour of which man is capable. But the truth is, we think, that humour is not coextensive with human nature, that it is coextensive only with the unexpected and baffling caprices of human feeling; and that where the predominating feeling is all of one kind, and that the kind which enhances to the highest degree the importance of every word and act of human beings, the element of humour is excluded, simply because one of the terms of contrast is banished from the field. In the Gospels, where God becomes man, all that was small and insignificant in man seems to vanish away beneath the glance of the incarnate Divinity, and it is almost as impossible to find room for those grotesque interlacings of opposite feelings on which humour depends, as it is to find room for the contrasts between light and shade under the burning sun of an Arabian noon. Mr. Shorthouse brings before us, in a passage of much beauty, the parable of the Prodigal Son, appealing to his readers whether, in its fine and unexpected transitions from joy to sorrow, and from sorrow back to joy, there is not all the reality of true humour. We cannot say that he succeeds in carrying the least conviction to our minds. It is not in the mere blending of joy and sorrow,—joy on one account, and sorrow on another,—that we should ever find an illustration of humour. When the humorist plays upon the blending chords of joy and sorrow, he does so, in a manner to bewilder us, to confuse us as to whether we are glad or sorry at the same thing, to make us uncertain as to our real feeling, and disposed to confound the pathetic with the absurd. That is not in the least the way in which joy and sorrow are blended in the parable of the Prodigal Son. The joy is unmixed, so far as the penitent Prodigal is concerned; the sorrow caused by the jealousy of the Elder Brother is unmixed also; but the two feelings are perfectly consistent, and in no sense bewildering. The magic of the humorist consists in producing a certain bewilderment of feeling, in so rapidly changing from one current of feeling to another, that you do not recognise clearly the true significance of your own emotions; and of this there is no trace in the story of the Prodigal Son, nor, so far as we know, in the Gospels at all. One mighty chord vibrates too loud in the Gospels to be confounded with any other chord, and in this perfect absence of confusion of feeling, the complete absence of humour from the Gospels is almost necessarily involved.

BOOKSELLERS' GRIEVANCES.

A REVOLUTION has been slowly, but steadily, taking place in the Bookselling Trade of this country. The symptoms of the disease have long been evident to those interested in the matter of Books, and even outsiders can scarcely have failed to notice that something unusual was occurring in the shops of the booksellers. In the country, the bookseller pure and simple has almost ceased to exist; and when one does find a shop more or less devoted to the sale of books, it nearly always sells extraneous articles as well. Fancy goods, stationery, pictures, artists' colours, umbrellas, walking-sticks, and even tea, china, or stockings, are a few of the articles, out of a host of others, that may be obtained now-a-days at many a country or suburban bookseller's shop. This used not to be the case. The old-fashioned bookseller stuck to books. He knew his business, and he knew something, at least, of the books he sold. He was frequently a well-educated and a well-read man. His customers could rely upon his opinion as to the merits of rival works, and could depend upon his advice as to the best books to obtain in any particular line of thought. If he happened to read and approve of a work, it was a lucky thing for the author. For instance, we find a member of the fraternity writing that of one author's books alone, by reading, recommending, and pushing, he sold over 20,000 copies to his customers, and those, too, mostly retail. The modern bookseller apparently, to use a simile of one of the trade, deals with books as bricklayers with bricks, and knows no more of the nature of the books handled than if they actually were so many bricks.

For some time past, the pages of the Bookseller—the recognised organ of this particular trade—have been full of the most desponding and comfortless letters we ever had the misfortune to come across. There is no hope, no cheerfulness, no light,—in short, universal gloom would appear to be rapidly enveloping the sellers of books in every part of Great Britain. They seem unable to make the least practical suggestion to remedy the existing state of things. The propositions which they do bring forward are singularly old-fashioned, and, we are confident, would be quite futile, if carried into effect. For example, one of the suggestions is to boycott those publishers who supply books to any but booksellers. But suppose, for instance, the publisher of Tennyson's poems were among the number ostracised. Then the only effect of this ingenious arrangement would be that, as the public must be supplied through some channel or other with the Laureate's works, the butcher or the baker would find it advantageous to keep a stock of these and other books tabooed by the booksellers. In short, so far from such a proceeding benefitting the booksellers, they would find this course of action operating in still further driving trade from their doors and diminishing their turn-over. A perusal of the correspondence referred to leaves the impression upon the mind that, at present, the booksellers are in the stage of sitting and bewailing their loss, rather than cheerily seeking how to redress their grievances. The burden of the mournful wail now ascending from the pages of the Bookseller is that Bookselling, as a separate trade, has disappeared; that no living can be gained by selling new books. Retail profits have been gradually lessening, until profit has become a thing of the past. A bookseller writes:—"I could without difficulty prove that the last hundred thousand pounds' worth of new books that I sold, before I relinquished business, did not produce sufficient profit to pay its quota of working expenses." Doubtless, many causes have been in operation to produce this sad state of things among the booksellers at the present moment. Several of these may be readily understood. Every book has a fixed published price, and this each buyer of books can ascertain for himself, through the advertisements in the journals, or through the publisher's catalogue. And books, like all other commodities, are naturally purchased by the consumer in the cheapest market. The bookseller who allows twopence in the shilling discount cannot blame his customers, if they leave him, and purchase where they obtain a discount of threepence in the shilling. At the same time, we greatly sympathise with the bookseller. He does not stand on the same ground as, for instance, the glover. The goods dealt in by the latter, having no fixed price, are sold merely according to the style of the neighbourhood in which his business is situated and the wealth of his customers. Few persons can estimate the relative values of gloves seen at different shops. But every one knows where new books can be obtained for the least money. The style of shop or the respectability of the locality matters not, the book is identically the same whether purchased in Mayfair or in Whitechapel. Much more on a par with the bookseller is the retailer of patent medicines and proprietary articles (as they are called), who, equally with the former—and we mention it to show that in this particular the bookseller is not alone unhappy—is now feeling the pressure of the times. The Co-operative Stores and immense universal-supply concerns to be found in most of our large towns are rapidly absorbing the trade of the small retailers, and when the Parcel Post comes in—which will enable people in the remotest parts of the country to buy direct in the cheapest market—things will, we fear, be even still worse for the small shops, whether they be in the country or in the town. In every trade the tendency of the day is more and more to cut down the middle-men who stand between the consumer and the producer or the manufacturer, as the case may be. To illustrate the nature of the competition which has for years past been raging among the booksellers, an example may be given. The published price of a book is, say, five shillings, and its trade price will then be three shillings and sevenpence. If the bookseller be a "twopenny-discount man," he makes a gain of sevenpence by selling a copy of the work; but then the "threepenny-discount man" cuts him out, and sells it with a profit of only twopence. The margin of profit in the latter case is clearly insufficient to cover the expenses of ordering from the publisher, collecting, and perhaps delivering at the private house of the customer. There is a curious old custom in the wholesale bookselling trade, which is to give thirteen copies of a work for the payment of twelve. Thus, to continue the case above mentioned, if the bookseller cares to speculate to the value of a dozen copies of the work, he gets thirteen for the same money; supposing he is a "threepenny-discount man," he will make a profit of five shillings and ninepence when all thirteen copies have been disposed of. But then he runs a risk of some of the copies remaining on his shelves for a considerable time, which would turn this chance of gain into loss.

The present discount system of retailing books is not really advantageous to the public, because it inclines the booksellers to keep in stock only indifferent and job lots of books, which they obtain from the publishers on lower than the normal terms, and which can consequently be sold to the public with more profit than the ordinary run of good and standard works. For it must be borne in mind that the great proportion of the public only buy the books which they see displayed in shops. A book is wanted for a gift, a prize, a wedding present, or that treats of some foreign country, or may be, simply for amusement; and the customer will, in nine cases out of ten, purchase that work which is most strongly recommended by the shopman. Naturally, the latter only recommends those books which are upon the shelves of the shop. If, therefore, the book stocks of the country continue for any length of time to be largely made up of inferior works, the bad results will sooner or later be apparent. This twenty-five-per-cent. system does not, for another reason, react to the benefit of the public. The publisher prices his books considerably higher than he would do, were it not in existence. This absurd custom has a tendency, therefore, to keep the price of books high, and to prevent those vast benefits which accrue to a country where the best books are within the reach of the masses. The United States are far better off in this respect than Great Britain. Why should not the published price of a book which can be purchased for ninepence, be ninepence, instead of a shilling, as it is at present? The only answer is that a few country shops can still get tenpence for the volume, and the railway book-stalls a shilling. But the places where anything higher than ninepence for a shilling book can be obtained are very rapidly decreasing in number. The general public rightly regard the published price as an absurd anomaly. It is to be hoped that at least one outcome of the present agitation will be that publishers and booksellers will see their way to more closely approximating the selling and published prices.

But the booksellers have other grievances. They complain that drapers and certain other tradesmen are combining book-selling with their businesses, and underselling them; and they blame the publishers for supplying any persons except booksellers proper. But publishers must somehow or other dispose of their wares; and the public, somehow or other, will obtain the books they require. The trade of his customer matters not so much to the publisher, as the fact that his books are sold. The public, finding more or less difficulty in obtaining what they require from the bookseller proper, turn to those quarters where their wants are most easily and cheaply supplied. The remedy for this grievance lies with the booksellers themselves. Let them more carefully select the books they place upon their shelves, and endeavour to obtain at least some idea of the scope, style, and ability of the various authors whose books they are constantly handling. If the knowledge of their trade thus becomes more of a reality than it is at present, the public will not be slow in discovering the fact, and will be only too ready to desert the draper, who cannot possibly give the same care and attention to what is merely an offshoot of his legitimate business, and to return to those who, having studied their wants, know exactly how best to supply them. The booksellers apparently have not sufficiently moved with the times, and have been trusting to the past and conservative customs of their trade, rather than keeping pace with modern requirements. That they are now waking up is evident; but we should recommend them also to take courage, for they seem to us to be showing more despondency than is called for by the situation.

But there is another grievance. The bookseller is grumbling because schoolmasters, who consume large quantities of certain classes of books, are in the habit of buying direct from the publishers. The bookseller seems to forget that there is great competition among the publishers, and that many school-books of rival publishers are, in the eyes of the schoolmaster, equal in merit. Were the publisher to refuse to supply a schoolmaster, as likely as not the schoolmaster would obtain the books he required from another publisher.

In short, these matters connected with the book trade which are intruding themselves upon the public notice are purely and simply questions of supply and demand. It is the old, old story, that is continually being retold. Publishers have been printing larger numbers of books than the legitimate demand has required, and in order to dispose of the heavy stocks that they have held from year to year, have been offering larger discounts than have been customary in the trade, to any one who would buy their books in moderate quantities. Drapers and others, as well as booksellers, have availed themselves of these offers, and then the natural result follows. A fierce competition ensues among the various retailers, and it is not long before the lowest possible selling price is reached. An outcry is then raised, as the profits, in spite of the tempting discounts given by the publisher, are found in practice to be, after all, extremely small. But another and a deeper cause for this over-production has also been in operation. The printers have been busily competing amongst themselves for the printing of books, and as their prices get lower and lower, so does the publisher's thirst for the production of books increase.

Publishers will do well in the future to look more carefully to the demand than they have been doing. No book should be published that does not meet a distinct want of the day, and publishers should, as much as possible, abstain from making books, like the famous razors, simply and solely for selling. There should be a reason for, a distinct object in, each work that is published. Though publishers may at one time be able to force upon the market, by means of tempting discounts, a vast amount of literature which they could not dispose of otherwise, the system cannot eventually react to their benefit. The booksellers, and others, who so warmly met their large discount advances, will come to distrust the innovation, and refuse to purchase books negotiated on such terms.

It is evident that just now the natural balance of supply and demand in the book-selling trade is disturbed, but the public may take comfort, in the fact that in all other trades there have been similarly stormy periods. We believe that the agitation will shortly settle down, and the storm which has been raised render the book-selling atmosphere clearer and healthier than it has been for some time past. Whether the phoenix that will arise from the ashes of the conflict will be the bookseller proper, or the bookseller who combines his business with some other trade, is another question. Be this as it may, we cannot help pointing out to the booksellers the futility of attempting—as is now seriously proposed by several writers in the Bookseller—to make the trade of Bookselling a close guild. Anything approaching to protection of this kind will never be suffered by the public in this country. Besides, “Rings” to keep up prices always break down; and restrictions, such as some booksellers would apparently like to see placed upon the sale of books, are as likely to be imposed as the Corn Laws to be reimposed.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE PROSPECTS OF ENGLISH LAND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE “SPECTATOR.”]

SIR,—In connection with the candid and very informing letter of Mr. Bullock-Hall on this subject, the following facts may not be without interest and suggestiveness, with regard to the opinion that peasant-farming can only be successful in fruit and dairy districts, and that, as a consequence, a large proportion of the United Kingdom, particularly in the arable districts, is unfitted for la petite culture, and the cultivation of the soil by its proprietors. The case of Denmark, with a climate and soil certainly not superior to our own, is especially interesting, and the particulars to be gleaned from Mr. Jenkins's Report to the Royal Commissioners on the agriculture of that country will richly repay careful study. During the last twenty years, a vast change in the system of farming in Denmark has been made, and the number of small and large freehold farmers has greatly increased. Great attention has been given to dairying in connection with the profitable working of arable land, and the best butter in Denmark is now obtained from land which is all arable, and being despatched chiefly to England, frequently sells during the winter months at a higher price than our home-made produce.

We yearly import butter of the value of ten million pounds sterling, and if some such plans as those which have been adopted in Denmark (and which Mr. Jenkins explains very fully) were practised in this country, it is evident there would not be far to seek for a good market. Mr. Bullock-Hall remarks that in the late disastrous seasons had our soil been greatly subdivided, the ruin of the peasant-cultivators must have been very general. In the Report to the Royal Commissioners on the Agriculture of Belgium, there are given a series of questions, addressed to twenty-eight land-owners and tenant-farmers, distributed all over the country, who may, says the Assistant-Commissioner, “be regarded as so many independent witnesses, with reference to the present state of agriculture in the Netherlands.” Eight series of questions were addressed to each of these gentlemen, and in reply to the inquiry,—“Have the large or small farmers suffered most from foreign competition and bad seasons?”—of the twenty-eight replies, sixteen state that the large farmers have suffered most; four, that the small farmers are the greatest sufferers; and eight make no special allusion to the subject. Further, replying to the question, “What class of farms is, on the whole, the best cultivated?” thirteen of these “independent witnesses” reply in favour of the small farms; eleven in favour of the large farms, and four make no reply. A question as to the average size of farms elicits the following:—

Farms from 6 to 15 acres prevail in 8 districts.
“ 20 to 50 “ “ “	7 “
“ 50 to 100 “ “ “	4 “
“ over 100 “ “ “	7 “

Such facts as the foregoing are the alphabet, so to speak, of politicians and social reformers abroad, and, as Mr. Kay has acutely remarked, no Government in France, Switzerland, Norway, Germany, Belgium, the Channel Islands, the United States, or in a less degree in Italy, Spain, Russia, and Hungary, to say nothing of our own colonies, would have the smallest chance of success, were it courageous or fool-hardy enough to attempt to reimpose the feudal laws which fetter the land of the United Kingdom.

La petite culture is a lost art in England. There can be no hope of its discovery by means of philanthropic associations and dilettante coddling of the peasant-proprietor. The one point to be kept steadily in view by land-law reformers is the abolition of the power of settlement of land. The chief inducement to the purchase of a great landed estate being thus removed, the soil of the United Kingdom, as of other countries, will naturally be chiefly sought after and purchased by those who mean to get a living by working upon it, and whether in large or small farms, there will be room for proprietors of every grade; and only in this, combined with a real measure of "compensation" for those who are tenants, can there be any hope for the solid prosperity of the agriculture of the United Kingdom.—I am, Sir, &c.,

FREDERIC IMPEY.

MR. GLADSTONE AND HIS CHURCH PATRONAGE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I am surprised both at the attack and the defence. So far from deserving censure, Mr. Gladstone deserves the highest praise, for having appointed men to important offices in the Church without regard to their political opinions. There is no need to excuse him for acting nobly. Clergymen may take opposite sides in politics, and yet be equally men of learning and ability, of blameless life and earnest devotion to their duties. Why should their advancement depend not on recognised merit, but on their adherence to a party? Lord Beaconsfield did not hesitate to nominate one of Mr. Gladstone's warmest and most active supporters for a Bishopric. I should be sorry to think that Mr. Gladstone had less generosity.

It is high time, surely, that it should be acknowledged on both sides that a man's fitness to be a Bishop, or, let me add, to be a Judge, does not depend on party considerations. It may be said, of course, that Bishops have votes in the House of Lords, and that a Minister is bound to consider this in his appointments. The best answer to such an objection is to be found in the fact that Bishops, with rare exceptions, abstain from voting on questions of party politics. On grave questions of national concern, questions in which religion and morality are at stake, Bishops and clergymen, like the prophets of old, are bound to utter their convictions, and if the occasion arises, record their votes. They may oppose or they may be in favour of the policy of the Government, but they speak and act on conviction, as religious men, and not merely as politicians. It would be every way disastrous to make their advancement turn on their votes or their opinions. Mr. Gladstone has shown that he is above such considerations. He has shown that he can recognise merit in men of different political creeds. Let us hope that he will also show that he can recognise merit in all theological parties within the Church. At present, he has favoured one above the rest, and left another conspicuously out in the cold.—I am, Sir, &c., DECANUS.

[We entirely agree with our correspondent. But the remark which gave rise to this correspondence was quite consistent with his letter. What we did say was this, that if any criticism could be passed on Mr. Gladstone's ecclesiastical appointments, it is this, that he is so afraid of appearing to appoint from political motives, that devoted clergymen probably lose, instead of gaining, in the chance of promotion by happening to be strong Liberals. And this is, we believe, almost the truth.—Ed. Spectator.]

PROMOTION OF LIBERAL CLERGY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your correspondent, "E. V. H.," has surely missed the point of your observations on the Ecclesiastical appointments of the Premier. You were replying, if I remember rightly, to the accusation of the Daily News, that Mr. Gladstone gave more than their share to the High-Church Clergy. You asserted, on the contrary, that the Liberal High-Church Clergy seemed to have no chance at all with the present Government; and you instanced Dr. Liddon.

Your correspondent gives a list of Mr. Gladstone's Liberal appointments. In that list there is only one decided High Churchman. Of the rest, most are Broad Churchmen, one is Broad Church with High-Church sympathies, two are Low Churchmen, and the rest are colourless.

What, moreover, is your correspondent's criterion for a Liberal? A Liberalism which is so carefully concealed that it never connects itself with the Liberal party on crucial questions is a Liberalism which, in my opinion, is not worth much. The Dean of Wells, and one or two more of the names on your correspondent's list, took a prominent and useful part in the controversy on the Eastern Question (to take a recent example).

But I do not remember the names of Dr. Barry or Canon Rowse and Boyd Carpenter in that connection.

I am not complaining of Mr. Gladstone's appointments. On the whole, I think them very good appointments. I wish merely to point out that your remarks on the subject are justified by facts.—I am, Sir, &c.,

GOLD APPRECIATION AND FARM RENTALS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The article in last week's Spectator on Mr. Goschen's theory as to the relation between the alleged appreciation of gold and the farmers' difficulties omits certain considerations which, I venture to urge, are necessary for a proper estimate of the value of Mr. Goschen's theory. Adopting the assumption which, for the sake of argument, is made in your article—that the value of gold is appreciated 20 per cent.—the effect upon farmers would be, as to those whose rents were fixed before the rise in gold value, a real increase of 20 per cent. in their rent; and as to the others, whose rent was fixed since this rise, the effect would be nil. If rents were diminished by the same percentage as gold is appreciated, both farmer and landlord would be in no worse position than they were before this rise in gold value, for the simple reason that the purchasing power of the farmer's net income and the landlord's rent would be increased by a like percentage. If the value of farm produce has, in consequence of the appreciation of gold, fallen 20 per cent., so likewise must have fallen the amount of cultivation expenses, and so also must the farmer's net income have increased 20 per cent. in purchasing power. Money rents must, by the natural laws of competition, rapidly come into adjustment with any appreciation in the value of gold; but such appreciation, operating equally on both sides of an account, cannot diminish the real net income of the farmers, nor the real rent of the landlords. If farmers or landlords are in any worse position after the rise in gold value than they were before, their difficulties must be due to other causes than gold appreciation.—I am, Sir, &c.,

W. P. B. S.

[Two great "expenses of cultivation" do not decrease. One, the greatest, is the price of labour; and the other is taxation. Nothing, in fact, has decreased, except rent where leases have expired, and the cost of seed-corn. Our correspondent forgets that a farmer alone among tradesmen has an extra reason for yielding to a demand for high rent. When he throws up his farm, he throws up the home, probably, of his whole life. We have ourselves known men bear impossible rents, rents the soil could not yield, rather than do it. The farmer, moreover, is always hoping for higher prices, and does not see that if they have fallen through the appreciation of gold, his hope is vain.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE SPIRIT DUTIES AND FINANCIAL REFORM.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your reference last Saturday to the deputation from the Financial Reform Association, you say that they "acknowledged that their ultimate object was to abolish all indirect taxation in favour of direct, and that they included the liquor duties in indirect taxes,—this latter, we imagine, being a new departure." This sentence fully expresses the views of Mr. Muspratt, who presented the memorial; but it was brought out by a question from Mr. Childers, after Mr. Muspratt had finished his speech. In thanking Mr. Childers for receiving the deputation, I was careful to state that Mr. Muspratt spoke for himself only, and not for the whole, and that the large majority of those present were not prepared to advocate the abolition of the duties on intoxicating liquors.—I am, Sir, &c.,

SIGHT AND SUNLIGHT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—With reference to the sight of Orientals living in a climate possessing a bright sun and a glaring soil, I may instance what I myself observed in the Punjab. A Sikh who often accompanied me snipe and duck-shooting, astounded me by his keenness of sight. I have excellent sight myself, and can, at the age of fifty, read the smallest print of the eyesight-test-tables far beyond the prescribed distance; but the impression I gathered then was that this man's sight was to my own in the proportion of an ordinary opera glass to ordinary sight. On one occasion, he followed with his eyes a wounded wild duck, as it disappeared in the hot haze, so long after it was lost to my view, that had he not actually picked it up, as well as announced its fall, I should have deemed it still being visible to him incredible. I have always regretted that I did not pace the distance, which was astonishing.—I am, Sir, &c.,

MR. ROMANES ON ANIMAL INTELLIGENCE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Having just returned from Florence, I write, in the first instance, to thank your reviewer for supplying, as a result of his further inquiry into the subject, additional evidence against his original statement concerning the incubating habits of ostriches. From the account which the Superintendent at the Zoological Gardens at Florence gave me of the process, it is impossible to question that the female bird takes part in it. I have, however, to object to your reviewer's assertion that I based my correct statement of fact upon "the traditional impression of opinion." Mr. Biggar's evidence, on which I relied, is first-hand, and did not "rest simply on a survival of the old belief," as your reviewer may satisfy himself, by referring to an article on ostrich-farming in the January number of the Century, which is written by Mr. Biggar, and describes still more in detail the incubating habits of the female bird.

Concerning the woodpecker, I have only to remark that in my search for the authorities on which your reviewer relied, I encountered the quotations which he now supplies. But it is evident that our ideas as to what constitutes, to use his words, "the essential difference between evidence" as good or bad are here, as elsewhere, in hopeless disagreement. For, to my mind, it is no evidence at all that a green woodpecker does not remove its chips, to be told, by an accumulation of authority, that a black woodpecker does not do so; one might just as well say that a tumbler pigeon does not tumble, because a carrier pigeon does not do so. Therefore, at best, the question with regard to the green woodpecker must be considered doubtful. In my book, I gave Couch's statement expressly on Couch's authority; and in subsequent editions, I shall continue to do so, adding merely that it is disputed both by Mr. Harley and by Yarrell's editor.—I am, Sir, &c.,

GEORGE J. ROMANES.

[Mr. Romanes has had a most unreasonable amount of space already, and though we do not grudge him the last word, he should, for his own sake, try to mortify his own excessive craving for that luxury of controversy.—ED. Spectator.]

BOOKS.

WE have written so often of Lord Lawrence, that this biography, which tells us nothing new, though it justifies and solidifies many previous convictions, interests us rather for itself as a work, than for its subject. Mr. Bosworth Smith has in the main done his work excellently well. He has reduced his immense and, we dare say, rather intractable mass of materials—piles of letters, memoranda, and minutes—into a regular and quite readable biography, in which the figure of his hero is never lost amid the profusion of historical and official details. His conception of that figure, too, is, so far as we can judge, exactly true. The strong, masterful North Irishman, with his capacity for rule, his indomitable courage, his love of justice, and his rude straightforwardness, is thoroughly well brought out, by a friend who does not forget that under that rough husk was one of the most tender of hearts, a man who, however rugged to the external world, was to those he loved one of the most devoted of friends. There is something almost of pathos in the contrast between the hero of the office, who seemed to all subjects so stern and to all subordinates so exacting, and the man at home, who could not be at rest if his wife were absent from the room ten minutes, and who was the playfellow of all his children. No one who reads Mr. Bosworth Smith's minute narrative will doubt that John Lawrence was a king of men, a man with a royal simplicity of nature, who swayed all who came in contact with him by virtue not of arts but of qualities inherent in himself, who first overawed and then conciliated millions of Asiatics by right of a certain majesty of nature. The public instinct about his character is shown conclusively to have been true, shown so conclusively that we doubt if there will be more discussion about him, if future historians will do any more than describe Lord Lawrence as one of the men whose greatness is beyond question, and needs but little analysis. This effect is produced, moreover, without any of the usual efforts. Nothing, so far as we perceive, is concealed, or softened, or slurred over. Mr. Smith, though enthusiastic for his subject, is not a slave to him, does not deny his hardness or his dominance, or his occasional want of sympathy with those he ruled so well. He does not try to hide his principal defect as a ruler, a proclivity to prejudice about persons—usually well founded, but still prejudice—and he by no means over-exalts his intellectual power. Indeed, we have a fauzy, which we cannot prove without quoting the whole book, that he rather under-rates it, that he does not in his mind do quite justice to that hard, cold, but nearly perfect, sensibleness which in John Lawrence, as in almost all men who have reigned successfully, formed the substratum of the intellectual character. He could always see the proportion of things, the meaning of events, the extent and nature of the resource in his hand. Though a man of marvellous decision, he hated to decide without careful thinking, usually, however, when he had thought, returning to his first impression. For all his simplicity, he was wonderfully difficult to take in,—no native, in particular, ever performed that feat; he was never carried away by enthusiasm; and he had the king's feeling that, after all, the first value of men was as instruments; and that if they were expended for the State,—well, they were very usefully expended. He would on occasion, as in Hodson's case, employ a man in whom he utterly disbelieved; and though Mr. Bosworth Smith repudiates the charge, he could be nearly merciless in using up the men who could be of use, but who did not possess his own iron force. As a rule, Mr. Smith paints the warts faithfully, and the reader who is painstaking can see well for himself where the defects, such as they are, in a most heroic figure are to be sought. The materials, in fact, for a complete and living portrait of Lord Lawrence have been brought together, under most difficult circumstances, with a completeness which we heartily admire.

The single defect of the book is that the materials have not been thoroughly reduced to shape. It is too big, too full of stuff, too well stocked with argument. If we were to say it was verbose, we should be unjust, for Mr. Smith writes well, is never dull, and only occasionally grandiloquent; but there is too much of it, too much in every chapter, as well as in the whole. The sense of proportion is imperfect. Mr. Smith does not clearly see that it is in his great work, and not his little work, that John Lawrence is interesting; that the history of his earlier life requires no details, and might be compressed into fifty pages; that his deeds were the creation of "the Punjab" and the capture of Delhi; that the man is of the kind who comes out most clearly in strong outline, and needs few of the slighter touches. Still less does he need apology. Mr. Smith—quite naturally, considering the controversy about Lord Lawrence which the Tories contrived to raise—thinks him in need of praise, and very often writes as if he were a controversialist, defending his friend against unseen, but powerful, calumniators. That may be, for what we know, the exact truth; but that attitude detracts from the value of the biography, and has, with certain pièces justificatives which should have gone into an appendix, swollen its bulk to an inordinate extent, an extent the more remarkable, because Mr. Smith has unusual self-control, takes no advantage of his opportunities to inflict history on us, and has compressed Lord Lawrence's Viceroyalty as sternly as Carlyle compressed Frederick's civil administration after the Seven Years' War. The bulk is increased by a great many pages like the following, which, if the book reveals either John Lawrence or his surroundings—and it does both—cannot but leave upon the reader an impression of intrusive superfluity:—

"And who was the man who, above all others, had done most towards this result? To whom did all England and all India, while the memory of his deeds was too fresh and the personal sense of deliverance was too vivid to allow of aught but the simple truth being told, agree that our success was chiefly owing? To whom but to the Chief Commissioner of the Punjab, who had fixed those keen, deep-set, grey eyes of his on that one spot from the very moment of the revolt, and had refused to look elsewhere till he had secured and had witnessed its fall? He it was who, ruling the most warlike and, potentially, the most turbulent of Indian provinces, had made it to be the arsenal, the anchor, the recruiting-ground of the whole of India, and holding it in his iron, or rather, I would say, in his easy grasp, had crushed mutiny and disorder wherever it had shown its head, had kept thousands of armed and disarmed Sepoys in hand, had carried on the civil administration of the country, and raised its revenue as though in a time of profound peace, and yet had stripped it of its natural guardians, of the great army which successive Governors-General had thought essential to its security and that of India, had sent regiment after regiment in quick succession to Delhi, and then to take their places, relying on the justice of his rule, had, with prudent audacity, enlisted Sikhs and Punjabis, Afridis and Mohmunda, and representatives of a dozen other wild tribes, till he could boast, and truly boast, that he had called into existence an army of over 30,000 men. The natives of the Punjab generally and the civil and military officers trained in the Lawrence school, no doubt contributed, in their several degrees, nobly towards the general result. But in what chief ruler, we may well ask, did all the best elements of a province ever find so stalwart and so true a personification, in whom were they all so well summed up as was the Punjab in the person of Sir John Lawrence? Alone the Punjab had done the work. Not a man had come from England, or was within four hundred miles of the scene of action, when Delhi fell. With the exception of the small contingent from Meerut, and the help sent by Frere from Scinde, not a man, not a rupee, not a gun, not a beast of burden, had come from the whole of the rest of India to the support of the Delhi Field Force. What wonder, then, that the leading members of the Government of India and of the Government of England, that the chief officers of the army before Delhi, who knew the circumstances best, and the ablest of the subordinates who served under him—in spite of jealousies, and heartburnings, and misconceptions, such as must arise at such a time—all greeted Sir John Lawrence by acclamation as the man who had done more than any other single man to save the Indian Empire?"

All that, be it remarked, is after eight hundred well-filled pages of narrative, showing all that John Lawrence had been and done. The same defect, the defect of the novelist, who says, "See how good my hero is, how noble, and how well understood!" constantly reappears, and with the over-profuseness of the story, injures for the reader what is otherwise both excellent and enjoyable work. We do trust that when the popular edition is called for, Mr. Bosworth Smith himself will compress his own work with a ruthless hand, prune it down unsparingly till it occupies only one volume, in which there shall be scarcely a page of the biographer's reflections. He will find that, as always, "the more the marble wastes, the more the statue grows," and that the figure of his hero will come out still sharper, still more grand, still more attractive to a generation which knew him not.

This reviewer, who has heard more of Lord Lawrence than most men, has heard but four charges against him that were worth one moment's attention. One, a very trumpery one, but incessantly reiterated in India, is that he was a mean man. Mr. Smith, who has evidently heard this also, takes some pains to show that it was not true, and succeeds. Lord Lawrence detested not only waste, official or private, but expenditure on himself; but he could give liberally and ungrudgingly, whenever there was any reason or justification, and was always the one of the family to whom all its members looked for guidance and help in pecuniary affairs. Another charge was, that he benefited by the services of other men, and was, in fact, made by them. There is not throughout his career, as here related, the faintest justification for the charge. Throughout, it is palpable that the true charge lies the other way, that he was from first to last a little too much the master, a little too apt to stipulate, as it were, with those whom he selected that they would always take orders and inspiration from himself. He blamed his servants rather than praised, except when he was writing of them. The third is, that he behaved unfairly to his brother, Sir Henry, a man as much beyond him in genius as below him in efficiency. The general truth as to that story comes out thoroughly in the narrative. Lord Lawrence, essentially a typical Englishman, never mentioned his brother without admitting his superiority, and, when they clashed, sent in a request for his own removal. But Sir Henry was essentially an Irishman, and Lord Lawrence, when under him or alongside him, fretted at his foibles till half his powers were gone. The history of the two countries is in the quarrel, or rather would be, if both countries had been blameless. And finally, it is alleged that, in the height of the struggle for Delhi, Lord Lawrence recommended that, if the day went against us, we should cede Peshawur to the Afghans, retire behind the Indus, and utilise the great garrison of Peshawur, itself a small corps d'armée, for the reconquest of India. That charge is exactly true, and is fully admitted, the only question being whether Lord Lawrence was right or wrong. We believe, notwithstanding the light of subsequent events, that he was not only absolutely right, but that in the contingency suggested, retreat from before Delhi, no other plan could by possibility have been adopted. And one of the most coldly luminous intellects that ever studied English politics from without, the Prince Consort, thought so too, and specially told Lord Lawrence that on that question he had been entirely right.

WILFRED'S WIDOW.*

A THOROUGHLY amusing book, the interest of which carries the reader on through every page of a sufficiently brief story. We must say, however, that we have seldom read a story so lively which is more open to the old criticism that the bad character of the novel is a great deal more interesting than any of the good characters with which it is brought into unfavourable comparison. How is it that "the Author of Mrs. Jerningham's Journal" manages to inspire her readers, without, we think, at all intending to do so, with a sort of terror at the codes of convention, like unto the laws of the Medes and Persians, into which English county life crystallises under the influence of family usages and social etiquettes. Instead of making us feel how worthless the young woman who constitutes the chief interest of this story really is,—and she is worthless,—the author of Mrs. Jerningham's Journal manages to inspire us with a very considerable amount of sympathy for her, and to make us feel a shade of something like contempt for the quite too innocent young ladies on whom she imposes so completely, and, so far as her own character goes, so involuntarily. We are aware that our author means to inspire us with the feeling that the decent conventions of English county life are nothing but the outworks, as it were, of the inward humility and receptiveness of a Christian spirit, and that the wildness and waywardness of her adventures are in the same way meant to be the counterparts of those moral qualities which resent discipline from above, and exist only to win distractions and enjoyments for the possessor of them. Somehow, however, she hardly succeeds in conveying this impression adequately to her readers' minds. It is not too much to say that Constance and Ally, with their final assumption that there is no life at all except the life of the domestic and religious affections, and their utter want of insight into those aspects of human nature which do not depend on the affections for their satisfaction but which crave more vivid external interests, rather incline us to apologise for the adventures, than to blame her as she deserves; and we suspect even that the authoress herself has a half-suppressed sympathy with her self-caged wild bird, or she would hardly be able to describe the delight of her first escape from the conventions of a well-bred county-circle with such vivid and almost irresistible force:—

"She sprang into an empty first-class carriage as gay as a lark, rather proud of having a man in handsome livery to give her her ticket when she was seated there, and arrange her light summer wrap about her. And then the train started, and carried her off to London in it. It was only seven weeks since she had travelled the same road from London to Woodlands, and what eventful weeks they had been to her! What delightful changes they had brought into her life, intolerable as the burthen of them had at last become! And now in what altered circumstances was she retracing her steps! She threw her arms up triumphantly in the air, then jumped to her feet and began dancing. It is not easy to dance in a railway-carriage that is rushing through space at the rate of twenty or thirty miles an hour, but Silvia performed a sort of war-dance notwithstanding, mingling the steps with gay burrahs and exclamations of 'Free! free! free!' After a while she reseated herself, and made herself decorously comfortable in the corner of the carriage. 'Is there any blessing on earth like freedom?' she said; 'it is almost worth while to have been shut up for a month in a cage, in order to really enjoy it.' She had not the faintest idea what she meant to do with this glorious liberty of hers. Mere liberty at the moment seemed enough, without making any use of it at all. She knew no one in London, except Sir Percival Ross, whom she would not dare to communicate with; she had no toothache, and no more intention of visiting a dentist than of looking up Aunt Lydia's cousin, Selina Fleetwood, in Albert Terrace. She knew perfectly well what she should not do, though she had not made up her mind what she should. But she was happy—gloriously happy; and how pretty she looked, in her happiness! She tossed her bonnet away from her, her eyes sparkled, her cheeks glowed; she laughed the joyous laugh of untroubled youth; she threw herself about in twenty different attitudes, saved from vulgarity by natural grace. There was something charming in this abandonment, that spoke more of nature than of civilisation. It was the freedom of the spirit that joyfully asserted itself through the limbs, for the body was 'cabin'd, cribb'd, confin'd' within the space of a railway-carriage, and yet liberty was uncontrolled. 'How have I borne it so long,' she cried suddenly; 'and how shall I bear it any longer?'"

The description of her London escapade is almost the best thing in the book, though the account of her alarm at the prospect of life in so confined an atmosphere as that of Sir Percival Ross's house, presided over as it is by a very strait-laced mother, is very nearly as good. Altogether, we must say that the adventures are painted with excellent skill and moderation, amounting sometimes to genuine sympathy. No one can absolutely dislike her, in spite of the unstinting resources of her falsehood, and we regret to say that our author leaves upon us a sort of terrible suspicion that the second brother,—the strait-laced Geoffry,—is not at all unlikely to pursue the poor disgraced adventuress with his admiration, even after all her arts have been discovered and her impostures brought to light.

One of the best effects in the book is the impression of quasi-remorse produced on the poor actress's previously wholly unmoral imagination, by discovering the genuine piety and goodness of her supposed sister-in-law and cousin,—the incipient self-contempt which this awakens in her,—and the dismay with which she perceives the possibility that an ideal of character and conduct may spring up within her which would render her intolerable to herself, and her whole past life a sort of curse of memory, from which it might become impossible to escape:—

"Silvia went into the garden, and strolling about there, endeavoured to shake off the feelings and thoughts that had been for the first time in her life awakened in her heart that day. She shrank from them with terror, only just having become aware of the fact that you cannot be happy because you choose, and that memory of a past will interfere with the present, even against the vehement opposition of the person whose memory it is; and that remorse might be awakened even in her heart, resolved as she was when she did things that she would be glad if they succeeded, and if they failed—try again. Was she passing out of her own power? Had she lost mastery over herself? A few minutes' violent emotion, and then the clouds burst and the sky was clear again. She was accustomed to this. But were regret and remorse actually planting their stings in her breast—lasting stings? and were dreadful plants to spring up and flourish from these roots, poisoning her whole life? Was it possible that such things really were? She had read, she had heard of such things—but did they really exist, and could they exist for her? She shrank with terror; she cowered down on a bench in the garden. She was cold under that brilliant summer sky; she was frightened, she was helpless, she did not know what to do."

That, and the little scene which had brought her to feel in this fashion, are powerfully drawn, in one sense almost too powerfully drawn,—they make us feel so much more sympathy with Silvia than they ought to make us feel if Constance and Ally are to hold their right places in the story. On the whole, we should say that while "the Author of Mrs. Jerminham's Journal" has given us a very lively and interesting book, in which all the characters are sketched with sufficient distinctness, she has disposed us to feel more sympathy with the outlaw, and less sympathy with the saint and the gentle heroine of convention, than she intended to inspire;—or that, if we are mistaken in this, she feels herself more sympathy with the outlaw than her own ideal will permit her frankly to acknowledge.

FOUR YEARS OF IRISH HISTORY.*

THIS book is brilliant, interesting, and full of instruction; but we doubt whether the public will draw from it the moral which the author seeks to convey. It is, in fact, an impeachment of the policy of O'Connell after his imprisonment, and a justification of the counter-policy of the Young Ireland party. The author is exceedingly fair. He tells the whole truth, and gives his readers the means of judging for themselves how far he has made out his case against O'Connell. After a candid review of the whole evidence, as Sir Charles Duffy presents it, we must frankly own that the policy of the Young Ireland party, interpreted by the light of events, appears to us, if not to justify, at least to excuse the attitude of O'Connell towards them. Look at the facts. It is probably no exaggeration to say that from the landing of Strongbow in Ireland to our own day no single Irishman can be named to whom Ireland owes so large a debt of gratitude as she owes to O'Connell. He it was who first broke the spell of Protestant domination, and taught the Irish that they could by moral force alone obtain all that they had a right to demand from the British Parliament. It is true, indeed, as Sir Charles Duffy showed in his previous volume, that O'Connell, before his imprisonment, sometimes used language which sounded dangerously like an appeal to physical force. But when the Government prohibition of the Clontarf meeting brought him face to face with stubborn facts, he frankly recognised the folly and wickedness of provoking a struggle which could only result in the fruitless slaughter of his followers and the curtailment of his country's liberties. That was a lesson which Sir Charles Duffy and his friends refused to learn. With the uncalculating recklessness of brave and generous, but surely not wise, patriots, they blamed O'Connell for not flinging his undisciplined and unofficerd masses against the trained and officerd troops of the Government. It was easy enough to convict the Liberator of inconsistency and gasconade. He had, undoubtedly, used language which justified his followers in believing that he was prepared for the alternative of physical force, if moral force should prove unavailing. But it was surely better, and braver also, to face the reproach of inconsistency, and even of pusillanimity, than to provoke a conflict which he knew must prove disastrous to his cause and ruinous to his country. It was probably the recoil from this imminent peril that drove O'Connell into the opposite extreme of denouncing, without any reservation, any resort to physical force in the regeneration of Ireland. He would, no doubt, admit, as an abstract proposition, the right of every nation to assert its freedom and independence by an appeal to arms, if all other arguments failed. But he evidently convinced himself that an insurrection in Ireland would inevitably be a failure, and therefore a crime. Hence the energy with which he denounced any kind of appeal to physical force. The Young Irelanders had an easy task in refuting him on the ground of history and general politics; but their own conduct afterwards proved that O'Connell was practically in the right. He saw, and they did not, the goal towards which they were rapidly travelling.

The first serious divergence between the policy of O'Connell and the policy of Young Ireland was exhibited in an article written by Mitchell, and published in Sir Charles Duffy's paper, the Nation, the most influential journal at that time in Ireland. The avowed aim of the article was to teach the Irish how railways might be used as efficient instruments of guerrilla warfare against the Government. O'Connell's Repeal Association was scattered all over Ireland, and divided into districts, each under the superintendence of a Repeal warden. Mitchell suggested in his article in the Nation that "it might be useful to promulgate through the country, to be read by all Repeal wardens in their parishes, a few short and easy rules as to the mode of dealing with railways in case of any enemy daring to make a hostile use of them," daring, that is, to move troops or constabulary to any part of Ireland which might be menaced by disorder or insurrection. Sir Charles Duffy thinks the spirit and language of Mitchell's article "natural and legitimate, under the circumstances." What were "the circumstances"? Simply that the Standard had written of the agitation for Repeal in coarse and violent language, and had pointed out that the railways had placed every part of Ireland "within six hours of the garrison of Dublin." O'Connell viewed the matter in a different light. He called at the office of the Nation, "to remonstrate against the dangerous conjunction of Repeal wardens with lessons in the art of guerrilla warfare." Surely this was not surprising, considering that the Nation was distributed among all the Repeal wardens by the agency and funds of O'Connell's Association. Sir Charles Duffy tauntingly contrasts O'Connell's remonstrance on this occasion with the Liberator's own language on former occasions, and thinks it "somewhat surprising" that he "should have become so squeamish." Would it not have been fairer to believe that O'Connell had become convinced of the folly and mischief of all such language, his own included, and was honestly bent on discouraging it? "But he was the leader, and we complied," pleads Sir Charles Duffy. But how did they comply? "Mitchell, in the next number, mentioned that Mr. O'Connell had remonstrated on the subject, and that it must be clearly understood that the Nation 'had neither connection with nor control over Repeal wardens.'" Sir Charles Duffy thinks it was ungenerous on the part of O'Connell not to have been satisfied with such a disclaimer? But was it ungenerous? A thousand copies of the Nation were distributed by O'Connell's Association among the Repeal wardens. O'Connell would therefore be justly held responsible for the teaching of the Nation, and the Nation neither withdrew nor modified one jot or tittle of the doctrine laid down in Mitchell's article. We candidly do not see how O'Connell could, under the circumstances, have allowed his Association to be identified even in sympathy with the conductors of the Nation, when the editor, Sir Charles Duffy, found himself prosecuted for seditious libel. To prosecute at all was unwise, as the event proved. But how could O'Connell have identified himself with the defendants without making himself responsible for opinions which he heartily condemned? The eloquent speech of the defendant's counsel, moreover, was, in fact, a powerful defence of the doctrine of Mitchell's article,—the right of the Repealers to use physical force in carrying out their programme. Of course, the abstract right of insurrection remains indefeasible to every nation which believes itself oppressed. But a popular leader should shape his conduct by what is practically feasible rather than by what is abstractedly right; and can anybody now doubt, looking back at all the circumstances, that O'Connell's estimate of what was possible was much nearer the truth than the sanguine anticipations of the Young Ireland party?

We draw our conclusions exclusively from the materials which Sir Charles Duffy has himself supplied. From these it seems to us clear that O'Connell saw, and the Young Irelanders did not see, how narrow was the line which separated their teaching from overt rebellion; and overt rebellion at that time as the result proved, was madness. The death of O'Connell in the year 1847 removed the check which kept the Young Irelanders within bounds, and the Revolution in France, which soon followed, threw them clean off their balance. Sir Charles Duffy preached rebellion defiantly in the Nation, and Mitchell (who had meanwhile separated from the Nation on quite another question) openly defied the Government in his United Irishman to interfere with him. "They were assured," says Sir C. Duffy, "in specific terms, that if they could not forthwith crush these determined assailants, they would be crushed by them. They were invited, and dared to try the experiment." "If you get me within your power," said Mitchell, addressing the Lord-Lieutenant, through the United Irishman, "I entreat you to show me no mercy, as I, so help me God, would show none to you!" Sir Charles Duffy condemns the wild extravagance of Mitchell; but, in truth, it differed only in degree from his own. The materials for a successful rebellion in Ireland did not then exist. England was at peace with all the world, and had no internal troubles except in Ireland. Only enthusiastic dreamers could rely on active aid from France or the United States, and without external aid a rising in Ireland could only mean a conflict between an army of soldiers and a promiscuous mob of peasants. Indeed, the Young Irelanders soon found, to their cost, that they had not even an undisciplined mob to back them. The Irish clergy were opposed to them, and the Irish clergy then controlled the masses. Mr. Smith O'Brien's abortive attempt at insurrection, in such a condition of affairs, seems to us to furnish the strongest possible justification of O'Connell's attitude towards the Young Ireland party.

It is only the statesmanship of O'Connell that we are contrasting with the statesmanship of the Young Irelanders. That O'Connell and his sons were jealous of the Nation and its staff is probably true, and if Sir Charles Duffy had limited his censure to points of that sort, we should be disposed to admit that he had made out his case. Nothing, for instance, could have been more unjust or more ungenerous than the accusations of infidelity which O'Connell either inspired or countenanced against the teaching of the Nation. Nor, again, do we dispute the justice of Sir Charles Duffy's accusation of self-seeking and place-hunting against O'Connell's immediate friends and relations. Here, too, we think that he has made out his case. O'Connell would have stood better with posterity, and would have wielded a more salutary influence with the Government, if he had kept his hands clean from all official patronage. Of the contrast between himself and the Young Irelanders on that point they have every reason to be proud. Whatever we may think of the wisdom of their policy, there can be but one opinion about their noble unselfishness and self-sacrificing bravery. No one can say of any of them that they encouraged others to run risks from which they shrank themselves. If they were foremost in urging others into dangerous enterprises, they were equally foremost in placing themselves in the forefront of the danger. The public opinion of England has condemned their policy; but Sir Charles Duffy's book is a pathetic record of chivalrous, if mistaken, patriotism.

SCOTCH RURAL LIFE IN FICTION.*

THE appearance of three novels—two of them are decidedly above the average—dealing exclusively with modern Scotch country life, and of the second edition of a series of realistic and well-executed Aberdeenshire sketches by a careful observer and skilful social photographer, encourages the hope that the school of fiction which used to reproduce manners, life, and religion in humble circles north of the Tweed is not quite extinct. We have at present many Scotch novelists of eminence, no doubt, in the sense of novelists who are Scotch by blood or birth, or both, like Mrs. Oliphant and Mr. William Black. Such have in certain of their works reproduced social foibles and humours, and Mrs. Oliphant more particularly has in her latest works shown a tendency to return to her early love, with all her early enthusiasm, although it must be allowed that from first to last she has looked at Scotch life very largely from the standpoint of the country-house or the manse, and sometimes, also, of the Episcopalian parsonage. Both Mrs. Oliphant and Mr. Black are, however, essentially English novelists, in the sense that they appeal to an essentially English public. Other Scotch writers, like Mr. Charles Gibbon, either deal with the life of Scotland in the past, or only with the picturesque side of the present, although it is only fair to Mr. Gibbon to say that in that work of his which ran its course in Good Words last year, he indicated more capacity for penetrating beneath the surface of Scotch life than he has hitherto done. Perhaps the bulk of Mr. George MacDonald's novels have their scenes laid beyond the Tweed, but the spirituality which is their most notable characteristic is as rare in Scotch life as it is in English fiction. Where are the successors, —we shall not say of Scott or Miss Ferrier, but of Wilson or Galt, or the author of Mansie Wauch? Is Scotch character becoming less Scotch, or are Scotch "characters" now worthy of preservation only in after-dinner or angling-roost stories, or in collections like the well-known one by Dean Ramsay? How is it that the ecclesiastical agitations which during the last half-century led to the formation of the Free Church and the abolition of patronage in the Establishment, have not produced one good work of fiction, at once humoristic and free from vulgarity?

The four books which have called forth these questions are not quite of such a calibre as, in effect, to constitute a full answer to them, either in the affirmative or the negative. But there is no doubt as to their being products of the Scotch soil. Mr. Alexander's Aberdeenshire sketches, under the title of Life among My Ain Folk—which we must unfortunately dismiss with a word—are indeed handfuls of that soil which has given Scotland some of her hardest heads; and one of them, "Baubie Huie's Bastard Geet," which is full of quiet, but effective humour, is the clearest revelation we have ever seen of the feeling in Scotch country districts in regard to certain aspects of morality. Matthew Dale is the story of the engagement by a well-to-do Scotch farmer of the daughter of a Dissenting Presbyterian minister, first as housekeeper, and then as wife. The scene of Angus Graeme is laid in a Scotch country parish, and Angus Graeme himself is a character of such a kind as to make other people than Mr. Gladstone fall into the mistake that Scotland is "the land o' the leal." The Laird's Secret tells of the fortunes of two daughters of the manse, one of whom marries "the laird," and the other the doctor, in a Scotch parish. There is in all three an abundance of the Scotch dialect—most of it wonderfully pure, too—of Scotch proverbs, and of Scotch religion, in the form, it must be confessed, however, of Scotch ecclesiastical disputes. Morton, the chief villain of The Laird's Secret, is a Scotch High-Church Episcopalian, who commits almost endless villainies, in order that he may bring converts and money to Rome. Angus Graeme is, to no inconsiderable extent, an attack upon the Free Church. The raison d'être of Matthew Dale cannot be said to be an ecclesiastical or religious one. But when Ann Forbes and her future Ahasuerus first meet, they plunge into an ecclesiastical dispute. "I am a member of the Relief body," she explains. He replies, "A Dissenter! Ah! I believe that the most of my household are Dissenters. What is it they say of them? That they'll neither steal nor swear; but they lie and cheat like the—ahem!" Some of the best minor characters in all three are typical Scotchwomen of the half-servant, half-friend type, such as the nurse who watches over Helen and Harriet Fitzjames, in The Laird's Secret, and Janet, the old servant in Matthew Dale, not to speak of practical Mrs. Scott, who is perpetually helping Ann Forbes out of her difficulties, and yet is also perpetually rushing off to attend to "the bairnses' faither," as, by a quaint Scotch euphemism, she describes her husband. In short, all that is really good in these novels, of writing, of character, even of sentiment, as also in Mrs. Walford's excellent story of Dick Netherby—that is essentially a Border novel, however—is Scotch, and rural Scotch.

The Laird's Secret is by no means equal to Matthew Dale or Angus Graeme. It has a crude, juvenile look. The Fitzjames girls are not so much Scotch "lasses" as English boarding-school "misses," who go into raptures over Scotch scenery and character. The "Laird," whose secret finds him out, is an unsatisfactory character; and Dr. Blackburn, whom the supposed narrator of the story marries, poses rather too frequently as the Pomposo of rectitude. The red-herring of "No Popery" is, too, most ludicrously dragged across the trail of the plot. Besides the nurse already mentioned, there is only one good character in the story,—Robert Gourlay, the father of the girl whom the "Laird" elopes with early in life; and even he is a rather weak-kneed specimen of that "peasant of the Lothians" who, according to Mr. Froude, was first taught by "the voice of Knox" that "he was a free man, the equal in the sight of God with the proudest peer or prelate that had trampled on his forefathers." Mrs. Sanders's Matthew Dale is thoroughly enjoyable; the plot is evolved with great care, and the style is remarkably good. Ann Forbes's troubles with the household affairs of the employer whom she has admired from girl-hood, with his treacherous sister, and his drunken nephew, are as genuine as anything we have seen in fiction for a long time. Matthew Dale, indeed, strikes us as rather a "lord of creation," than a substantial Scotch farmer; for such a man, he is far too much at the mercy of circumstances, women, and his own sensibilities. The suggestion, too, which Mrs. Sanders makes, in the end of her story, that the good-natured dipsomaniac, Ned Rylands, is killed of a cure, in the shape of cayenne tea or bromide of potassium, looks too like the introduction of an incongruous element of farce into a true, though homely tragedy. Matthew Dale is from an artistic point of view a much more finished production than Angus Graeme; the style of the latter is not so completely under control, and the portraits in it are not so carefully executed. But, in spite of this, Angus Graeme is full of force, fire, and promise; and any errors or extravagances of diction that it exhibits, time certainly may remove or care weed out. The central incident of the story is an unusually strong one. A sprightly, beautiful, essentially English girl, Jessie Grant—who recalls Mr. Black's "Daughter of Heth," though she is much robuster—is introduced into a dreary household of mean, cross-grained, quarrelling spinster aunts, and into a Scotch village full of gossip, sectarian self-righteousness and ecclesiastical bickering. Thereupon, every man at all "eligible" falls in love with her,—Auchencairn, the half-mad "laird;" Joshua Pillrig, Free-Church clergyman and crypto-sensualist and swindler; and last and best, Angus Graeme, the honest gamekeeper, who saves her life, and, having a wife living, though separated from him, has to assume towards her a paternal love, while his real sentiments are much warmer. It would be something like sacrilege to tell the tragedy of the gamekeeper's hapless passion. But it is worked out with undoubted skill; we have not, indeed, in recent fiction, come across an ethically more dignified figure than this Bayard of the Scotch hills. Although the author of Angus Graeme seems to have an animus against the Free Church, he (or she) shows much skill in dealing with the petty Church intrigues of Stronvar. The efforts of the female hawks of Pillrig's congregation to bring drunkenness home to him, and the methods by which these efforts are defeated, are detailed with much humour, and are full of that truth which is stranger than fiction. The writing in Angus Graeme is, as we have said, not free from tricks of rhetoric; but these are forgotten, in presence of its buoyancy and "go," which are maintained from beginning to end. Angus Graeme is an emphatically "sound" novel, but the author should give us still better things.

SHAKESPEARE v. BACON.*

It is a pity that Mrs. Pott's admiration for the Promus did not lead her to choose a motto for her volume from its pages. There is a delightfully appropriate one at p. 183, which, if it had been used, would have had the additional advantage of harmonising with the sentiment of Dr. Abbott's preface. It is, "Quodque cupit sperat, suæque illum oracula fallunt:" "And what he desires he hopes for, and his own oracles deceive him." But then, if the author had devoted a few minutes to ruminating on the wisdom of this saying, she might have spared herself the many hours spent in compiling so big a book. Six hundred and twenty-eight pages of "words, words, words," resulting in nothing! It makes one melancholy to think of it.

We confess that we took this imposing volume in hand with some little misgiving. Were we going to be convinced that Shakespeare—our Shakespeare, at least—never existed? Were we going to find that all our affections must be transferred to a writer whom we had been used to regard with more admiration than love? We meant to make the sacrifice of our faith, if it proved necessary; but an hour's reading restored our serenity, and the further we went, the more happily convinced we were that Mrs. Pott had only perpetrated a rather heavy joke, with the object of showing how two contemporary men of genius would naturally have some thoughts and expressions in common, but a great many more that were peculiar to each of them. Of course, in entertaining this idea, we may be only making a second mistake; but it really does seem impossible to take the arguments for Bacon's authorship of the plays as seriously offered to the public.

We do not quite see, indeed, why Mrs. Pott believes that Bacon wrote the Promus, or storehouse of sayings, on which she builds her whole edifice. The Lord Keeper's early biographers knew nothing about it, and its first appearance is in the Harleian collection of manuscripts in the British Museum, where it appears as fifty sheets of rough jottings, without indication of whence they came, or to whom they belonged. They are said to be "in Lord Bacon's well-known handwriting," and Mr. Maude Thompson vouches for its authenticity; but this is only the opinion of an expert, and we know that we need not, unless we like, accept that as evidence. If Lord Bacon did make this collection, he probably made it for use. Yet, in his tolerably voluminous "acknowledged" works, he rarely uses anything that can be supposed to be drawn from it. For example, he put into it, according to Mrs. Pott, no less than two hundred and twenty-five extracts from the Adagia of Erasmus, and used less than half a dozen of them. This would be a waste of material inconsistent with the prudence of so wise a man, therefore we do not feel ourselves obliged to believe that Bacon wrote the Promus. Perhaps Shakespeare did. We should be disposed to adopt that theory, and write a book in support of it, if we could only see a greater affinity between the jottings and his "acknowledged" works.

We hope the argument just indicated against the authorship of the Promus will not be thought frivolous or impertinent; it is the result of the study of those set forth by Mrs. Pott, but does not claim their originality. Here are one or two of them:—Salutations such as "Good morning," "Good evening," &c., were not in use in the days of Shakespeare and Bacon. Bacon was so struck with them as a novelty, that he wrote down tentatively not only these, but also, "Good swear," "Good matens."

"Shakespeare makes the most ordinary people in the most ordinary circumstances say, 'Good morning,' 'Good evening,' 'Good day.'"

Therefore, Shakespeare is Bacon. Again, the Promus contains this entry:—

"Oremus. In the plays, both men and women in extremity pray, or think of praying." ("References to saying prayers about 150 times.")

Therefore, Bacon wrote the plays.

How powerful imagination can become when she is enlisted as advocate of a beloved theory, we find proved over and over again in the pages so laboriously devoted to putting together the text of the Promus, and the passages to which the several entries are supposed to have given birth. Who, without a very special pair of spectacles, could see the connection in this instance?—

"Promus. Et justificata est Sapientia filiis suis.—Play. Journeys end in lovers' meeting, every wise man's son doth know."

Or in these?—

"Promus. Wild tyme in the ground hath a sent like a cypresse chest.—Play. I know a bank whereon the wild thyme grows."

"Promus. Mala attrahens ad sese ut caecias nubeo.—Play. I am but mad north-north-west; when the wind is southerly, I know a hawk from a handsaw."

"Promus. Si qua vobis apte nubere, nube parj (translated,—If thou wilt marry fitly, marry an equal).—Play. If thou wilt needs marry, marry a fool."

"Promus. Le riche dine quand il vent, le pauvre quand il peut.—Plays. I. Provide us with all things necessary at Eastcheap, there I'll sup. II. I will to dinner. III. Bid them prepare dinner." To which Mrs. Pott adds, "At least fifty times."

We will not pause to remark upon the apparent betrayal in the above of the compiler's views as to wisdom and marriage respectively, but we will just hint that it might have been difficult for anybody, even Shakespeare or Bacon, to hold the mirror up to nature in a long series of dramas, tragic and comic, without any mention of dinner or supper. The most exalted personages must eat—and do eat in company—how much more the rank and file of humanity! We are rather surprised that Mrs. Pott does not suspect Lord Bacon of having written The Corsican Brothers, in which there certainly occurs some such expression as “We dine at seven o’clock,” not to speak of there being an actual dinner “presented” on the stage.

Dr. Abbott in his preface suggests that there may have occurred now and then, in the compiling of the book, “a misapprehension of the entry in the Promus.” The following looks very like such a misapprehension:—

“Eumenes litter. (Perhaps Bacon meant litteratum fautor, or patronus, as Eumenes, King of Pergamus, founded a library there which rivalled even that of Alexandria.)”

Why might not Mrs. Pott have just as easily supposed that “litter” was simply an English word, and that Bacon, thinking of the swineherd whose charges fed Penelope’s lovers, might have adopted “Eumenes’ litter” as a euphemism for the animals to whom pearls should not be thrown?

SANGUELAC.*

THE weakest thing—the only weak thing, indeed—about Mr. Percy Greg’s new novel, is its title. He is, as a rule, very successful or very fortunate with his titles, because, like his style and his thought, they go straight to the centre of the matter they are concerned with. Thus, Ivy, Cousin and Bride, and Errant were good titles, because they really expressed, but in different ways, the heart and soul of the books thus designated. Sanguelac, again, though probably every boarding-school girl knows what it means, has an affected, Grosvenor-Gallery look. Besides, it is not adequate. There are battles, sieges, and deaths enough in these three volumes, no doubt. But, “it is all dying in the ‘quality’ way,” as the undertaker’s assistant in the old play puts it. There is even no parade of the suits and trappings of woe, no gruesome dwelling on “blood and wounds.” Whatever Mr. Greg may have intended, his reader will not, after laying down Sanguelac, think most of “the seas of blood” and “surges of gore” to be found in it. Rather, his memory will dwell on Clarence Derval, its hero, and the charming half-sisters, Minna and Rose, whose fortunes are bound up with his; or on its author’s gallant attempt to drive back the tide of history nearly a generation, and make us all regret that the result of the Civil War in America had not been the very reverse of what it actually was. On one side, Sanguelac is a story with a stirring plot and several very interesting and admirably drawn characters; on another, it is a novel with a purpose, and a very earnest and militant purpose, too. But the title brings out neither side, much less both. Yet, of all novelists of the present time, Mr. Greg can least afford an inadequate or merely “æsthetic” title. Cap-à-pie completeness, with him, is everything. Sanguelac somehow suggests Sir Galahad starting to carve the casques of men with a pure heart, but also with Postlethwaite’s sunflower and fur-collared coat.

To judge from Mr. Greg’s preface to Sanguelac, we should say he considers his plot of secondary importance, as compared with his purpose. Most of his readers will, however, take the opposite view. A novel is a novel all the world over, and if it is intended as a polemical pamphlet, then, in nine cases out of ten, so much the worse for the author. It ought to stir the heart, not to set the head off on a career of ratiocination. Happily, indeed, Mr. Greg defeats his own intention. His story is so good, the leading characters in Sanguelac are so worthy of being portrayed in fiction, that we come to think of them, and move to and fro with them, regardless of South and slavery. There is more powerful writing in some of Mr. Greg’s other works than there is here; there are even passages here which suggest hurry. But in many respects it will be accounted his best novel. It is his ripest, his freest from fantastic incident or literary extravagance, his most thoroughly human, or, at least, his most distinctly mundane. Although Clarence Derval, the hero, spends some of his time in England, as the native land of his mother, and delivers to a young lady and a farm labourer a lecture against Uncle Tom’s Cabin which is not altogether free from priggishness, the chief scenes are laid in the Southern States, and more particularly in South Carolina, of which Derval considers himself a citizen and the champion. Here, Mr. Greg is seen at his best. His landscapes are good;

his social sketches are still better. In no work of fiction, without exception, have we seen the actual difficulties of a slave-owning Southern aristocrat depicted half so well. Derval’s father—a rather shadowy personage, by the way—being in England, as Ambassador for the United States, Clarence is really master of Dervalstown, and free to work out his romantic ideas of his position. He does work them out, and with a vengeance, for at the very close of the novel, and after the Civil War is over, we find him making use of the secret organisation known as “the Ku Klux Klan” to exact punishment for the murder of a favourite and faithful slave, Casca. Mr. Greg’s literary skill is especially tried, however, in his detailed account of the relations between Clarence and Rose, a beautiful, morbidly sensitive, and somewhat self-willed girl, whom he finds on his father’s plantation, and whom he discovers to be the half-sister of Minna Lawrence, whose cousin, guardian, and lover he is. He educates Rose, and aids the development of her character. She, in turn, comes to adore him—although to the last she looks upon him as “master”—and loses her life during the Civil War in an attempt to save his. Other hands than Mr. Greg’s might have put an unpleasant aspect on this peculiarly delicate relationship. But in his hands, it is perfect trust on the one side, repaid with perfect honour on the other. When Minna and Rose come to make each other’s acquaintance, without the former knowing of the tie of blood between them, troubles arise, resulting even in a temporary separation between Minna and her lover. The story of this, and of the threefold reconciliation which is ultimately brought about, could not have been better told. We like Mr. Greg’s domestic scenes better than his battle-pieces, though some of these are undoubtedly good. He admits that his story of the assault which Derval commits in the Senate Chamber on Senator Somers for maligning his absent father is not historical, although he “believes it to be less unfair than what in a similar case passes for history.” We object to its introduction on literary grounds, however. It has really nothing to do with the plot. Mr. Greg has sunk the artist in the controversialist, in order to introduce it. As for general style, Sanguelac recalls the warm eulogium which Mr. Ruskin not very long ago passed on Sir Walter Scott, when he made his curious attack on George Eliot and novelists of her school. His heroes and heroines are high-minded and in most cases highly-educated men and women, and their walk and conversation are in accordance with their character and mental development. They are not oddities, and indulge in no oddities of speech or behaviour. Sanguelac is a most enjoyable book to read, but it is hardly possible to quote from it passages which could be said to be specimens of style.

Looked at as a contribution to the history of the American Civil War, Sanguelac may be described as a challenge by Mr. Greg,—to himself. In fact, as “men of honour” used to say long ago, “the matter cannot end here.” He makes direct and indirect charges against the Federal officers and soldiery during the war. He speaks of the treatment accorded to Lee and his army after their final defeat as “the only light of generosity that shines on Grant’s career.” Of Lincoln, Mr. Greg writes:—“It may be said that he was pre-eminently felix opportunitate mortis. He did not live to put to the test the virtues ascribed to him by his eulogists, and receives credit for all the charity he never showed. Of the after-treatment of the conquered, I will not trust myself to speak.” Yet Mr. Greg says, in his brief prefatory note, “What may be ascribed to anti-Northern prejudice is mostly matter of Northern evidence.” This being so, let Mr. Greg substantiate his charges. Let him write a serious history of the American Civil War—he will be sure to write a very brilliant and fascinating one—and then we shall be able to judge between him and the historians whom he really, though informally, contradicts. For the rest, those who sympathised with the North in the Civil War, and believed that it was well that it terminated as it did, will not quarrel with Mr. Greg for having given them in Clarence Derval a Southern Bayard. Nobody denies that on the Southern side were to be found many gentlemen of the type of Lee, who were aristocrats in heart and feeling, as well as by position and blood; in fact, the sympathy felt here for the South was largely due to a knowledge of this fact. But Mr. Greg does not maintain that such were gentlemen because of the slave system; on the contrary, the bulk of Derval’s difficulties arise from the revolting conception of womanhood involved in that system. Besides, Mr. Greg does not contend that the North sent no gentlemen into the war. General Somers, who, in Sanguelac, holds a commission in the Federal Army, is as much of a chevalier sans peur et sans reproche as Derval himself, and is perpetually coming to the aid of "distressed damsels." Mr. Greg, by means of a conversation between Derval and Stokes, an English labourer, endeavours to show that the peasant here is worse off materially than the Southern slave before the war. Stokes, indeed, completes his view of the difference between peasant and slave by saying, in an undertone, to Derval, "I have daughters!" a remark which confuses the too honest champion of a hopelessly bad cause. But letting that pass, Mr. Greg should remember that when Stokes and his brethren get the franchise, they will be able to bring even their material grievances before the country, with the moral certainty of redress by absolutely peaceful means. But nothing less than a social revolution was required to place blacks and whites in the Southern States on a proper footing towards each other. In short, whatever Mr. Greg, as a historian, may prove in the future, Sanguelac proves only that he can write fiction which, from the literary and, above all, from the ethical point of view, is inferior to little, and superior to most, of the work of his contemporaries.

At a time when sensationalism in religion is somewhat in favour, and when it seems to be a recognised thing that old facts must be clothed in new dresses, if they are to have attention, it needs some courage to publish a small volume, in homely brown cloth, under the simple title of Plain Sermons, Preached in Town and Country. Mr. Obbard has not only displayed this rare courage, but he has justified the use of it. We have seldom seen a better collection of short, earnest, and striking addresses than those which lie before us, preached, as the short preface informs the reader, before hearers of different classes, printed at the request of those who heard them, and left "rough-hewn, as they originally stood."

To avoid the two extremes, the dull, doctrinal sermon, on the one hand, which sends the duller village intelligence to sleep over original sin and the "vain talk of the Pelagians," and the frantic attempt, on the other, to attract a weary and diminishing congregation by startling announcements and sensational utterances from week to week, ought not, to an educated man, who has his subject at heart, to be a matter of great difficulty. And yet we all know preachers who make shipwreck on one or other shoal. The present writer has frequently passed a chapel whose notice-board could be outdone by nothing, unless it be by the Salvation Army itself. The story of the "Fall" was made to appear on this religious stage as "the first game of hide and seek," that of Zaccheus as "the little man up the tree." For our part, we greatly prefer the opposite extreme of hopeless dullness to this irreverent method of offering worldly baits, in order to entice people to swallow with it some spiritual food.

Mr. Obbard has too much faith in his subject, and too much natural freshness of thought, to condescend to any artificial gilding. His sermons are essentially sermons of to-day, as we may see from a glance at his index. The Census, the Revised New Testament, the Imprecatory Psalms, and God the Creator (which deals with the relations between religion and science), are titles which show us at the outset that our author believes, and believes intensely, that religion and matters of every-day incident and every-day speculation are not and cannot be divorced. And yet the great fundamental doctrines are not overlooked. In the sermon which opens the volume, Mr. Obbard deals with the love of the Father, and asks:—

"Why do you ascribe all harshness, coldness, and severity to God the Father, and all love, pity, compassion, sympathy, to God Jesus Christ? If God the Son gave his life for you, God the Father did no less for you, when he spared not his own Son, but freely gave him up to die for you. I fear the Trinity is believed much more practically than the Unity."

It may be said there is nothing new in this; neither is there anything new under the sun. But the reminder is needed. The love of the Son in making the Atonement has so dazzled men's blurred vision, that the love of the Father in originating it has come to be overlooked. Yet he that for duty's sake or love's sake gives up that which is nearest and dearest to him, gives sometimes more than his own life. The pointsman who had to turn a train on to the line on which his infant child played, to save that train, was no less a hero than was the engine-driver who, a few weeks since, passed through the flames himself to save his freight of human lives: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son," is a text so familiar to our ears, that we are apt to forget its full significance.

On the unity of the Old and New Testaments, Mr. Obbard touches very happily, in his sermon on the imprecatory Psalms, on the difficulties of which he throws some valuable light. Taking into account the obscurity of the Hebrew language and the age of these wonderful religious poems, our author can hardly be blamed by the most cautious critic for accepting the argument of Dr. Taylor, in his Gospel in the Law,—i.e., that, for instance, in Psalms cix. and lxi., David represents himself as surrounded by his enemies, and ascribes to them the use of curses which we suppose him, on the contrary, to direct against them. One verse in the cix.-th Psalm, Mr. Obbard tells us, needs re-translation; it will be interesting to see whether any fresh light is thrown on these and kindred passages, when the Revision of the Old Testament is completed. Here Mr. Obbard takes some pains, and, we think, rightly, to show that the so-called "spirit of the Old Testament" is not altogether absent in the New, and instances Revelation xviii., 6-20, and the woes pronounced on Scribes and Pharisees by our Lord, as examples. The fact is, that except for the sake of cavilling and trying to prove two "spirits" in the one Revelation of God's dealings, no one would expect it to be, or wish it to be otherwise. The spirit of Christ is, indeed, as far in advance of the spirit of the Mosaic law as Paradise Lost is an advance on a first primer; where Elijah called down fire from heaven, Christ forbade the exercise of such power, with an accompanying rebuke. But we are nowhere taught that Christianity is a nerveless philosophy, which precludes the use of righteous anger, and even of irony. We are inclined to think that a righteous man's anger, as well as his prayer, "availeth much."

The pages on the "Thorn in the Flesh" deal chiefly with the much vexed question of,—What are the limits of reasonable requests addressed to God in prayer? And here we come at last to a passage which we venture to think Mr. Obbard should not have left "rough-hewn, as it originally stood." The preacher is, of course, for the sake of argument, making the objections of others his own; but his interpretation we think hardly fair:—

"We may not pray for a good harvest, because the harvest depends on the weather, and the weather is governed by physical laws, which will act irrespective of our wishes; nay, if we dare put it into words, irrespective of the will of God."

The words we have italicised are those to which we take exception. Some may surely believe that "the weather is governed by physical laws, which will act irrespective of our wishes," and yet have full faith in the power of God and his will. Are not these very physical laws his will? Who shall say that it may not be better for the course of this world that our weather should be ordered by divine law acting directly, rather than by divine law acting through the agency of man's desires and the laws of prayer? For prayer, as well as weather, may have its laws, since it is part of the system of the law-making and law-abiding God. If we differ from Mr. Obbard on this point, we can still agree with him very fully when he says:—"If, then, we are to pray for nothing which is governed by laws which we can understand, in these days of advanced enlightenment, there will be nothing left to pray for; nothing, at least, connected with the body or the visible world." And we can follow him when he pertinently asks:—

"Were Abraham, David, Paul, in the wrong, ignorantly indeed, but still in the wrong? Ought St. Paul to have gone to the doctor about his thorn in the flesh; but whatever he did, to have abstained from mentioning it in his prayers? Did the Lord forget we had bodies, and that our bodies had needs of their own, when he said, 'Ask, and ye shall receive?' or the Apostle speak only of spiritual need, in his wide estimate of the divine love, 'Casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you?'"

Mr. Obbard's style is generally as terse and epigrammatic as his thought is fresh and vigorous. Many books of collected "sayings" can boast of few specimens so good as those which might easily be culled from these pages. "We are so surrounded with other people, and their habits and customs, religious views and sins, that we seldom get alone with God." "As God has made no revelation to man of what science can discover, so science can never reach to the subjects which God has revealed." "There will be pure and purified in heaven." "It is said, indeed, 'None shall pluck God's sheep out of his hand.' Still, if I read rightly, I see no assurance that we have not the fatal power to pluck ourselves out of his hand. Free-will is always ours, and of necessity it must be so; and our comfort must lie, not in a passive inability to be lost, but in an active striving to be saved." And sometimes the quiet irony for which we have contended as the lawful weapon of the Christian, peeps out, as in the sermon entitled "Costly Offerings," an answer to the question of Judas asked at the anointing at Bethany, "To what purpose is this waste?" We seem to find it in the opening sentences:—"This was the question of a thief. It is still the question of thieves. Let us first look at the original thief; afterwards, we will turn to the modern thief," and undoubtedly we find it reappear very soon. "Christ blames Judas for being a Utilitarian. . . . Thank God, we are seeing a change! We are getting to acknowledge that because God can be worshipped in a cottage, still, He never said he preferred a cottage, or that because Christ condescended to be born in a stable, that therefore He takes delight in a building as near a stable as may be." If Mr. Obbard's congregation did not subscribe largely to the organ for which he thus appealed, we despair of the power of preaching. The sermon is a masterpiece of argument in favour of a reverent and beautiful service; and the reference to the inspiration of Aholiab and Bezaleel, which, to our mind, for ever sanctifies as well as sanctions art, even in its humblest forms of expression, is particularly happy.

And if we may single out two more of Mr. Obbard's sermons for especial notice, we shall choose those on "Purity" (p. 176), and on "Christian Loveliness" (p. 187). Both strike one key, and both subjects are admirably handled. One might well be a prelude to the other, for the former deals with the coarser forms of temptation, and the latter is directed rather to the preservation of all that is pure and holy in our surroundings, our occupations, our lives. To these occupations, to our books, and our recreations, the preacher bids us apply the test of St. Paul's lofty standard, "Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are just, pure, lovely, of good report, think on these things." When we apply this to the books we read, shall we not also to the society papers we buy,—the food which, no less than a three-volume novel, goes to feed our own minds, and the younger and more impressionable minds around us? The Christian ideal of character is not that from which gross impurity is absent, but that in which holiness is present; and holiness is not a mere matter of action, it is a state of mind and of heart. Were the standard of professing Christians that of St. Paul—and we may add, without irreverence, that of our author—there would be no need for sensationalism in religion, since its beauty would be apparent to all men; and still less necessity for Christian Evidence lectures, for the Christian life itself would be proved to be the most powerful argument in its own defence.

AMERICA REVISITED.*

It is impossible to take up this new series of Mr. Sala's letters from the United States without being reminded of those other letters, written by the same pen for the same journal nearly twenty years ago, which did so much to set English people wrong, and to keep them wrong, concerning the real issues involved in the terrible conflict then being waged between North and South. Still, those of us who never wavered in our conviction that the Northern States were fighting for the cause of justice and freedom, and that their final triumph was inevitable, can at this time of day well afford to let bygones be bygones; and a full reconciliation is rendered not only easy, but pleasant, by the very frank and handsome confession which Mr. Sala makes in his preface to these volumes. He writes:—

"When I first went to the United States, in the year 1863, I was, comparatively speaking, a young man,—very prejudiced, very conceited, and a great deal more ignorant and presumptuous than (I hope) I am now. When I landed in America, the country was convulsed by one of the most terrific internecine struggles that history has known. I took, politically, the wrong side,—that is to say, I was an ardent sympathiser with the South, in her struggle against the North. In so taking a side, I was neither logical nor worldly-wise,—in short, I approved myself to be what is commonly called a fool; but my partiality for 'Dixie's Land' was simply and solely due to a sentimental feeling; and at thirty-four years of age it is permissible to possess some slight modicum of sentimentality. My heart was with the South, because I came on my mother's side of a West-Indian family—and a slave-owning family—ruined by the abolition of slavery in the British Colonies; and although I know perfectly well that I was altogether wrong in what I wrote politically concerning 'America in the Midst of War,' my heart is still in the South—with her gallant sons and her beautiful daughters; and the song of 'Maryland! my Maryland!' yet stirs that heart like a drum, and will not so cease to stir it, I hope, until it ceases to beat for good and all."

These are simple and manly words. No one will be so churlish as to grudge Mr. Sala his sympathetic heart-stirrings; and we quote the passage with pleasure, not only because it is honourable to the writer of it, but because it probably explains a good deal of the almost fanatical partisanship of other English Southerners besides the author of these volumes.

It is quite unnecessary to say that America Revisited is an exceedingly readable and amusing book, because Mr. Sala seems to find it impossible to write anything that is unreadable or dull. To say that he has wonderful powers of observation, is to do him less than justice, because, in general use, the meaning of the word "observation" is limited to the intellectual apprehension of impressions made on one sense only,—that of sight; while Mr. Sala has brought not merely his sight, but all his other senses, into the highest possible training as purveyors of material for literature. This, though a valuable acquirement, is, as a means to certain ends, a somewhat dangerous one. It gives to single facts an interest with which the mind is for the time satisfied, and out of this satisfaction springs the temptation to pass from this small fact to that, without any thought of those larger facts of relation which alone are the objects of intellectual, as opposed to merely sensuous perception. This is the temptation which has beset Mr. Sala, and it must be said that he has yielded to it, apparently without a struggle. In his former book, he gave expression to opinions which turned out to be wrong; in the present work, he saves himself from a repetition of the humiliation by carefully excluding from his pages, not merely opinions, but, for the most part, even the raw material of classified facts out of which opinion is manufactured.

Of course, it may frankly be admitted that, at this time of day, it is difficult to treat the social aspects of American life with breadth and, at the same time, with novelty; but surely there is some happy mean between hackneyed generalisations and the scrappy details with which Mr. Sala fills his two large volumes. As we have already remarked, many of these details are entertaining enough in themselves, and even when they are not, Mr. Sala's treatment always makes them so; but of the great majority of them, nothing more than this can be said, and we should hardly exaggerate, did we declare that all the matter in this work which adds to our real knowledge of the United States of two years ago could be compressed into less than fifty pages. We do not, however, wish to be guilty of unfairness, and perhaps it is a little unfair to blame Mr. Sala for not being instructive, when he so consistently refrains from giving himself the airs of an instructor. As a lively record of the author's personal experiences, the book is all that could be desired, and as the production of such a record was probably all that he had in view, it may be well for us to remember Pope's capital piece of advice to the critic:—

"In every work regard the writer's end, Since none can compass more than he intend."

A brick is hardly satisfactory as a sample of a house, but half-a-dozen bricks may give a very fair idea of the quality of a load, and America Revisited is a book which can be sampled by quotation much more adequately than it can be described by comment. Our first extract has some claim to be considered instructive, for it describes a minor development of civilisation which ought to make us ashamed of the comparative barbarity of English methods, and which we do not remember to have seen previously noticed:—

"The arrangements for setting down and taking up at public places of amusement in New York strike me as being admirable. There is no hurry, no confusion, no rudeness, no extortion, and no unnecessary delay. An adequate force of stalwart, intelligent, and obliging policemen is always on hand. I am perfectly well aware that the New York police are being violently abused for the addiotedness to 'clubbing' people,—that is to say, to brain them on slight provocation with their truncheons. All I know is that they did not club me, and that whenever I asked a question of a constable, he answered me politely. When you alight from your coupé, a ticket bearing a number is handed to you. Another ticket, bearing the same number, is given to your coachman, who knows where to take up his stand, and who promptly responds to the summons of the police, when he is wanted. There is no frenzied shrieking of 'Mrs. Smith's carriage' stopping the way. Nobody's carriage stops the way. Mrs. Smith is Number Sixty, or Number One Hundred and Ten, as the case may be; and when the carriage is called, it comes."

This is a lesson which it will be well for us to learn from our American cousins, as speedily as may be; but Mr. Sala seems to think that in one little detail of railway management they have something to learn from us. To the generally admirable qualities of the railway system in the States, he pays the usual tribute, but complains strongly of the serious annoyance to which the traveller is subjected by the frequent collection of tickets:—

"The 'conductor' or guard seems to be always 'at you.' For example, between New York and Richmond I was asked to show my ticket, or rather to pay fragments of fare—for circumstances over which I had no control debarred me from booking right through—first at Jersey City, secondly at Philadelphia, thirdly at Baltimore, fourthly at Washington, and fifthly at Quantico, a little river-side station between Alexandria and Richmond. Dozing off into slumber, composing yourself to read, subsiding into meditation and the enjoyment of a cigar, it was all one. The inevitable conductor, a glaring lantern in his hand, ruthlessly woke you up, or implacably interposed between yourself and your cogitations, and demanded your ticket."

Perhaps this blot may not really be as large as it seems to Mr. Sala. On a first perusal of the passage, we were stirred to much sympathy with his broken slumbers and interrupted meditations; but on second thoughts, it occurred to us that in a journey by ordinary train from London to Edinburgh, the ticket-collector would make quite as many incursions, and if Mr. Sala were not to book through, he would not, in this country, be able to pay his way onwards without the inconvenience of leaving the train, so that in spite of the ruthlessness of the man with the lantern, the balance of advantage seems even here to be with Brother Jonathan.

Mr. Sala has a stronger case when he attacks the church-bell nuisance, as it exists in American cities. Even in England, the ding-dong of the half-hour before service-time is, in some places, somewhat trying; but here the bell is, for the most part, a monopoly of the Established Church, while in the United States, where the Liberation Society's ideal of religious equality is realised, every church—chapels are never heard of—boasts or may boast its steeple, and every steeple has its bell or bells, which, as Mr. Sala savagely remarks, "boom and bawl from sunrise to sunset, as though they were so many hotel gongs, calling guests to theological meals." The bells were, however, only one element in Mr. Sala's American Sunday troubles. He is severe upon the Sabbatarianism of a large number of the States, and he has a theory to account for its maintenance which, at any rate, possesses the merit of novelty. He states it thus:—

"On more than one occasion, I have taken the liberty to observe that the American Sunday, so far as I have had the opportunity of observing it, was socially a day of tribulation. . . . In the Northern and Middle States, so it seems to me—but I am, of course, as in all things, open to conviction—the rigid Puritanical or Mosaic observance of Sunday is prescribed by the laws of the State. Those laws are in the highest degree acceptable to a class who, by right and custom, are socially by far the most influential in the United States,—I mean the ladies. Women do not frequent bars or barbers' shops; they are not given—in this country, at least—to driving fast-trotting horses; they do not smoke cigars; and they are extremely fond of going to church, of wearing their finest clothing thereat, and of listening to emotional music, and to preachers who are either emotional or comic, or sometimes both. The sermons of the most popular of the New York clergymen are literally as good as a play; and with plenty of stirring music, and pulpit oratory appealing either to the risible or the lachrymose faculties, there is surely no reason, so far as feminine New York is concerned, why the theatres should be opened on Sunday. Thus, Lovely Woman, both from a devotional and a recreative point of view, hails Sunday as a sweet boon."

There may be something in this hypothesis; but, as Mr. Freeman has recently pointed out, there is in many other matters besides this of Sunday observance "a vast deal of Conservative feeling, or at least of Conservative habit, at work in the United States;" and to speak of the great Western Republic as in every respect a "go-ahead" community, is to indulge in one of those vague generalisations concerning national character which do so much harm, because their simplicity gives them an attractiveness which is not possessed by the complexity of truth. So far as Sabbatarianism is concerned, there are in many of the States such numerous survivals of Puritan traditions, that it seems gratuitous to separate one from the rest, and to try to find some special cause for it.

The evidences of the "go-ahead" instinct are, however, much more wide-spread and obvious than those which testify to a lingering Conservatism; and Mr. Sala's descriptions of the changes which had taken place, both in material and social development, during the interval which had elapsed between his two visits, give one an almost overwhelming impression of the possibilities of American progress, at any rate in certain directions. An amusing illustration of what we are wont to consider typical Yankee characteristics is given in an anecdote of a man of Chicago, who, on the day after the first fire, put up in the midst of the mass of smouldering ruins a pole, surmounted by a board bearing the plucky inscription,—“All lost, except wife, children, and energy. Real-estate agency carried on as usual in the next shanty.” Buoyancy of this kind will lift either a man or a community over innumerable difficulties; and we read without surprise, but with a good deal of sympathetic satisfaction, that “the undismayed real-estate agent is alive to tell the tale, a prosperous gentleman, who proudly exhibits the ‘wife, children, and energy’ placard in his handsome office.” Some of the go-ahead developments, particularly certain recent manifestations of journalistic enterprise, in which Mr. Sala is naturally interested, are not quite so edifying as this Chicago story. The latest feat of the “interviewer,” described in the following sentences, is surely a climax to all previous impertinencies of this shameless personage:—

“A few days after I visited the Toms, the twelve men sentenced to death were ‘interviewed’ seriatim by a zealous reporter of the New York Herald, who endeavoured to elicit from them their respective views as to the expediency of capital punishment, and the particular form of death which they would prefer, supposing that they admitted the punishment to be expedient. To speak by the card, there were only ten catechumens actually awaiting strangulation, as the sentence on two of their number had been commuted to imprisonment for life just before the reporter arrived. Two more of the misérables refused point-blank to answer the questions put to them; but the eight remaining were explicit enough. They were all dead against hanging. One man said that if he must needs be put to death, he should like to be drowned, and another avowed a partiality for being shot; a third wanted to be poisoned; another suggested electricity, ‘or something scientific of that kind;’ while yet another modestly hinted that he thought all the requirements of his case might be met, if he were ‘sent to the mines.’ Their opinions as to the justifiability of their having shed the blood of their fellow-creatures were not taken.”

This is disgusting enough in itself, but it would be much more disgusting, were it really symptomatic of the condition of public taste in the United States; and that this is not the case is hardly indicated with sufficient clearness by Mr. Sala, who, though never aggressively unfair, is too apt to follow the bad example set by Dickens in laying stress upon facts that are exceptional and abnormal, rather than upon those which are ordinary and characteristic. Such a writer is naturally least successful in dealing with the more solid portions of his work. Mr. Sala's account of the condition of the Southern freedmen, which might have been made very valuable, seems to us singularly superficial and inadequate; while his sketch of the Negro Members of the State Legislatures is spoiled, by that spurious picturesqueness of treatment which leaves it doubtful where serious portraiture ends and caricature begins. Had Mr. Sala devoted the numerous pages now filled with amusingly appreciative criticism of meats and drinks to a record of really illuminating and characteristic facts, his book would have been a valuable addition to our knowledge; as it is, it is only an addition to the stock of what, for want of a better name, we may call circulating-library literature. The execution of the numerous woodcuts illustrating the book is admirable throughout. As designs, they have both the merits and the defects of the letterpress they accompany.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The new number of the Scottish Review, which may yet do good work of various kinds north of the Tweed, is a decided improvement upon its predecessor, in respect of the style of its articles, and of the firmness of the grip their authors have of the subjects they deal with. There is a freshness about the number which gives it a special place among our quarterlies; and it is a decided novelty for a magazine of the kind to open its columns to free discussion of subjects of controversy. To many readers, the first article, on the late Dr. Tait, will be the most interesting. It is evidently written by one who knew the late Primate thoroughly. From the personal and anecdotal point of view, indeed, it is perhaps the most notable article on the subject that has appeared anywhere. The tone of the papers on the late James Clerk Maxwell and “Medical Reform” is excellent; there is much that is interesting in another, on “The Scots Guards in France;” and the Marquis of Bute gives not a little out-of-the-way information in his discourse on “Ancient Celtic Latin Hymns.” A study of “Mr. Gladstone and the Future of British Politics” is clear, and moderate in tone. The writer goes out of the beaten track in tracing a connection between the religious earnestness of the earlier, and the Liberalism of the later, portion of Mr. Gladstone's career; he also takes a hopeful view of the future, and of the demeanour of the “new democracy.” We are rather disappointed with Dr. Walter Smith's poem of “A Minister's Mistake.” It seems to have been written in haste, and it shows a spice of what we can only call “mawkishness.” A clergyman who marries his vulgar landlady's under-bred daughter should not only submit to his lot, but take Mr. Arnold's advice, and "neither strive nor cry." If the third number of this Review shows as much improvement on the second as the second has done on the first, we should say its permanent success is assured.

A History of English Rhythms. By Edwin Guest, LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.S. Edited by the Rev. Walter W. Skeat, M.A. (George Bell and Sons).—We can do little more than chronicle the appearance of the new edition of Dr. Guest's great work, one of the books which may be called epoch-making. All that could be found in the way of correction and later observation by the author has been carefully incorporated, and Professor Skeat has been able, as was to be expected, to add many valuable remarks of his own. Besides this, he has bestowed upon the book a large amount of work, which has not been the less laborious because its results are, except in the preface, unclaimed and inconspicuous. One item of this work was the compilation of an index to authors quoted throughout a volume of 700 pages. Another item has consisted in verifying the references; what this means, may be estimated from the fact that in the original "F. Q." served as reference to Spenser's Fairy Queen, and "W. Scott" only was appended to quotations from songs in the Waverley Novels. "It must be borne in mind that Dr. Guest was quite a pioneer in Middle-English literature, and had to get together a large quantity of his quotations by the laborious process of transcribing them for himself from the manuscripts, and had nothing but these transcripts to trust to; there was not even at that time any edition of Layamon or of the Ormulum, nor was the Early English Text Society founded till nearly thirty years after his book appeared. Hence it often happened that exact references could not be given, nor could the passages cited be revised while passing through the press. . . . The difficulty of discovering the whereabouts of many of these has been very great, and in a few cases search has been baffled." In many cases, the author had "to work with the very imperfect materials supplied by inaccurate and careless editions, a difficulty which at the present date does not exist, so that we can hardly appreciate at its right value the wonderful industry which reduced such materials to order." In other cases, again, the author had to quote at second-hand. A curious result of this appears in a note to p. 283, where Dr. Guest, on the rhythm, "O Troy, Troy! there is no boote but bale," observes, "Compare the following: a broad beam: to please some curious taste. This line is cited from Waller, in Todd's Johnson, s.v. Bream." Professor Skeat "found the line, after some search, in Waller's Battle of Somer Islands, c. 3; and it turns out that the rhythm of the line is quite different, the word as being omitted from the beginning." We need scarcely commend the book to serious students. The makers of books already know it well: "Dr. Guest's great work has long been the convenient storehouse whence many writers upon prosody have drawn their illustrations, sometimes without any acknowledgment that they have done so."

The "Fan Kwae" at Canton before Treaty Days, 1825-1844. By an Old Resident. (Kegan Paul).—The "Old Resident's" gossip is distinctly entertaining. He takes us back to a time, only forty years ago, when the world seemed ten times larger than it is now, when one-half of it was shrouded in mystery, leaving so much more room for the imagination to work, when it took four months to go from England to China, and when life in general was lived on the same leisurely scale. His sketches of the life of the "Fan Kwae" ("Foreign Devils") in Canton and Macao in these pleasant old days are quite unpretentious, but very attractive, and make one long for a year of the leisurely life now gone for ever. The relations between the foreigner and the Chinese were, as a rule, perfectly amicable; both seem to have conducted their business in a strictly honourable manner, though no binding documents passed between them, and both realised enormous fortunes. The sketches of some of the native merchants are highly to their credit, though we fear that since the ports were opened, both they and the foreigners have deteriorated. There is a portrait given of Houqua, the leading Chinese merchant in the author's time, a man of genuine kindness of heart and princely liberality, whose fortune was calculated at something like five million pounds sterling. He would think nothing of writing off a debt of 700,000 dollars to oblige an "olo fen" ("old friend"), or giving a subscription of a million to some public object. Merchants, native and foreign (the author is an American), compradores, mandarins, skippers, clerks, money-changers, and many other functionaries appear in our author's pages, which we commend to any one in search of a soothing hour or two's reading.

Cassell's Natural History. Edited by P. Martin Duncan, M.B. 6 vols. (Cassell and Co.).—This work, the publication of which in monthly parts has been continued through a period of six years, is now complete. We have noticed the annual volumes from time to time, as they have appeared, and now need only repeat the high opinion of their merit which we have before expressed. The names and reputation of the contributors, among whom may be mentioned Professors Garrod, H. G. Seely, and Boyd Dawkins, Dr. Murie, Messrs. Dallas and H. Woodward, and Miss Agnes Crane, are a sufficient guarantee for the scientific merit of the work. For its literary value, we can ourselves vouch. The art of making science interesting to the unscientific is an accomplishment which all Professor Duncan's contributors, we think we may say without exception, have acquired. The result is a book which we may recommend without reserve. The price of the six volumes is surprisingly small, when we consider the excellence both of the text and of the very numerous illustrations.

Some of a series of Present-Day Tracts (Religious Tract Society) are before us. Dr. Blaikie's Witness of Palestine to the Bible is an able argument. The writer contends that the position and natural features of Palestine fit it exactly for being the scene of the working-out of the Divine purpose which the Old Testament sets forth; and that, in fact, the history of the Hebrew people, from the Call of Abraham downwards, is unintelligible and contradictory, unless we suppose such a purpose underlying it. Canon Rawlinson writes on The Antiquity of Man, Historically Considered. He deals with the subject from the point of view which he is especially qualified to take, the records found in Egyptian and Assyrian remains. Strong arguments may be brought forward by those who would bring the history of the most ancient civilisations of which we have any knowledge within limits not much exceeding the accepted chronology, and Canon Rawlinson states them with proper force. But he seems to go beyond his brief, when he says that there are no traces of the primitive savage. The scientific argument is, we are told, to be separately treated. Meanwhile, such a very sweeping assertion as this about the savage, opposed, as it seems to be, to what we know about the cave-men and the implements found in the drift, seems somewhat out of place. We find ourselves quite in accord with the general argument of Agnosticism: a Doctrine of Despair, by the Rev. Noah Porter, D.D.; but it would have been better, perhaps, to avoid the use of "atheism" as a synonym for "agnosticism." Even Mr. Bradlaugh, we see, emphatically declares that he has never denied the existence of a God.

The Book of Common Prayer, with Commentary for Teachers and Students. (S.P.C.K.).—Several writers of repute, among whom we may mention Professor Bright, Dr. Maclear, and Dr. Rawson Lumby, have contributed to this very useful and instructive little book. Its tone, especially in the articles that deal with the Sacramental and quasi-Sacramental services, is distinctly "High," but taken with whatever reserve the reader may think proper to make on this account, the "Commentary" is all that could be desired. Professor Bright's notes on the Collects are especially to be mentioned. The history of these beautiful prayers—beautiful, indeed, but, we fear, beyond the comprehension of many who use them—is most interesting. It should never be forgotten that many of those which, both for sentiment and rhythm, are most perfect (e.g., Advent, Quinquagesima, and Good Friday—third), are the work of Cranmer and his fellow-compilers of the Prayer-book of 1549, men for whom a certain school of Anglican writers can find no terms of abuse strong enough.

Where to Emigrate: a Handy Guide to All the English Colonies. (Wyman and Sons).—The writer tells us that his own knowledge of the various colonies has been supplemented by assistance given by the Agents of the several Colonial Governments, by whom he has been supplied with the latest data. The book furnishes the intending emigrant with information as to the nature of the soil, the climate, available markets, price of land, house-rent, cost of passage, rates of wages, &c. To take an instance:—A compositor can get to Auckland, in New Zealand, for £16. Arrived there, he can earn £2 10s. a week. A four-roomed cottage will cost him 12s. per week. Bread will be rather dearer than it is here; butter certainly cheaper (about 1s. per lb.); cheese about the same, as also sugar and tea; and beef and mutton about a third of the English price, (3½d.)

Archibald Campbell Tait: a Sketch of the Public Life of the Late Archbishop of Canterbury. By A. C. Bickley. (Nisbet and Co.).—This is a fairly satisfactory specimen of the books which are always called forth by the death of an eminent man. Mr. Bickley has, we gather from some of his statements, special acquaintance with his subject, he has used generally available authorities with diligence, while he has been guided by moderation and good-taste. It is a little odd to be told that Mr. Tait was "one of the examiners of the University, and a member and one of the presidents of the debating society," as if these honours were simultaneously held. But the book seems generally correct. It will be new to most readers to hear that the Archbishop, when tutor of Balliol, was very desirous of obtaining the Professorship of Greek at Glasgow, but was shut out from it by his being in Holy Orders, and that his application for the Head-mastership of Rugby was sent in at actually the last moment.

Chroniques du Temps Passé: le Conte de l'Archer. Par Armand Silvestre. Aquarelles de A. Poirson, gravées par Gillot. (Lahure, Paris).—This is a beautiful specimen of French typography, embodying a charming story of an archer. It tells how the archer, Bignolet, was trained by his parents to love the noble calling of arms; how he entered on a campaign, gaining great fame and the love of many beautiful ladies; and how, in the end, everything turned out to the happiness of himself and those he loved. The great attraction of the book is the many beautiful water-colour vignettes, by Poirson, successfully reproduced by Labure in chromotypography. The book would be an acceptable present to any one who knows a little French, and wants some inducement to improve it.

We have received a useful little edition of Othello, by E. R. Parnell, M.A. (Rivingtons.)—The introduction summarises very well the argument for the generally-accepted division of Shakespeare's Plays, and for the position of Othello among them. Mr. Parnell assigns it to 1604. The notes are much to the point, and certainly not excessive in quantity. Twenty-seven pages of annotation to more than eighty of text is certainly a very moderate allowance.—With this, we may mention, though it is not a school-book, A Study of "The Princess," by S. E. Dawson. (Dawson Brothers, Montreal.)—It contains a general criticism, of which the poet certainly will not be able to complain as grudging in its praise, and some carefully-prepared notes. We seldom have the opportunity of seeing any literature from Canada, and gladly welcome this pleasing specimen.

NOVELS.—Keith's Wife. By Lady Violet Greville. 3 vols. (Bentley and Son.)—If we were to cut out of these three volumes all that is unnecessary for the development of the plot, the story would be reduced to a very moderate compass indeed. Fifty pages might remain out of the first volume, which is occupied with the circumstances which lead up to Dorothy Strait becoming Mrs. Keith Chester. That the bridegroom is a person of doubtful antecedents who has become rich in a suspicious way, and that there are certain persons who threaten danger to his married happiness, are about the only essential things that we find in it. In the second volume, the danger develops itself; but the visit to Venice, and especially the flirtation with the Marchesa, might have been retrenched, unless, indeed, it is the author's purpose not only to show that Mr. Chester had behaved badly in the past, but to destroy all our sympathy with him, by proving that he is not in the least improved. The third volume clears up the mystery in a very lame fashion. Dorothy's inquiry, "Do you expect me to believe this horrible story?" exactly expresses the incredulity which every reader will feel at Keith's explanation. The fact is, that Lady Violet Greville has wasted undoubted power on a most unpromising, and, indeed, hopeless subject. She manages her dialogue with skill, and her characters are life-like, Lady Darlington being specially good; but the story is naught.—The Golden Shaft. By Charles Gibbon. 3 vols. (Chatto and Windus.)—Mr. Gibbon makes the interest of his story depend upon one of those curious complications which threaten the happiness of lovers, more frequently, it must be allowed, in fiction than in the world of facts. John Armour has a father whose history is a sore burden upon the son. He had given up to justice a man whom he believed to have led his wife astray. We might ask, perhaps, whether a murderer ought not to be given up, even if he has established this claim on the informer's forbearance. He is in great doubt whether this fact will not hinder his wooing. But, by a singular coincidence, the father of the lady whom he loves is mixed up in the same affair, and makes himself a claimant on Armour's forbearance by nearly killing the guilty father. Things are ultimately cleared up. The criminal, it seems, had given himself up before the information was laid; the wife had not been guilty (the supposed seducer was courting her sister, and kissed the wife, with the idea of furthering his suit); and the other little difficulty is got over by the sufferer's forbearing silence. This, it must be said, is not a very happily-conceived story; but then Mr. Gibbon tells it well. His volumes are excellent reading. There is not a single character in them but is vigorously drawn; men and women are equally good—a very rare merit—though we should be inclined to give the palm to the minister, with his kindly and humorous wisdom.—Rachel's Share of the Road. (Osgood and Co., Boston, U.S.)—The "road," in American parlance, signifies "railroad." Rachel's share in it is to see into the hard and unjust system on which it is managed—her father is the president—and to redress, as far as may be, the wrongs thus caused. These wrongs make an English reader open his eyes. Is it possible that in the States a wealthy corporation fails to pay its employés' wages regularly, and that its high-placed officials make a profit out of the advances which the workmen are compelled to solicit, a profit of fifty cents in the dollar? Rachel is a fine, honest, high-spirited girl, of whom it is a pleasure to read, and the doctor who wins her is worthy of her. But the best character in the book is Mrs. Shackles, who is "no hand at beggin'," but contrives to get a good many presents, nevertheless. There is one delightful scene, between her and a smart young lady who is anxious to make her "know her place." She has been hinting her want of a hat. "A hat of mine," says the lady, "would scarcely be a proper thing for you to wear." Mrs. Shackles replies, "Well, now! do you think they ain't proper, too? Now, I don't mind telling ye that I've all'ays thought them I've seen ye have on was kind of flighty-tighty, an' hardly respectable-like."

ROWLANDS'

ODONTO.

Has been celebrated for more than half a century as the best, purest, and most fragrant preparation for the teeth ever made; it whitens and preserves the teeth, imparts to them a pearl-like whiteness, strengthens the gums, and gives a pleasing fragrance to the breath. Health depends in a great measure upon the soundness of the teeth, and all dentists will allow that neither washes nor paste can possibly be as efficacious for polishing the teeth, and keeping them sound and white, as a pure and non-gritty tooth powder; such Rowlands' Odonto has always proved itself to be. DELHI MEDICAL MISSION (S.P.G.)—Established 1867.—The First Female Medical Mission begun in India.

The Delhi and South Punjab Mission of the S.P.G. carries on its work among over 3,000,000 of people, and besides Delhi and its suburbs, occupies fifty towns and villages. Its work is carried on,—(1) By training native agents. (2) By philanthropical agencies, of which the most important is medical work among women and children. (3) By day and night schools for boys and young men, with 1,535 pupils. (4) By zananah missions, with 792 pupils. (5) By dividing the city and country into districts, giving each a systematic parochial organisation, for both Christians and non-Christians. The Medical Mission attended 12,983 cases, with an average of 121 sick attended daily. Owing to the growth of the work, the Missionaries are responsible for raising £1,500 a year, over and above annual grants from the Society and Government.

Subscriptions for the general work, or for the Medical Mission in particular, will be gladly received and acknowledged by the Rev. Canon CROWFOOT, Minister Yard, Lincoln; by the Rev. R. R. WINTER, Delhi; or by the Rev. W. O. BROMHEAD, Kensington Palace, W.

BONUS RESULTS.

The PROFITS paid in Cash by the SUN LIFE OFFICE are exceptionally large, surpassing those hitherto given, and for which the Society has been so justly noted, and averaging 173 per Cent. of the Annual Premium (more than 1½ Premiums) now payable in cash;

or
284 per Cent. of the Annual Premium (more than 2½ Premiums) added to the sum assured.

Exemplified more fully, at the average age 35, by the following table:—

Years in Force.	Original Premium	Cash.	Reversion.	Premium Reduced to future profits.
5	age 35,	£ 41 8 1	£ 87 16 1	£ 25 19 9
10		46 14 9	91 17 1	23 3 8
15		46 13 7	84 4 4	19 19 8
20	£1,000,	46 14 11	76 13 11	16 7 8
25		55 8 10	83 6 8	11 6 5
30	£28 6 8	72 8 8	101 16 6	3 12 8
		£200 8 5	£252 14 7	£311 entitled to future profits.

Assuming future profits are as large (which may be confidently expected, owing to the increasing business and large reserves of the Company). New Entrants may anticipate that, on a Policy for £1,000, the Bonus will, after 30 years, amount to £235; the Cash (with 4 per cent. interest) equal £205; or yield a continual reduction of the Premium amounting to £24 1s.

Agree other than 35 in proportion to the Premiums charged.

N.B.—Bonus Options at each Division. No Partnership Liability. Modern Practice. Simple Proposal Forms. Immediate Settlements.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

ON Thursday, Sir Stafford Northcote asked for a day on which he might move for his Committee to inquire into the circumstances attending the release of Mr. Parnell, Mr. Dillon, and Mr. O'Kelly from Kilmainham in April last, which Mr. Gladstone declined to give, first, because he regarded the debate on Mr. Gorst's amendment to the Address as a debate virtually on that subject, and a victory for the Government; and next, because such a committee would be prejudicial to the administration of justice under very trying circumstances in Ireland. Thereupon, Sir S. Northcote replied that, as the Government had now, "for the third time, declined to give any assistance to those who desire to bring forward a motion which had its origin in a suggestion and challenge made by the Prime Minister," it would be useless and unnecessary to persevere,—useless because no inquiry could be made effectual without the concurrence of the Government, and unnecessary because the inferences suggested by the refusal are "obvious, and need no emphasising on my part." This was meant to hint, we suppose, that Sir S. Northcote regards the Government as having virtually acknowledged that they are guilty of that of which they are accused—namely, concluding a treaty with Mr. Parnell, by which he should agree to support them if they would let him free,—the only difficulty of which hypothesis is that Mr. Parnell never has supported them; and that, so far as Parliament is concerned, his release has been productive of much more annoyance than his imprisonment itself. It is hardly possible that Sir Stafford Northcote should really believe his own insinuations.

On Monday, the case against the editor, proprietor, and publisher of the Freethinker, for a blasphemous libel,—a case which failed last week in consequence of the disagreement of the jury,—was tried again at the Central Criminal Court, before Mr. Justice North, and resulted in a conviction. The Christmas Number of the Freethinker for 1882 was, as is admitted on all sides, a very gross and indecent attack on the Christian faith, illustrating, in the form of coarse and blasphemous pictures, as well as letter-press, the views of the editor as to the ridiculousness of that faith. There was no doubt as to the responsibility of Mr. Foote, the editor, Mr. Ramsey, the registered proprietor, and Mr. Kemp, the printer and publisher, for the appearance of this number. The result was that Mr. Foote was sentenced to a year's imprisonment, Mr. Ramsey to nine months' imprisonment, and Mr. Kemp to three months' imprisonment, for the offence. The scene in Court was painful in the extreme. Foote called out, "My Lord, I thank you; it is worthy of your creed." There was a storm of hissing, and there were loud, ironical cries of "Christian!" "Christian!" while one woman was carried out of Court in a swoon. We have discussed the sentence elsewhere, which we regard as much too severe.

Blasphemy, as an offence against God,—which is its legal essence,—is not one that we ought to punish at all. And blasphemy, as a wanton offence to the most sacred feelings of men, though it should be punishable and punished, should be very lightly punished when committed by men who are but half-educated, and not likely to appreciate the nature of the feelings which they wound. In all cases of offences against Christianity, it is clearly safest to follow the guidance of that Christian charity which "suffereth long and is kind."

The cost of the Egyptian Expedition has, so far, not been great. It appears from a Treasury Minute of February 17th that the total cost is £4,558,000, of which £3,416,000 is expended by the United Kingdom, and £1,142,000 by India. As compared with other wars, this is a very small total, but the English share is not quite so little as it looks. There is a feeling against saddling India with expenditure, and a grant of £500,000 is therefore to be voted in reduction of her share. That is generous, but we are not sure that it is wise. But for India, Egypt would be nothing to us. The expenditure was ordered mainly to protect the Indian gateway, and India ought to pay her share of what is practically her own expense. If she does not, we shall one day see a party spring up here which declares that India is a burden to the finances, and had better be given back to its Native Princes. As it is, the cost of our wars with Russia, which are meaningless except as wars for the protection of India, is borne exclusively by Great Britain. We are bound to add, however, that if one statement of the Indian Government is true, and the average income of natives per head is only £2 14s. a year, almost any grant-in-aid may be justified. That is equal to only £13 10s. a year per house, or 5s. 2d. a week per family, a sum below the worst average of the poorest districts of Italy.

The new Ministry in France is, apparently, to be allowed to exist. The Extremists on Monday tried their strength by proposing a revision of the Constitution, which M. Jules Ferry resisted with some determination. He said that the proposal was useless, that the Senate would reject it, and that he should resign at once, rather than become a "carrier of messages for the purpose of receiving rebuffs." He pleaded for a vote, but the Chamber, by 275 to 207, insisted on an adjournment. This was considered ominous, but it turned out that the Chamber only wanted to hear M. Clémenceau; and after he had spoken on Tuesday, the Deputies voted confidence in the Government by 340 to 139. Business is allowed to proceed very rapidly, and during the debate some strong opinions were expressed that no Ministerial crisis must be allowed for some time. The unforeseen usually happens in France, but it is, at all events, conceivable that M. Jules Ferry will remain Premier for six months,—a very long time in French politics.

The Americans have been withdrawing gold this week, about £450,000, and the price of all Securities is falling. It is evident from the condition of the Exchanges that more will be withdrawn, and the dealers are panic-stricken by a story that an American Syndicate may be selling American Bonds largely, so as to withdraw gold, and cause a general fall in prices. That certainly might be done, but so it might at any time during the past ten years, and the point unexplained is the modus operandi of Vanderbilt, Jay Gould, and the rest cannot sell American Bonds for gold in London in large masses without bringing down the price of them in New York also, for the two markets respond within a few hours, and how would that pay them? No doubt, they control formidable masses of wealth, but so do other capitalists, and the protection against such a use of it is the old truth that a general fall in the value of securities can never benefit the rich. If a "corner" in gold were tried in England on a big scale, Mr. Gladstone would say three words about the Bank Act, the panic would cease, and the Americans would be caught, as Jay Gould once was by his own Treasury, in a regular trap.

It would seem that an English jury, when it gets an opportunity of fining Mr. Biggar, thinks that such an opportunity ought not to be neglected on the slight plea that the evidence is hardly adequate to sustain satisfactorily the case against him. Miss Hyland's case against him for breach of promise of marriage, tried on Thursday in the Queen's Bench, was not a strong one, as Lord Coleridge pointed out; but there was, we suppose, enough evidence to convince a jury decidedly predisposed to convict Mr. Biggar, especially as in breach-of-promise cases the rules of evidence, against men at least, are always construed in a manner not very satisfactory to them, though very satisfactory to the damsels whom they are supposed to have deserted. Miss Hyland claimed £5,000 damages, and the jury awarded only £400, a tolerably moderate course for a jury probably prejudiced against Mr. Biggar, and certainly not likely to have formed any better opinion of him from the nature of the evidence with which he furnished them for the estimate of his character. He appears to have taken a very cautious course as regards the lady, to whom he never wrote very affectionately, though he admitted kissing her and telling her of "obstacles" to his marriage with her,—these obstacles, as it appeared subsequently, being two natural children for whom he had to provide. Taking everything into account, the verdict, though we cannot say we could have concurred in it, was not as excessive as might, under the circumstances, have been expected. Juries in breach-of-promise cases rarely act with even so much scrupulousness as the jurymen who gave damages against Mr. Biggar.

The news of the week from Ireland consists mainly of rumours, most of them little better than gossip derived from detectives. It appears certain, however, that Mr. Egan, Secretary to the Land League, has left Ireland secretly, that Walsh, the Fenian of Middlesborough, who went over to Ireland to found the "Invincibles," has been arrested at Havre, and that important papers have been found in his lodgings at Rochdale. It is not known yet if Walsh will be given up by the French Government, but according to the latest accounts, that Government, which is by no means in good humour, has found the evidence against Mr. F. Byrne too weak, and he will not be given up. The Irreconcilables in France and the Extreme Irish in America protest against extradition, but we see no sign as yet that anything will be considered except the evidence. It must not be forgotten that such applications are difficulties for all Governments, and that every extradition on evidence offered by an honest Government becomes a precedent when evidence is offered by a dishonest one. If the French do not scrutinise proofs advanced by Lord Lyons, they cannot scrutinise proofs adduced by Embassies which they trust a great deal less. Even the Union has often to deal with police very different from our own.

There was an interesting discussion yesterday week on a resolution of Mr. O'Shaughnessy's, seconded by Lord Lynton, in favour of the application of the principle of compulsion to Irish education. Mr. O'Shaughnessy brought out that though 90 per cent. of the children who ought to go to school in Ireland are really on the rolls, this is in reality only nominal, a very considerable number of them not attending often enough to get any real instruction. The average daily attendance is only 453,000, though 1,100,000 are nominally on the rolls. Forty-one per cent. of the children on the rolls make less than 80 attendances in the year, and more than half the children on the rolls make less than 100 attendances in the year. Dr. Lyon Playfair,—who was yesterday week succeeded in the Chairmanship of Committees by Sir Arthur Otway,—made a very interesting speech, in which he brought out the fact that a much larger proportion of Irish criminals than of English and Scotch criminals can read and write,—a fact which he attributed to the inadequacy of their teaching, but which Mr. O'Connor Power attributed, with more plausibility, to the deficiency of remunerative labour, seeing that so many more Irish criminals retain, during their criminal practices, the learning they have gained at school, while English and Scotch criminals have been either wholly destitute of learning, or, having acquired a little for a time, have yet lost it again. Mr. Trevelyan accepted for the Government Mr. O'Shaughnessy's resolution, though declining to put it in force at once, and pointing out the great delicacy of the position in relation to the religious difficulty in Ireland, and also the difficulty caused by poverty, distance from any school, and want of proper clothing. Mr. Trevelyan announced that the Treasury had consented to a grant for the organisation of proper training schools for Irish teachers, which would, he hoped, add greatly to the efficiency of the Irish schools,—one cause of the low standard attained by the children. On the whole, the discussion was a very satisfactory one.

Lord Lansdowne on Monday moved for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the best means of promoting the acquisition by the peasants of a proprietary interest in the soil of Ireland, a motion supported by Lord Dunraven, in one of those inaccurate and irritating speeches, in which he is accustomed to accuse the Government of all the faults and flaws which are reflections of his own mind. The Government, he said, had done all in its power to discourage the loyal classes. They had, further, a fatal tendency to blunder in all their statements. He could recall no statement of the present Government which had not turned out "absolutely false and wrong." The Government had been wholly mistaken in supposing that the Land-League agitation was directed against high rents at all; it was directed against the Union with England. The state of things was growing worse, and the reductions of rent were growing larger. Lord Carlingford pointed out the blunders of Lord Dunraven. It was not in the least true that the reductions of rent were growing larger, as the Commission came to the great estates; the reductions were steadily diminishing. Lord Carlingford thought this was not the time for appointing a new Commission such as had been proposed. The minds of the peasantry were at present fixed on the amount of their rents, and not on the best mode of turning their security of tenure into absolute property, and it was best to deal with one subject at a time. So Lord Lansdowne, recognising that it was useless to press a Commission in the opportuneness of which the Government did not concur, withdrew his motion.

Mr. Anderson carried the second reading of his Bill against pigeon-shooting on Wednesday, by 195 votes against 40, but only at the cost of sacrificing the second clause, which was intended to give a remedy for cruelties committed on wild animals kept in captivity, like the wild creatures in a menagerie, or on the tame stags and bagged foxes which our so-called sportsmen delight to hunt. Lord Randolph Churchill made an admirable speech in favour of the Bill, and of this clause of it especially; but the most humane and amusing speech delivered was that of Mr. Blake. "It seemed to him that it was justifiable to kill animals either for food, or in order to destroy vermin, but the laws of God bade us in either case to end their sufferings in the speediest manner." Once, and once only, had he (Mr. Blake), gone out with the hounds, and then it was only to make himself useful to the fox, which he did by misleading the hunt,—a declaration received with great cheers and laughter by the House. We have no wish to see the law in advance of the conscience of society in these matters, but of this we are sure, that the conscience of society in these matters must some day be what the conscience of Mr. Blake is already.

Lord Stanhope's Bill prohibiting the payment of wages in public-houses,—on account of the overwhelming temptation which that choice of a locality causes to weak men to spend their wages in drink,—was read a second time in the House of Lords on Tuesday by a majority of 58 to 20. The discussion was very curious. Lord Bramwell moved its rejection, on the general principle that it was a bit of grandmotherly legislation; Lord Shaftesbury warmly supported it; Lord Granville and Lord Rosebery, though not "in love" with Bills of this kind, thought it one demanded by public opinion, and likely to remove a temptation to drink which no one had a right to force on the weak, and which the weak were not likely to remove for themselves. Lord Salisbury opposed the Bill, and then Lord Cairns, though he had disliked the Bill last year, cordially supported it this. And Lord Cairns prevailed. When he and Lord Salisbury differ, Lord Cairns, we notice, generally does prevail.

The Standard has sent a Correspondent to Madagascar, who announces that four French armed vessels have appeared off the north-west coast of that island, and that the Hovas are preparing for war. A large force has already assembled at the capital, and it is known that Queen Ranavalona can dispose of 20,000 very good men, who will fight under the shelter of their forests. Intermediately, the Europeans in the island are afraid of a general massacre, and believe that the Hovas may even renounce Christianity, many leading Malagasy declaring that the adoption of the new creed is the cause of all their woes. It does not make matters better to know that North-Western Madagascar, if conquered, is to be turned into a penal settlement for habitual criminals. M. Waldeck-Rousseau has announced that in the Chamber, the calculation of the French Government evidently being that the guardianship of convicts in Madagascar will be easy. If they fly a little way from the coast, the Sakalava police will catch them; and if they go still further, the Hovas will put them to death. Sentiment in France has clearly not extinguished cynicism.

The Lord Chancellor, on Thursday, brought in an important Bill regulating the inherent powers of English Courts to punish for contempt, or disobedience to their orders. Under the Bill, a Judge can only imprison for contempt for a maximum period of three months, while the maximum fine will be £500. If, however, the offender persists in his offence, the penalties may be inflicted de novo. The Bill further provides that when "specific performance" is ordered, the offender, if he declines to obey, may be held liable to pay any damage caused by his refusal; while, if the order is to produce documents, a sequestrator may seize them. Finally, if an order is issued to any officer, whether of a Civil or Ecclesiastical Court, and he declines to obey, the Court may fix a period during which obedience is imperative, and at the expiration of the term deprive the offender of his office. That proviso will so greatly enlarge the powers of Ecclesiastical Courts, especially under the Public Worship Act, that it must be carefully discussed in the Commons. One singular power is exempted from the operation of the Bill. The Lord Chancellor remains at liberty to punish any one marrying a Chancery ward without his consent by a term of imprisonment fixed at his discretion. It was impossible, the Chancellor said, in such cases to lay down any hard-and-fast rule.

Anarchists of different types, and with different objects, are now under trial in Russia, Austria, France, Spain, Belgium, and Ireland. They all profess to be moved by the sufferings of the poor, all deny personal aims, and all justify murder as a method, if other means of securing their objects fail. In the trials now proceeding at Vienna a new feature was developed. The Anarchist "circles" sought as their ends the destruction "of the throne, the altar, and the money-bag," and were subject to the usual discipline. One day, however, a general order was received to raise money even through crime, and circle two resolved to rob Herr Merstallinger, a master shoemaker, selected on account of his unpopularity. Two of the members, accordingly, chloroformed and robbed him of £78. There are said to be forty-two of these associations, and a member of one of them has been found in possession of cyanide of potassium—which when treated with acid develops prussic acid—"enough to poison 3,000 persons." Let us hope that he is a photographer, not a poisoner; but still, the existence of these circles in so many countries, and all ready to commit crime, constitutes a new and most formidable social danger.

Germany appears to be much interested in the resignation of the Prussian Minister of War, General von Kameke, who succeeded General von Roon in 1866. He is an elderly officer of great ability, and said to have been very popular with the Army. It is rumoured that his resignation was due to differences with the Emperor about the amount of pressure to be put on Parliament to induce it to vote higher pensions to officers; but in Germany, military affairs are State secrets, and the true reason may be a different one. Whatever it is, the resignation can hardly be of general importance. There are plenty of experienced Generals in the German Army, and the Emperor is quite certain to choose the one fittest for the work. He may make blunders in other departments, but he has not made one yet, unless he personally chose Count Arnim, which is not proved, in filling the great appointments of the State. It is reported that the new Minister will not be the Crown Prince's Adlatus, General von Blumenthal, as was at first imagined.

The Calcutta Correspondent of the Times states that the excitement created by the Bill subjecting Europeans to direct trial by Native Magistrates has extended to the Army. One officer doing duty in a large garrison states, in a letter to a local paper, that "the danger is most serious, and that it would be impossible to control the men, if a comrade were sentenced by a Native Judge." There is no doubt that the Army in India sympathises on this subject with the settlers, and that a native sentence on a soldier's wife might be followed by a serious mutiny; but the contingency stated can hardly arise, as the Cantonment Magistrate is invariably an officer. Those who remember the Naval outbreak, however, against the appointment of a native boatswain—an outbreak which succeeded, though it was hushed up—will recognise that there is danger in this direction, and swell the number of those who think the Bill had better be postponed. It is too much in advance of the sentiment of the ruling class, which will enforce itself, somehow. That would be no argument for an injustice, but there is no more injustice in the European's privilege than in the foreigner's demand in England to be tried by a mixed jury. In either case, the accused only asks to be tried by those who understand him. The case is greatly complicated in India by the fact that, while a native lady is exempt from examination in Court, a European lady is not, and thus Europeans will under the law be rendered in Native eyes an inferior caste.

It is curious with what persistency the Tories go on asserting that the Liberal Government is much more prodigal in its expenditure than the late Tory Government, taking as their only test the sums paid out of the Exchequer, a very considerable element of which consists in money spent on paying debts, and debts incurred by the Tories. Lord George Hamilton made this reckless statement in his Middlesex speech of Wednesday. The fact is that the total Liberal expenditure, exclusive of the payment of Debt was considerably less in the financial year ending March, 1882, than that of the Tory Government, and that the sum spent in the payment of Debt was much more. Even in this financial year, which is burdened with the expense of the Egyptian war, the expenditure, not counting payment of Debt, will be little more than that of the last year of Tory administration; while no less than £1,900,000 will be spent, as Sir John Lubbock showed last Friday week, in repaying debts incurred by the Tory Administration. Tory figures are almost more misleading than Tory rhetoric.

At the banquet given by the Lord Mayor on Wednesday to the bankers and merchants of London, Mr. Chamberlain made an interesting speech, chiefly on the failure of the present Bankruptcy Law to discourage fraud. He pointed out that the bankrupts have already taken alarm at his new Bill, and are urged by their advisers to get their certificates as soon as possible under the existing arrangements, seeing that they will find it very much more difficult to get off easily under the new law, than they have found it under the old. That is, as Mr. Chamberlain very justly remarked, an impressive testimony, so far as it goes, to the efficiency of his new Bill.

We regret deeply to record the death at Mentone of Mr. J. R. Green, the author of "A Short History of the English People," of which, to the credit of the British public, 85,000 copies have been sold. Mr. Green, a born student, always in feeble health, from the condition of his lungs, occupied himself during the earlier part of his life so exclusively in reading, that his "History" was a surprise to his closest friends. Its recognition was, however, instantaneous, and thenceforward Mr. Green was placed on the short list of historians who will live. A man of endless information, with a fascinating style, and full of the modern feeling which sees in history a stream of events, rather than a torrent depositing boulders in its rush, Mr. Green possessed that other and highest qualification,—the historic instinct. Occasionally careless, and always too indifferent to the mere incidents of history, the battles and debates on which so much seems to turn, and so little probably turns, the reader never left his work without feeling that Mr. Green's account must be substantially true, and that he was the wiser for reading it. Personally, Mr. Green was the delight of his friends, who in his last illness travelled from all parts of Europe to his bedside, with a devotion usually shown only to the great; while he left on mere acquaintances the impression of a singularly luminous and tranquil intelligence, to which prejudice or acridity were alike impossible. He will be greatly missed, though his literary work may be considered done.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE CONTEST IN MID-CHESHIRE.

THE Election for Mid-Cheshire, which comes off on Wednesday, the 14th, is one of unusual interest, because the result will turn almost exclusively on the opinion of tenant-farmers as to the reforms they need. The electors number 9,433, the parties, though not equal, are so nearly balanced that a change of opinion in 200 voters would turn the scale in the Liberals' favour, and the candidates may be considered fairly on a level. The Hon. Alan de Tatton Egerton, the Conservative nominee, is, no doubt, a rather weak young man, who makes foolish speeches, and has a difficulty, even when sound points are suggested to him by his friends, in finding arguments in defence of their views. His opponent, for example, is in favour of a wider diffusion of landed property, thinking its "aggregation in huge blocks" injurious to agriculture; and Mr. Egerton wished therefore to explain that very rich men performed, by means of their riches, a useful function in the State. That is, at all events, an arguable proposition; but all the poor young man could find to say was that, but for the superfluous wealth of the rich, there could be no charities, and, above all, no hospitals! He was sure of that, for he "sat on the management of two of them," without apparently ever having heard of hospitals not supported by annual subscriptions. His remark, too, that he objected to compulsory compensation, but if landlord and tenant could not agree, then the State might intervene, was wonderful in its ineptitude. Nevertheless, Mr. Egerton is a formidable candidate. He is a thorough-going Tory, who believes Mr. Chamberlain to be at furthest a grandchild of the Devil, and accuses him and his colleagues of having caused all the murders as well as all the disorders in Ireland. His party wants votes, not thoughts, and he stands in the very centre of the group of great landlords who divide Cheshire, the richest of grazing counties, where, as Sydney Smith once said, everybody who is anybody has £30,000 a year. The landlords know they can trust the Hon. Alan all the better because he is not the man to be original, but will vote under guidance; the screw has been put on through some barefaced letters from agents, which, if Mid-Cheshire were a big borough, would vitiate the election; and as there are endless means with which to provide conveyances, the whole Tory vote is sure to be polled. On the other hand, Mr. G. W. Latham is a landlord known throughout the Division as a sincere and determined Liberal, who will support all measures introduced by his Party, and is earnestly in favour not only of the rural franchise, but of a wide redistribution of seats. He is an unusually good speaker, clear, quick, and intelligent, with a fund of spontaneous humour in him such as, in these dreary days of Parnells, Churchills, and Chaplins, has become far too rare. Above all, he has been known for years as the farmers' friend in Cheshire, holds firmly by the extremest propositions of the farmers' programme, and, as he affirms, acts on them in drawing his own leases. He utterly ridicules permissive compensation for improvements, and demands not only that compensation be compulsory, but that the farmer shall receive the whole increment of value which his good culture has added to the land, and shall be entitled to levy it by the free sale of his holding to the next tenant without the landlord's consent. Indeed, after carefully reading all his speeches as reported at full length in the Liverpool Post, we cannot but believe that Mr. Latham at heart is for some kind of fixity of tenure, and that he thinks the landlords' power of raising rent should be regulated by law. At all events, he denounced such raisings as usually unjust, in speeches which lead directly either to fixity of tenure, or to a State tribunal for the decision of fair rents, proposals as yet not seriously discussed in England.

Be that as it may, it cannot be doubted that a majority of Farmers in Mid-Cheshire approve these views. They applaud Mr. Latham energetically, they "heckle" Mr. Egerton on these points till the unfortunate young man is driven into utterances that are positively unintelligible and his friends on the platform pray for forbearance, and their leading representative, the Secretary to the Chamber of Agriculture, joins Mr. Latham's Committee. They are, as we believe, as a body inclined towards these views, extreme as we must deem some of them; and the point of interest is how deep this inclination goes. If they only just approve them, they will vote for Mr. Egerton. The Division is full of grazing farms which have not suffered from recent seasons and falls in price like the arable farms, and the influence of the landlords, who are, almost without exception, liberal and kindly, will therefore suffice to turn the scale in favour of the Tory. But if the farmers are in earnest, if they really think that a new tenure—for it is that, and nothing less—is essential to the future of Agriculture, they will avail themselves of the Ballot, will throw the landlords overboard, and will vote in such numbers for Mr. Latham that, rich as the proprietors are, penal evictions will be impossible. Nobody, even if he lives by hiring out land, can affront all his customers at once. If the farmers do this, they will make a grave and deep mark in English politics, for they will warn all politicians that the question of tenure is coming to the front, and that they must be prepared for demands much larger than any as yet put forward. The position of Mr. Latham himself will accentuate the meaning of their vote. He is evidently no agitator, no man making speeches which go beyond anything he would embody in Acts of Parliament. He is obviously a man convinced down to his toes, who restrains rather than urges his own tongue, and who, if he once reaches Parliament, will take up a position on tenure as clear as that of Mr. Charles Villiers once was upon the Corn Law. He is for the total abolition of the land laws and primogeniture, for such a restriction of settlement as shall leave land always saleable, and for one thing more. He means to change the tenure, and change it effectually, in the tenant's interest; and in electing him, the farmers will show that their minds also are made up, and that a peaceful agricultural revolution is at hand. It will be impossible for any Government to be blind to such a vote, or to doubt that Tenure Reform, whatever its character, must be added to the list of the first-class measures supported by the Liberal Party. There will be little further doubt whether the landowners or the tenants should have precedence, and none as to the expediency of encountering a hostile vote of the Lords upon the Compensation Bill by a dissolution. With a county like Mid-Cheshire lost, a county which has belonged to "the families" since the Revolution, the Peers will no more go to the country upon tenure than upon their own exemption from the jurisdiction of the Courts. Mr. Alan Egerton may well make as much as he does of Mr. Bradlaugh, and of his own queer thesis that it is wrong to abolish the Christian oath, because God ought to be acknowledged, but right, if you do not make the abolition retrospective—as if God need not be acknowledged in the future—for these are, at all events, less burning questions than those which Mr. Latham forces on his attention.

We have, of course, no means of telling which way the election will go, though we should think Mr. Latham's chance, in spite of the Bradlaugh red-herring, considerably the best; but we note with strong approval that in Mid-Cheshire, as recently in Liverpool, there is no shirking, no attempt to catch votes by facing both ways, no pretence that the difference between the parties is an affair of words. Mr. Latham is only too outspoken, too ready to say unpopular things, too incisively clear in defining his own position. He does not even condescend either to praise or abuse his opponent, but laughs at him, with a hearty, enjoying tolerance, which in the "Halls" and "Manors" of Cheshire must have something of the effect of blasphemy. That is the open course, and it is by the open profession of the Liberal faith, with all its consequences, and not by the petty trickeries agents love so much, that great seats are to be won. We do not agree with every opinion Mr. Latham has uttered, but at least he has opinions, and the courage of them; and we heartily hope he will be able to make them heard in Parliament, where at present the tendency is to present agricultural grievances as if the speaker felt that he must first of all apologise for his audacity. Mr. Chaplin actually snubbed Mr. Goschen the other day, upon his own subject, because he applied his economic knowledge to agriculture without being a great landlord. He will not, we venture to say, snub Mr. Latham.

HER MAJESTY'S OPPOSITION.

IF it be true that the Fourth Party objected to the proposal to move the adjournment of the House, in order to raise a new discussion on that great Kilmainham question which has occupied the attention of her Majesty's Opposition to the exclusion of almost everything else for something like eleven months, we may hope that Lord Randolph Churchill has changed his mind in relation to the opinion which he recently expressed, that the first duty of an Opposition is to oppose. It is rumoured, we do not know with how much truth, that the Fourth Party actually declared its opinion against interfering with the Supplementary Estimates last Thursday by any obstructive policy. That, if true, would be a very encouraging sign of returning sanity, and would show that Lord Randolph Churchill is not prejudiced even in favour of a view of his own, by the accident of having given to it a premature expression. The truth certainly is, as Lord Hartington remarked in his very sensible speech at the Devonshire Club on Wednesday, that if it were really the first duty of an Opposition to oppose, the Opposition would discharge that duty very much better without a leader than with one. A leader is wanted not to increase the obstructiveness of the Opposition, but to increase its efficiency and weight with the country by concentrating it on serious points, on points on which it has a reasonable case to present, and by repressing it on all other points on which the effect of opposition would be purely obstructive. But if the object were really opposition, and nothing else, it is quite certain that an anarchical Opposition would be a hundred times as obstructive as a properly-organised Opposition. Indeed, the reason of the excessive obstructiveness of the Opposition of the last two years is simply this,—that neither of its chief constituents has been properly organised; neither has Sir Stafford Northcote exerted any efficient control over the Tories, nor has Mr. Parnell exerted any efficient control over his followers. A witty Irishman is reported to have said recently to Mr. Parnell, "Sure, Parnell, ye know ye never were a Parnellite;" and so we may be sure that after many of the demonstrations into which poor Sir Stafford Northcote has been forced, some Moderate Conservative (like Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, for instance) might very justly have said to Sir Stafford, "You know, Northcote, you never were a Northcotite." Neither the so-called leader of the Opposition, nor the so-called leader of the Irish party, can be accused of anything approaching to hearty sympathy with the policy of which, time after time, he has been forced to become the reluctant spokesman. Indeed, this is just what has at once discredited the Opposition and made it so fearfully obstructive. Neither section of it has been properly organised, or under any sort of control. Instead of representing a movable block of granite, which can only be placed in position to block the way at the will of a strong party leader, and which even then can be removed by the dead-heave of another more powerful party acting also under a leader, the Opposition has lately been distributed in the form of loose heaps of stones, spread about here and there by all sorts of independent authorities whom the professed leader,—though he never authorised their action in piling up these heaps of stones,—has not ventured to disclaim. Of course, the result has been an infinitely less effective Opposition, if you measure effectiveness by the impression made on the reason and conscience of the country, but an infinitely more embarrassing opposition, if you measure the embarrassment by the time actually lost, and the provocation actually given in the necessary task of overcoming the obstructions interposed. The truth undoubtedly is that all the three sections of Opposition, the Regulars, the Parnellites, and the Fourth Party, have lost credit with the country, just in proportion to the amount of time they have wasted, and the obstruction they have caused. It may be that, to some slight extent, they have injured the repute of the Government also. But they have not succeeded to any conspicuous degree in doing so, just because they have made it too evident that they were intent only on embarrassing their opponents, and not on opening the eyes of the public to any real misconduct of those opponents. Still, they have no doubt produced in various quarters the impression that though the Government is much more serious, much more conversant with the facts, and much more genuinely in earnest in its desire for progress, than any section of its opponents, it is not as powerful a Government as the country had hoped to see. That, moreover, is perfectly true. No Government opposed by such a political anarchy as that with which ours has had to deal could be what the country wish. The Constitution, unfortunately, throws too much power into the hands of any undisciplined crowd which may call itself an Opposition, to admit of decisive and energetic action on the part of any Government embarrassed by the hostility of such a crowd. But of this all sections of the Opposition may feel sure, that if they succeed in discrediting the Government by a policy of anarchical opposition such as that which they have recently offered, they will succeed in discrediting themselves still more. Mr. Parnell's followers are probably more unpopular with the British people than any group of politicians you could find anywhere, and are so just because they have obstructed public business in a manner which Mr. Parnell himself, if he could be interrogated where Ireland could not hear his reply, would be the first to condemn. Lord Randolph Churchill and his minute group stand probably next in order of unpopularity, and hardly any of them could secure his re-election for any decently large constituency. And Sir Stafford Northcote, though every one gives him credit for thoroughly disliking the work he has to do, has lost far more in popularity since the elections of 1880 than the Government have lost by the embarrassments which they have had to suffer at his hands.

What the English people expect from "Her Majesty's Opposition" is temperate and earnest resistance on important points, broken by cordial support wherever cordial support is possible, and, moreover, clear evidence of a desire to promote the efficiency of the Legislature and the Administration on all points on which the leader of Opposition does not seriously disapprove the policy adopted, almost as strong as that of the Government itself. That is the way, and the only way, by which an Opposition in England can gain the respect and confidence of the country. But that means that the Opposition should obey wise and self-restrained leaders, who can judge sagaciously when resistance is wise, when it is unwise, and when it is absolutely unpatriotic and ought to be put down, and who can enforce their own judgment on their followers. That is the sort of Opposition of which we have had hardly any experience for two years back; but it is the sort of Opposition which, if the Conservatives and the Irishmen know what they are about, they will try to revive, or they may discover to their cost what the impatience and disgust of a great nation really mean.

THE BLASPHEMY SENTENCE.

IT is a curious and rather significant fact that those who are most disposed to defend Mr. Justice North's application of the law of blasphemy last Monday, are most disposed also to minimise the real significance of that law, and to assert that it is practically a law against indecent outrages on the feelings of the public, and not a law interfering with the free and even incisive expression of personal opinion. We are told in one and the same article that the essence of blasphemy is in the thing said, and not in the indecent manner of saying it,—Mr. Justice Stephen, for instance, has laid down this in the strongest way,—and yet that the law never would be put in force against a man who said what he had to say in a moderate and decent manner, without any attempt to insult those who differ with him. But if the real gist of the matter lies in the denial, and not in the scoff,—and this is what Mr. Justice Stephen declares, and what even Mr. Justice North does not deny, for he mixes up the denial and the scoff as if they were equally concerned in the offence which he had to try,—surely the enforcement of the law against scoffers only, must be an essentially unjust reading of it, for whether there is a scoff or no scoff, and how far the scoff may be of a kind to attract public notice, is not so much a question of morality, as a question of taste. A highly-educated man, like Mr. John Stuart Mill, will put his denial in one way, when a man of Mr. Foote's culture will put his denial in another and much coarser way, which all the educated world will agree to regard as an indecent scoff. When a scholar ridicules the Trinity by speaking of the first person in it as "a magnified and idealised Lord Shaftesbury," a man whose only scholarship consists in the study of Tom Paine and Mr. Bradlaugh will ridicule the Trinity by a vulgar picture which shocks refined feelings much more seriously. But ought the law to punish a mere want of refinement by a year's imprisonment, when it would greatly scandalise us all if it punished the author of the refined sarcasm at all? We maintain that it is one of our most serious dangers, both moral and social, that the class which makes the law and also enforces it, has so little sympathy with the very different conditions of taste in the class which usually breaks it. All the world would cry out if Mr. Arnold had been prosecuted for his sarcasms on the Trinity, in his book on "Literature and Dogma." We should all have said, and justly said, that such a proceeding was the worst blow we could have aimed at our Christianity, and would have shown how little in the spirit of Christ our social code had been conceived. But the difference between Mr. Arnold's sarcasm as to the magnified and idealised Lord Shaftesbury, and Mr. Foote's Christmas number of the Freethinker, may be, for aught we know, nothing in the world except a vast difference of refinement, culture, and taste. Surely it is not only hard, it is grossly unjust, that a man should be tried and convicted, and punished by a year's imprisonment, for doing in a coarse and vulgar way what we never think even of punishing by so much as renouncing his friendship, when it is done by a cultivated friend in a refined and courtly way. Doubtless, it is much more painful to our feelings to have our religion insulted than to have it delicately bantered; but is the pain an act may give us the true measure of its criminality? It is very painful to our feelings to have a man come to dinner with dirty face and hands and using coarse forms of speech, but however much annoyance that might cause us, no one would think of making conduct of that kind criminally punishable. It seems to us painfully clear that there must be something wrong in a law of blasphemy which punishes the vulgar man for saying in coarse language what it never thinks of punishing the refined man for saying in keen, sarcastic language. The law should be no respecter of persons. And it ought to be perfectly evident that half-educated men, if they are to be left equally free to speak as they like, will not attack the Christian faith in the disdainful but courteous phrases in which highly-cultured men criticise it. So far as we can judge, the only difference between the language and caricature-pictures of Mr. Foote and the language of several of our recent Freethinkers, is that Mr. Foote used the bludgeon, while they used the rapier. Ought any man to be punished with a year's imprisonment for never having learnt the play of the rapier, and knowing nothing but the use of the quarter-staff?

We are not in the least disputing the position that indecency of any kind,—that is, intentional and wilful breaches of those social usages the neglect of which shocks the mind of the people at large,—is mischievous, and ought to be punishable. If a man chooses to go without clothes in the street, he ought to be as much punished for such an act as for deliberately running foul of one person after another, and lodging them all in the gutter. The one causes a shock of disgust delivered through the eyes and brain, quite as much as the other causes a shock delivered by muscular effort. But when the question is how much of dress is necessary to decency, you immediately begin to take into account the social position and habits of the dresser. You would not regard the deficiencies of a beggar-boy's dress with the same eyes as you would regard the very same deficiencies in a man-of-fortune's dress. If the law be, as it ought to be, a law punishing the intention to outrage public feeling, and not as it is in the case of blasphemy if Mr. Justice Stephen be right, one punishing a public statement of disbelief in the leading articles of the Christian creed, then the intention must be measured by the significance of what is said or done, to the mind of the writer who says or does it. Language which would be held intentionally insulting in the mouth of a highly-cultivated man, would often be held as absolutely unworthy of notice in the mouth of an angry fishwoman. And so, with blasphemy, we hold that Mr. Foote might have written, or even drawn, gross caricatures of the Christian faith, with less guilt, less intention to insult, than might have been properly imputed to the language used by celebrated writers. When Mr. Justice North tells us that their language cannot be fairly compared with Mr. Foote's language, we admit it if the status of the writers is to be excluded from the estimate. But where the question is one of the intention to insult public feeling, the status and education of the writers ought to be taken into account; and it seems to us gross injustice that the coarse writer should be punished, not for the evidence of the greater malice with which he wrote, but simply for the coarseness which is natural to his literary condition, and to the character of the evidence to which he appeals. Nobody can say that the Freethinker is obtruded cruelly on people who do not want to read it. It would not be even true to say that it addresses temptations of a dangerous kind to young and inexperienced minds, such as certain other kinds of immoral literature certainly address. On the whole, violent blasphemy is not likely to tempt any one to read it, not even the young. It revolts those who incidentally glance at it. It affects seriously only those who deliberately take the same side; therefore it is, in our eyes, most unfortunate that those who write it should be made martyrs of by such severe sentences as Mr. Justice North's. If Mr. Justice North had shown his sense of the public indecency of the Freethinker's Christmas number by sentencing its editor to a fortnight's imprisonment, and its publisher and printer to three days' imprisonment each, no sympathy would have been felt with them, and the public would have recognised that a fit expression had been given to the feeling that a certain reticence is essential even from the most outspoken thinker, when he is touching subjects closely identified with the most sacred and devout feelings of the great majority of the community. But considering the extreme severity of the punishment actually inflicted for publishing what no one was compelled either to see or to read,—and this makes a most serious difference between the case of blasphemy and that of any act of public indecency which is necessarily seen by all within the range of eyesight,—no one will be able to avoid comparing what Mr. Foote has done, with what more refined assailants of the Christian faith have done without the smallest risk of prosecution, and asking whether the difference does not really consist much more in the difference between the education of the different assailants, than in the difference between their desire to wound.

We have treated the crime of blasphemy as one which, if suffered to remain a crime, ought to be regarded solely as an intentional outrage on public feeling in relation to religion, and not as a sin against God, which is undoubtedly the light in which it was originally viewed. Our reason for this is very simple. In the first place, God alone knows what is a sin against him, and therefore we should leave punishment to him who has the adequate knowledge to inflict it justly. In the second place, Christ has taught us that an insult to him should be forgiven, that the only thing unpardonable is an insult against the very spirit of holiness itself,—and of this no human Court can be a judge; while it is certain that nothing comes so near it as any deliberate infliction of punishments on one class in society which, mutatis mutandis, are not inflicted on other and higher classes. If there is to be a law of blasphemy for offences against God, we maintain that it would have to be applied against all kinds of highly-educated writers who have brought power of no ordinary calibre to bear on the ridiculing of the Christian faith by delicate satire. Such an application of the law of blasphemy would be, as we all believe, the worst blow we could inflict on the Christian Churches of the day; and if so, it is monstrous to talk of punishing vulgarer men for their offences against God, only because they have not known how to adapt their ridicule to a more refined taste. The true Christian attitude towards blasphemy as an offence against God is to pity it, and, if possible, overcome it, as all evil ought to be overcome, with good. That a deliberate intention to scandalise and wound the feelings of the people on religion, or any other subject, should be punishable, we do not doubt. But the punishment should be most carefully adjusted to the evidence of malicious intent, and in adjusting it to the evidence of malicious intent, the coarse character of the language or the sneers used, if they come from a coarse, half-educated mind, should be punished with few stripes, and only if they come from a refined and thoughtful mind, should be punished with many stripes.

FORMLESS DISAFFECTION.

ALL politics in England are suffering for the moment under the influence of what we believe to be a political illusion. The governing party is divided, seriously divided, by an internal difference, on a subject which it is reluctant openly to discuss. Men of the highest mark, who on most subjects are sincerely Liberal, and that in the true sense as well as the party sense, are shrinking from what they conceive to be the danger of any further advance in Ireland in the Liberal direction. They think that if the franchise is lowered, if the seats are redistributed, if county and municipal freedom are conceded in an honest way—that is, as fully as in England or Scotland—the disaffected masses will acquire all power, and will use it to make the continuance of the Union and the existence of the present social arrangements impossible. The new suffrage, they say, will return eighty Parnellites; the new Municipalities will be filled with Careys; the new County Boards will make the lives of the county gentlemen intolerable to them. In a country where the lower the stratum you reach, the more virulent is political passion, is it not foolish to go lower than you can possibly help? Is it not, at all events, wiser to wait until time, remedial measures, and it may be the effect of hopelessness, have so calmed down passion, that the lower mass may at least be in the temper, bad as that is, which the mass just above them shows just now?

The Englishman who argues dogmatically about Ireland shows, in so doing, that he does not understand the almost infinite complexity of her conditions; and we, in addition, wish to write with the utmost respect of men who are, as we believe, entirely sincere, and who, if they could but be certain of benefit to Ireland, would run great political risks; but we must, nevertheless, state our own opinion, which is that this hesitation rests on a fundamental mistake. It is not true that formulated disaffection is more formidable to a civilised authority than formless disaffection, not true that a city in revolt is more dangerous than a mob in insurrection. It would be true, if the Government were one of the kind which can use wholesale massacre as an instrument, because it is easier to massacre a mob than an organised body; but on no other condition is it true. The opponents of advance will admit, we suppose, that the grant of liberties will not of itself add to the number of the disaffected; and if it does not, how will it add to their power? Take Dublin, for instance, as the best, because the most extreme illustration. How will Dublin, assuming the majority of its people to be disaffected, which is, of course, not proved, be more powerful to make its disaffection effective if all ratepayers elect the Members and the Municipality? At present, on the hypothesis assumed, Dublin is misrepresented in Parliament and the Municipal Council, and partly in consequence forms and shelters murderous societies, harasses the police, riots in the streets, and by its own sympathies keeps up the flame of disaffection throughout Ireland. What more could it do, if its disaffection were legally organised? The Members and Council could not, it is admitted, throw the people into the streets, for if they did, force could be legitimately applied, and force is on the other side. They could not organise Murder Clubs, for that is not the nature of public bodies; and if they did, they would be exposed and betrayed by their own minorities, who in so acting would be in no danger of hatred as informers. They would only be protecting the city revenue. The Council could only give votes, pass resolutions, and refuse aid to the general Government; and these things are done now, with the addition that the mob, having no legal voice, finds one of its own, which is mere roaring, unintelligible, and therefore unanswerable;—and with this further aggravation, that the whole populace assumes an attitude which is one of seeming complicity in murder. No conceivable Municipality of Dublin, if it were ready to declare war, or vote the moral necessity of insurrection, could be half as dangerous as the equally-disaffected populace, plus the Invincibles, plus the rowdies who harass the police. Such a Municipality, however enraged, must act through forms, must keep its engagements, must possess an ear and a mouth and a tongue. No municipality in Ireland could ever be so dangerous as the Paris Commune, which controlled, it is believed, 150,000 men who had passed through the military mill, and the Commune was not half as dangerous as Paris in formless insurrection. It was after the Insurgent authority dissolved itself, not while it existed, that its most desperate members resolved that Paris should die by suicide, and so nearly carried out their intention. The Dublin Municipality, if filled with O'Briens and Sextons—we do not say Careys, for many Careys are not in existence, and if they were, would betray each other—could not arm and drill the populace, and if they could, would only make the direct application of military force in its more terrible forms much easier. They could be dealt with by legislation, by negotiation, by compromise, by all the methods of transacting human business, far more easily than a mob; and it is a hostile mob which, on the theory, is the alternative.

We are putting deliberately the most extreme case we can think of, in its most extreme form, and the argument applies to every part of Ireland. We need not say that we do not expect the development of that extreme form of resistance. On the contrary, we expect that the disaffection as well as the anarchy will be less, that the Councils, if powerful enough to be attractive, will be found conservative forces. They will attract able men, and able men soon grow sick of aimless and useless agitations. Moreover, they will interest the whole people, and thus give a chance to those who are on the side of order and common-sense, as well as to those who are on the side of unreason. At present, as we believe, a disturbed district in Ireland usually contains two broad parties, a timid and distracted majority on the side of order, and a united and active minority on the side of disorder. The minority combines resolutely, though secretly, for purposes of agitation, intimidation, or outrage; the majority combines for nothing, secretly or publicly, but rushes whining to clutch at the skirts of the Executive. The legal body could not increase the mino-city's opportunity of combination, for that is perfect; but it would increase tenfold the majority's, for it would give it the desired protection of legal forms. If the majority in Ireland had but the habit of combination, they would very soon reduce the minority to order; and there is no school for teaching that habit equal to a legal assembly of any kind, compelled to learn how to do business and overcome obstacles. If this is not true, the social instinct found in all other communities, even savage communities, does not exist in Ireland, and there is absolutely nothing to be hoped for or done, except to suffer the Irish, being anarchists by force of a hitherto unknown instinct, to kill one another out. That is nonsense.

But we shall be told that, even if there is a majority for order, there is not one for the Union. The Home-rulers, if eighty in number, would be unendurable in Parliament, and the aggregate of municipalities would be ungovernable from London. We do not in the least believe in the occurrence of either contingency; but granting all that is alleged, we maintain that the total result would be improvement; that we should then be in presence of organised forces, and not of anarchical forces; and that we should fight harder, or compromise more ably, or on occasion yield more openly, than we do now. If Ireland contains a minority ready to defend the Union, every liberty will give them fresh resources, and if all Ireland is hostile—which we do not believe—we would rather seek for a modus vivendi with united Ireland than with Ireland distracted as she is, and should find one, whether in concession or in coercion, more easily than we do. The grievances to be removed would be solid, the complaints to be heard irresistible, the demands to be rejected impossible, and the course of the State would be clear. At present, it is purely empirical, and the force of Britain, which is perhaps fiftyfold that of Ireland, is lost, because opinion is so divided as to Irish claims that action in either direction becomes impossible.

We have said, it will be perceived, nothing of our usual political argument, that the Irish have a right to their franchises as good as that of the English, and nothing of the Liberal argument that liberty is the strongest reconciling force, for we are addressing men who for the moment are inclined to deny both. We accept their own ground, and contend that if they are right, and if justice produces no sympathy and liberty no reconciliation, then still it is easier to deal with open and legalised and disciplined enemies, really representing the people, than with the anarchical, inarticulate, and, therefore, murderous forces with which we are now contending. If history has any meaning at all, it is that the forces of society, if allowed free legal expression through recognised methods, express themselves through those methods, that social strength accretes to them, and that they ultimately become able to keep down all hostile or anarchical opponents. Corporations have an instinct which, in the long-run, forbids them to add strength to an anarchy which would speedily threaten themselves. That Representative Councils are of necessity the expression of the social forces best suited to the genius of Ireland is, of course, a debateable question. We should be inclined to think that, if left to herself, she would be governed by elected Provincial Juntas or Committees, rather than by Councils, as Spaniards in revolution always are—at least, every popular movement in Ireland takes that form—but Irishmen deny this, and the question is purely for their decision. If we grant the essential matter, we cannot refuse the form they ask for, when that form is the one that we ourselves adopt. We believe that the Councils will either be conservative bodies strengthening the Administration, or enemies with whom negotiation is possible, and that a true representation of Ireland will be more manageable or more repressible than the existing false one. After all, is it not just a little ridiculous that we should be arguing with Whigs, on high a priori grounds, to show that the Town Councils of Dublin and Cork and the constituency of Dungarvan cannot be regarded as bulwarks of the British Constitution?

THE FINANCIAL REVOLUTION IN THE UNITED STATES.

ENGLISH Free-traders must not rejoice too soon in the passage of the great American "Tax and Tariff Bill." The acceptance of that remarkable measure shows, no doubt, that Free-trade is making progress, but it has not made much yet, and its enemies in the States are so numerous and so powerful that the battle will be a long one, and may not terminate precisely as Englishmen expect. The history of the recent measure is a most unusual one. The ruling Republicans, as our readers are aware, contrived during the year 1882 to disgust all the advocates of Civil-Service Reform, President Arthur and his entourage jobbing at least as recklessly, although not as openly, as any preceding Administration. The Reformers therefore abstained from voting at the November elections, and the Democrats sent up so many Representatives and Senators that they carried the House by a heavy majority, and reduced the Republican majority in the Senate to one. The new Congress, however, did not come into power until March 5th, Monday last, and the ruling Republicans, fairly frightened, endeavoured to utilise the remaining time by setting their house in order. They were afraid of two things,—first, that the Democrats would force on the President a clean sweep of all officials, and then pass a strong Reform Bill; and second, that the incoming party, which though not in principle Free-trader, stands pledged never to raise surplus revenue, would, to enforce its theory and catch the Free-trade vote, make sweeping reductions in the Protective tariff. They, therefore, swept through Congress a Bill which, if honestly administered, grants to competent Civil Servants fixity of tenure, destroys corruption by patronage, and prohibits “levies” on officials for party purposes, and then cast about for some means of getting rid of surplus revenue. It was at first thought that they could effect this by large appropriations, especially one in aid of education, and this was for a time attempted. All manner of grants were sanctioned, till it is said the expenditure for next year will be increased by five millions sterling; but this kind of “depletion” was not enough. For some reason which we do not quite understand, Congress will not accede to proposals for raising the Navy to a level with the place which the Union claims in the world, and no grant except one for building a great Navy in two years could seriously affect the large American surplus. The people did not like the waste, the surplus threatened to exceed £28,000,000, and after all the “depletions” there was an ample margin for any reduction on the tariff. Indeed, Free-trade in everything but luxuries might have been established without any serious danger of embarrassing the Treasury, though it is still loaded with the Pension List of the war and some extravagant grants-in-aid. The Republican leaders, therefore, with the full support, as now appears, of President Arthur, resolved upon a grand reduction of the Treasury receipts, which would, they thought, deprive their rivals of their best argument for making concessions to Free-trade. They brought in a huge “Tax and Tariff Bill,” so complex in its provisions, that it was described by one set of speakers as a Protectionist measure and by another as a Free-trade measure, and that while one authority declared it would reduce Excise and Tariff equally, another asserted that it would reduce Excise by £13,000,000, and the Tariff by only £5,000,000 a year. The details are still expected, but it is certain that the “engineers” of the Bill have no love for Free-trade, and it is understood that manufacturers are jubilant, that Free-traders declare themselves betrayed, and that the substantial truth is something of this kind:—The Republicans have deprived the Treasury, as they hope, of £20,000,000 a year, two-thirds of its surplus revenue, by severe reductions on Excise, particularly in the internal duties on tobacco—an immense bribe to the South, and especially to Virginia and Louisiana—and have reduced many import duties on raw goods—wool, for example—and half-manufactured articles—low qualities of iron, for example—till the revenue will receive from them next to nothing. But they have not only maintained most of the duties on manufactured articles, but they have, in some cases, actually increased them, woollen goods, for instance, paying for the future sixty per cent., while wool comes in free. In fact, as regards all articles into which skill enters, Protection is maintained; and the great manufacturing corporations, some of which grow so rich that they conceal their dividends by irregular bonuses and by watering their stock, are left with their huge profits untouched. The Democrats, fiercely annoyed, endeavoured to resist the Bill by “filibustering”—that is, by obstruction—hoping to delay it till March 5th, when the new Congress would come into power; but they were beaten by a new rule of procedure, extemporised for the occasion, which we do not thoroughly understand; and some twenty-four hours before the Session ended the Bill passed both Houses, and was immediately accepted by the President. It is, therefore, law.

The Democrats are now in power by a majority of nearly one hundred in the House of Representatives, and, so far as that House is concerned, they could repeal the Bill. The Senate, however, which is still Republican, would not permit that, and the incoming party are said to meditate a different course. This is, to raise the Free-trade flag in earnest, accept the Tax and Tariff Bill, and so extend its provisions by a supplementary Bill as to sweep away all duties on imports not essential, like the alcohol duty, to the safety of the Treasury. They calculate that two or three Republican Senators who happen to be convinced Free-traders, and who forced the few genuine reductions of protective duties to be found in the Tax and Tariff Bill, would on principle abstain from voting, and thus suffer the Bill to become law. That is a shrewd device, and, of course, would be most favourable to Free-trade; but it is very doubtful if it will be either adopted or seriously considered. In the first place, President Arthur would veto the Bill, and he sits in the White House till March, 1885. There is no chance of a two-thirds majority in the Senate to pass a Free-trading Bill over the President's head. In the second place, the Democrats, as a party, have not completely made up their minds to adopt Free-trade. Their ancient principle that taxation in excess of Treasury needs is plunder of the citizen predisposes them in that direction, as does their traditional alliance with the South, which before the war was essentially Free-trade, and did not yield to high tariffs even in consideration of safety for the “peculiar institution;” but they are not Free-traders by conviction. Many of them are Protectionists from an idea of patriotism, some have the notion, so widely spread in Europe, that Free-trade is the device of English manufacturers, and all are most unwilling to move at any risk of being in advance of public sentiment. That sentiment is not yet clearly formed, and every American gives inquirers a different account. Speaking only as onlookers intensely interested in the development of American opinion, and subject, of course, to local evidence, we should say that the Free-trade opinion based on reasoning makes very slow progress anywhere, but that the Free-trade opinion based on interest is in the West conquering the “mass vote,” till, perhaps, a clear half of all voters in the Union are on that side. The cultivators of the West and the body of the people in the great towns are nearly sick of the dearness of all manufactured goods caused by Protection, and begin to see that they lose more than they get by a high tariff. But they are still perplexed by the notions that for artisans Protection means high wages; that if Free-trade were established, agriculture would be the only American business; and that it is a proud position for the Union, which contains all climates, to be like a separate planet, independent of the Universe. Free-trade, therefore, is mastering the people, but has not mastered them; while, curiously enough, its influence is, as regards the States in their corporate action, slightly receding. Formerly, the Protectionists could only depend on the Eastern and Middle States, but now we are told that they are advancing in the South, where, with cheap and docile labourers, manufacturers are rapidly acquiring the political influence which throughout the Union falls to corporations. As the States and not the citizens elect the Senate, this is in politics a serious consideration. At all events, the Democrat leaders hesitate, and although the surplus in the Treasury will still be nearly ten millions, we question if they will yet go very far. They will not like wholly to stop the payment of the Debt, or to forego the luxury of making grants, and they will, we suspect, wait for orders from the bulk of their constituents. As the wave of population rolls westward, the order is sure to come; but it has not come yet. The permeation of the Free-trade argument through such vast masses is terribly slow, and the incredible prosperity of the American fisc—a prosperity without a parallel or even a foreshadowing in history—naturally suggests inaction. We English are proud of our taxation, and think ourselves very rich; but imagine even Mr. Gladstone repealing twenty millions of taxes in one year, and then grumbling that really this plethora of the Treasury cannot be allowed, for if it is the Debt will be extinct, and there will be no form of investment which Congress can authorise by law. That extraordinary argument weighs in the Union with grave financiers, and is actually in one way sound. The whole note circulation of the Union rests on the obligation of the Banks to keep United States Bonds equal to their output; and if there are no Bonds left, the currency laws must be remodelled from the very foundation. We look forward, therefore, to the ultimate victory of Free-trade in the Union; but we do not expect it yet, or for some years to come.

HOW TO SAVE THE EMBANKMENT.

THE History of the Thames Embankment may be written in three chapters,—How it was made, how it is being paid for, and how it has been spoiled. The first of these belongs to a past which already seems remote. The second is in the historic present, for the money was raised by a loan which is still outstanding. The third has been contributed without any warning by the Metropolitan District Railway. The ratepayer has now the double annoyance of seeing the Embankment disfigured by the railway ventilators, and of being called upon twice a year to pay for making what the Railway Company are bent upon disfiguring. Of all the uses to which “the lungs of London” have from time to time been turned, this is surely the strangest. First of all, we set apart certain spaces on the Embankment, which are to be planted and laid out as gardens for the enjoyment of the vast mass of people who live within a mile or so of the northern bank of the River. Next, we watch to see how far this benefit is valued by those on whom it is conferred. And then, when the crowds that fill every available spot on a summer’s afternoon and evening have made this point perfectly clear, we undo a great part of our work, by allowing the District Railway to pick out these very oases for the discharge of all the poisonous vapours which its engines can generate in a journey round London. The objections to the ventilators are three, any one of which ought to be fatal to them. To begin with, they take up space in a part of London where space is peculiarly precious. The Gardens on the Thames Embankment are not a foot too large for the end they have to discharge. More ground, rather than less, is wanted to make them what they ought to be, and now an appreciable fraction of their area has been taken by the Railway for its own use. In the second place, the buildings occupying the space of which the public have been legally robbed promise to be singularly ugly, and they will so dominate the gardens in which they are placed, that the eye will find it difficult to fix itself on anything else. An oblong mass of yellow brickwork, chastely roofed with grey slate, does not seem to have many elements of fascination; but for all that, it may supply the one impression which the visitor will carry away from the Embankment Gardens. Nor is it only the eye that will have reason to complain. The nose, unless it is the victim of a diseased passion for the fumes of sulphuretted hydrogen, will suffer at least as much. To sit in the neighbourhood of a ventilator will be to inhale a gush of poisonous vapour every time that a train passes, and as trains pass on an average about every ninety seconds, the discharge will be practically continuous. This is the conception we form to ourselves of making the most of a great public improvement.

Now, how did all this come about? Immediately by the operation of an Act of Parliament. The District Company have the law on their side. They could not have opened a single ventilator, if they had not first come to Parliament for leave, and only last Session Parliament gave them leave. So far, therefore, the District Railway may consider itself the injured party. It has robbed no one and interfered with no one’s comfort, without first explaining to both Houses what it proposed to do, and asking if, after thus unbosoming itself, it might go and do it. If we push inquiry a little further back, and ask how this leave came to be given, the answer is that the blunder is due partly to the carelessness of those who were concerned in opposing the Bill, and partly to the imperfect publicity given to Private Bills, even when they affect considerable public interests. The Corporation of London and the Metropolitan Board of Works were both hostile to the Bill, and it might have been thought that two such powerful bodies, fighting, so to say, for their own hearths, would have had no difficulty in throwing it out. Nor would they have had, if they had taken the precaution of making the public understand what it was that the Bill proposed to do. There should have been meetings at the Mansion House or the Guildhall; the Members for the City and for Westminster should have been plied with deputations; the President of the Board of Trade should have been given no peace, until he consented to oppose the Bill at every stage. Not one of these expedients seems to have been resorted to. The Bill was opposed, but it was opposed in such a milk-and-water fashion that it passed without difficulty or investigation. The blame of this extraordinary oversight must be borne to some extent by the present arrangements for the conduct of Private-bill legislation. It is the merest chance whether the public know anything of what is going on in the Committee-rooms. Sometimes the proceedings get a line or two of notice in a corner of the morning papers, and we learn that the room was cleared, and that on the readmission of the public the Chairman announced that the Committee were of opinion that the preamble of the Bill had or had not been proved. What seems to be wanted is that when the Committee have finished their examination of a Bill, the Chairman should draw up a short statement of the object of the Bill, and that this statement should be printed with the votes. In the case of the great majority of private Bills with which no public object is in any way associated, one line of explanation would be sufficient. That this Bill confirms certain family arrangements, and that this other provides for the purchase of certain land by a railway, would ordinarily be an adequate report for a Chairman to make. But in the case of the Ventilators on the Embankment, it would have been his duty to set out the number and size of the ventilators it was proposed to set up, and the precise places at which it was proposed to place them. In this way, the public would have had a fair warning of what the Railway proposed to do; and though it is conceivable that no one would have read the Chairman’s statement when it was printed, it is almost certain that it would have attracted the attention of some Member of Parliament or some journalist, and have been made the text of either a speech or an article.

The immediate question, however, is how the mischief can be prevented, now that it is so nearly done. If the Act arming the District Railway with power to disfigure the Embankment at its pleasure were a public Act, or if the Railway Company had begun work in the winter, instead of in the spring, there would by comparison have been no difficulty. In the one case, a public Bill could have been introduced, simply repealing the obnoxious provision, and compensating the Railway for any expense it had actually incurred in reliance on the leave given last Session. In the other case, the same end would have been attained by the introduction of a private Bill. As it is, however, the House of Commons is opposed, and rightly opposed, to mixing up two distinct branches of its work, and introducing a public Bill to repeal a private one; while it is not now possible, under the Standing Orders, to introduce a private Bill during the present Session. Unless, therefore, some exception is permitted to these two regulations, nothing can be done for another year. As a great part of the work is still unfinished, in spite of the rapidity with which the Railway Company have pushed it forward, this delay would be extremely costly. The difference in the compensation money would be the difference between the cost of an unfinished work, and the cost of a completed work. The best solution, therefore, that can be suggested is that the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works should move to suspend the Standing Orders, so as to allow of a Bill to repeal the clause under which the District Railway are acting being at once introduced. If any one who has seen the handiwork of the Company really thinks well of it, he would then have an opportunity of being heard. If, as is more probable, the Bill would be carried through both Houses by acclamation, Parliament would only have to congratulate itself on its second thoughts being wiser than its first. Only, it is important to bear in mind that every day that Sir James Hogg delays to take this course, the Ratepayers of London will have to pay a larger sum by way of compensation.

THE NEW SUFFERING OF THE POOR.

MOST Tory writers—and, indeed, most writers of all parties, for literature is, as against labour, instinctively conservative—are apt to accuse the Poor of our day of seeking in all their movements for “Equality,” which subsequently is always shown to be “impossible.” It is not impossible at all, on certain conditions, one of which is that society shall be brigaded and subjected to orders as severely as any army; but, for purposes of discussion, the assertion may be allowed. Men, if they desire equality at all, always desire to be “free and equal,” and, as equality and freedom cannot be obtained together, their request may fairly be pronounced impossible. But is it true that the thirst of the modern poor—the poor of 1883—is for equality? It was once, when the world, and more especially the world of the European Continent, was oppressed by the régime of privilege to a degree of which we have happily lost even the memory; but is it now? It seems to us, watching with somewhat hopeless eyes the new movement from below, as it breaks out in country after country, that the grand desire of the poor, the desire which Anarchists, Collectivists, Communists, Socialists, dreamers and agitators of all descriptions use as their lever, is not so much for equality in any far-reaching sense, as for security. There are fanatics of all kinds, of course, among the poor, as among the well-to-do, and the fanatics for equality are numerous; but they base their demand upon an idea, the inherent dignity of man, and not upon a suffering, and are but a group, though very often the group which leads. It is with a suffering that the poor sympathise, and though the absence of equality may produce one, they as a body usually look for something more concrete and positive. They are certainly acting all over the world as if they felt some new pain, which is not legal,—for they are less oppressed than ever before,—nor economic,—for their material condition is on the whole advancing,—and we cannot resist the impression that it is to be sought in a lately developed consciousness of the insecurity which, far more than any positive want of means, differentiates them from the possessors of property. The indications of this are to be found on every hand. The country in which Socialism and kindred beliefs are weakest, is England, where inequality is most perfect, but where insecurity is robbed of some of its terrors by the operation of the Poor-law. The only poor class on the Continent which does not rebel is the only one which is secure, and cannot be deprived of its position, lowly as that may be, the peasant-proprietary. The strongest desire of the tenantry in Ireland, in England, in Spain, in Italy, is for protection against eviction. The most serious movements among the artisans in France, Germany, and the cities of Austria are those which have for their object the vesting of the power to employ labour in the Communes, which the artisans would control, and through which they would indirectly be able to protect themselves from dismissal. Even in England, it is proposals for a kind of security, security against accident, sickness, and the pecuniary consequences of death, which elicit the greatest financial efforts from the operatives, and excite their warmest enthusiasm. The resentment caused by dismissal, especially arbitrary dismissal, is notoriously—after jealousy and agrarian disputes—the most frequent cause of violent crime; and the leader of any violent movement, especially in Germany and Italy, is almost invariably a “dismissed” man. Of course, in all social movements the movers hope for concrete gain also, for more wages, for a lighter stint of work—the latter on the Continent an honest and well-justified demand—or for fairer promotion; but the propelling force, the sting which makes men’s minds so bitter, is still the sense of insecurity. The man can bear his life; what he cannot bear is the sense that it may by no fault of his own be suddenly made infinitely worse, that he has no protection against sickness, falling trade, accident, or what he deems his employer’s caprice.

If this conjecture is correct, and, for ourselves, we have little doubt of it, the evidence would be worth probing to the bottom, for there would be hope in such a theory. It would be, in the first place, something to know that the social rebellion of which the world is growing so full is not aimless, not unfounded, not wholly irrational, or even “sentimental,” but is provoked by a real, perhaps a removable cause. Nothing makes rulers so hopeless and in the end so cruel, as the idea that they are encountering petitioners who are not reasoning beings, whose desires are vague; who revolt they know not why, and keep quiet without a cause; who, in fact, are lunatics to be restrained, rather than subjects to be heard. If the desire of the Proletariat can only be formulated, so that the class itself comprehends it, then, even if it be unattainable, a child’s cry for the moon to play with, still, comprehension is possible, and with comprehension, compromise. And it is even more to know that the workers’ grievance is not something separate and unaccountable, something as peculiar as their dress, but one well known to those above them, and whether removable or not, tangible and solid. The poor—if the insecurity of their lives is their great torment—are but waking up to a perception which has burdened the lives of those above them for generations, to an anxiety which more than any other embitters the lives of the educated who do not possess property. The English middle-class, of all working grades, are not often bitter; but they are anxious and suspicious, and their burden is insecurity. Till they have saved or acquired something, be it only a year’s income, they are never free from a form of care which, in a majority of them, poisons happiness. They may fail, or grow sick, or be dismissed. They value an “independence,” however small, above all earthly possessions, and strive for it with an earnestness which often materially affects the character, till in England alone in the world the old are far gentler and more liberal than the middle-aged. They are free in old age of a mental thorn. The handicraftsmen were formerly not like that. They suffered from everything except a poisoned forethought. Education, however—we mean the education of circumstance, rather than of any School Board—has done its work, and with much of the better qualities of the middle-class there has come to many of them the middle-class fear of the future, the restlessness of pecuniary apprehension, the impatience of a position in which nothing is or can be secure. Workmen with children can hardly save, and with one-half of them, three months’ suspension of labour, from sickness, accident, or dismissal, means acute privation. It is far worse on the Continent, where there is no Poor-law, where giving credit is much less practised, and where the landlords, if not more grasping, are far more rigorous and exact. There the sense of insecurity rises in certain classes to a positive horror, especially in the artisans who live by luxury, and those far below them, who are really artisans’ servants, till thousands of men welcome any attack on a society which, as they conceive, leaves them in such a position. They are not anarchists or agitators, but they sympathise with the objects of dreamers till their leaders can denounce in the Chamber the trials of Anarchists, with a certainty that they are making effective electoral speeches. The basis of the horror, too, is for them a real one. The difference of position on the Continent between a man who owns a pound a week and the man who earns one is simply infinite. The latter is never safe, and it is safety which is the root of sweetness in life. If he takes to saving, the penury of forty years, while saving half his whole income, only brings him up to his rival’s position. Ten shillings a week saved for forty years yields a pound a week in Rente. If, as most usually happens, he does not save, a sprained ankle, a heavy fall, the failure of an employer, a quarrel with the foreman may reduce him to the position of a savage in a desert, without food, home, or the means of procuring either. Insecurity of that kind bites, and turns men with any tinge of natural bitterness in them—and even those who write or read this are not all full of sweetness and light—into rancorous enemies, or at best cynical critics of everything that exists. It is not the absence of “extrys,” as an American writer has just defined luxuries, which makes modern men savage, or even the pooriness of the necessities obtainable, but the haunting fear of the hour when the necessities will not be there. Nothing embitters like terror, and it is, we are convinced, in the new consciousness that there is cause for terror in the present arrangements of society that the origin of the new violence of the poor is to be sought. We ask what they can hope from assassination or arson, and forget how blindly the terrified hit out. What does the servant-girl hope for who leaps out of window at the cry of fire?

It is not our business here to discuss political remedies, though we would fain hope that a wiser Poor-law is approaching all over Europe, a law under which not only will property-owners be taxed, but they and the poor will unite to form the reserve fund of industry; and of mental relief, we see little hope. Christianity, at least on its feminine side—the side which teaches resignation—is not gaining ground, and of purely intellectual help we can as yet discern no trace. There never was so little stoicism anywhere, except among the rich, who, Carlyle said were full of it, and who, we should say, if we wanted to be cynical, show much fortitude in bearing others’ miseries. Everybody who suffers now-a-days either rages or whines in a way which our grandfathers would have pronounced shameful, but which is possibly not the result of weaker hearts, but of nerves more highly strung. We suppose that last is, in part at least, the explanation of the precise time of the change which has passed over the poor. They feel more acutely, not so much because they have learned more, though that has something to do with it, as because, in the altered conditions of the world, their nerves have become less hard. Life is a little less of a battle, and because it is less, because the danger is intermittent, and even avoidable, its approach seems indefinitely more formidable. The countryman who has lived in London for ten years undergoes some change which, when he returns, makes him percipient of the previously unperceived loneliness of the country-side, and percipient with a certain alarm. That a change is passing over the temper of the “dim, common populations,” as well as over their opinions, is certain; and it may well be that the cause is the increase of sensitiveness which comes of increased comfort. They have felt, however slightly, the effect of the warmer air, and the cold seems to them not only dangerous, but unendurable, till they rage with any one who even appears to keep the door ajar.

THE CONDITIONS OF "THE GRAND STYLE."

MATTHEW ARNOLD has told us much of the Grand Style in prose and poetry, and has illustrated with no mean success what he has told us by his own example. There are few modern writers who have thrown so much of the grand style into their sayings and their verse. In his prose, we might refer to almost any of his most characteristic sentences, for example, that about "distinction" of style, in one of the essays on Maurice and Eugénie de Guérin:—"Her soul had the same character as his talent,—distinction. Of this quality the world is impatient, it chafes against it, rails at it, insults it, hates it, it ends by receiving its influence, and by undergoing its law;" or his description of the atmosphere in Homer; "the pure lines of an Ionian horizon, the liquid clearness of an Ionian sky;" or even his famous description of Heine's bitter spirit:—"One man in many millions, a Heine, may console himself and keep himself erect in suffering by a colossal irony of this sort, by covering himself and the universe with the red-fire of this sinister mockery; but the many millions cannot, cannot if they would." Still more remarkable is the grand style of his finest verse. Take his first touch in recalling Shakespeare:—

"Others abide our question, thou art free!
We ask and ask,—thou smilest and art still Out-topping knowledge;"

or his noble description of Sophocles:—

"Whose even-balanced soul
From first youth tested up to extreme old age;
Business could not make dull, nor passion wild;
Who saw life steadily and saw it whole,
The mellow glory of the Attic Stage,
Singer of sweet Colonus and his child."

Or take his memorable description of Byron:—

"What helps it now that Byron bore
With haughty scorn that mock'd the smart,
From Europe to the Ætolian shore,
The pageant of his bleeding heart?"

Or, as marking his very highest point in terseness and grandeur, take his description of the restless Roman noble and the Eastern mystic:—

"In his cool hall, with haggard eyes,
The Roman noble lay;
He drove abroad, in furious guise,
Along the Appian Way;
He made a feast, drank fierce and fast,
And crowned his hair with flowers—
No easier and no quicker pass'd
The impracticable hours.
The brooding East with awe beheld
Her impious younger world.
The Roman tempest swelled and swelled,
And on her head was hurled.
The East bowed low before the blast,
In patient, deep disdain;
She let the Legions thunder past,
And plunged in thought again."

If there be a truly grand style in prose and poetry, surely these are perfect specimens of what it means,—words with a stately rhythm not too stately for their statelier meaning, words expressing the full consciousness of a certain splendour of significance, clothed in a seemly form and moving with a certain majesty of step. Matthew Arnold's own favourite illustration of the grand style is Milton's verse, and it would be difficult to find a happier illustration. Open Milton's poems where you will, and almost the first line on which your eye alights will give some adequate illustration of what the grand style means:—

"Oft, on a plot of rising ground,
I hear the far-off curfew sound
Over some wide-watered shore,
Swinging slow with sullen roar."

What a majesty in the tone and rhythm of this description of a mere sound entering the ear! Or take the next few lines, in which a first impression on the eye is imaged with equal grandeur:—

"Or, if the air will not permit,
Some still, removed place will fit,
Where glowing embers through the room
Teach light to counterfeit a gloom."

But go to Milton's prose works, and we shall be disappointed. There we find not the grand style, but something very different,—the grandiose style, where the dignity and simlicity of true culture are wanting to the effect of grandeur, where the ear is jarred by a pomp of manner too great for the weight of meaning. Take, for instance, a passage which is sometimes quoted as one illustrating the singular grandeur of Milton's prose style, but which appears to us overloaded with "gaudy and ungraceful ornament." "Look upon this, thy poor and almost spent and expiring Church; leave her not a prey to these importunate wolves that wait and think long till they devour thy tender flock; these wild boars that have broke into thy vineyard, and left the print of their polluting hoofs on the souls of thy servants. O let them not bring about their damned designs, that stand now at the entrance of the bottomless pit, expecting the watchword to open and let those dreadful locusts and scorpions to reinvolve us in that pitchy cloud of infernal darkness, where we should never more see the sun of thy truth again, never hope for the cheerful dawn, never more hear the bird of morning sing!" "Wolves that wait and think" are obviously very unnatural wolves; wild boars that leave "the print of their polluting hoofs" on the soul, are wild boars unknown to natural history; "scorpions and locusts" which are to hide "the sun of truth" are clearly metaphorical scorpions and locusts, so that when we are told that they will prevent us from ever more hearing "the bird of morning" sing, we ask, bewildered, what worse loss than the loss of "the sun of truth" the loss of the lark's song is meant to prefigure. Clearly, this is not the "grand," but the "grandiose" style, the style in which the form of expression smothers the meaning, instead of adequately reflecting it; and no fault is so common in Milton's prose as this,—a fault, indeed, which almost permeates it. The same fault is often to be found in the prose of Dr. Johnson, though hardly ever in his conversation, where we may find plenty of specimens of a style very closely approaching to the grand style, and falling short of it only in the missing sense of that perfect rhythm and delicacy of minute impression which seems essential to soften the grandeur of a great personality into the aptness and beauty of true stateliness. Dr. Johnson's "roar," as it was called, was not the grand style, because Dr. Johnson was not a poet, and could only write one kind of impressive verse. For the grand style, there must be not only some consciousness of a great personality, but also some real sense of correspondence between the rhythm of the poet's mind and the rhythm of the universal order itself. Milton felt this correspondence profoundly, so soon as he was in the mood of verse, and there is no clearer indication of the true poetic nature than this,—that the mood of verse should be a tempering and restraining mood, a mood which puts a bridle on the vagrant fancy, and curtails excess of metaphor and verbiage, instead of multiplying it; and this restraining, tempering, and stimulating touch was certainly communicated to Milton's imagination by the mood of verse. But in the mood of controversy, Milton did not feel at all this restraining sense that he must in some sense conform his own mind to the rhythm of the divine order, and hence we see in the eloquence of his controversial works little but the untamed luxuriance of prodigal fancy and irritable self-will. It would be impossible, nevertheless, to find a better illustration of the sense which a great poet ought to have that his mind is bound to conform its own rhythm to some rhythm of divine order, to be discerned by him, though with difficulty, in the world without, than Milton's great invocation to Urania, at the beginning of the seventh book of "Paradise Lost," to descend with him and guide him in the sphere of earth, as she had previously guided him in the supersensual world:—

"More safe, I sing with mortal voice, unchanged
To hoarse or mute, though fallen on evil days,
On evil days though fall'n, and evil tongues;
In darkness and with dangers compass'd round
And solitude, yet not alone, whilst thou
Visit'st my slumbers nightly, or when morn
Purples the East;—still govern thou my song, Urania, and fit audience find, though few."

We could not give a nobler example of "the grand style" than those few lines, or a clearer indication that the poet whose language falls naturally into its rhythm, must be one with a deep sense of personal greatness, dominated by the thought that unless that greatness is subdued into full harmony with the rhythm of a diviner order than its own, it cannot be the true greatness. Verse almost always exercises this spell over Milton, subduing his thought into a sort of majestic humility not natural to him in any but the poetic mood. In prose, he is often a scold, and his voice betrays all the discords of a scold; in verse, a lofty patience comes to the succour of his greatness, and makes it chime in with the divine order, instead of simply clashing with others in angry competition for the divine favour.

It may be supposed, perhaps, that "the grand style," in this sense, is the style of all true poets, so far as they are true poets. But this we should entirely deny. Tennyson, for instance, is not only a true, but a great poet, and he can command the grand style at times; but then, again, a great deal of his poetry, and a great deal of his fine poetry, is not written in the grand style, and some of his most effective poetry is written in a style wholly inconsistent with the grand style, in a self-pitying, or a feverish and morbid style. "Ulysses" is in the grand style; "Tithonus" is in the grand style; many passages in the "Idyls of the King," more especially "The Passing of Arthur" and parts of "The Coming of Arthur," are in the grand style; but "Tears, idle tears," could not possibly be in the grand style, its note being essentially that of the minor key; "Locksley Hall" is not only not in the grand style, but is the reflection of a morbid mood; "The Gardener's Daughter," and "Enoch Arden," and "Aylmer's Field," and "The Golden Supper," are the tales in verse in general, are not, and could not be, in the grand style, as they are not chastened enough, not subdued enough in spirit, not lucid enough in their outlook on the Universe, for the grand style. Again, very little that either Byron or Shelley ever wrote is in "the grand style,"—parts of the "Cenci," the concluding lines of "Alastor," perhaps the sonnet on "Mutability" and on "Ozymandias," and a few other poems, being exceptions in the case of Shelley. But Shelley undoubtedly knew what it was. The concluding passage in "Alastor" is one of the finest examples of "the grand style" which our language contains:—

"It is a woe too 'deep for tears' when all
Is reft at once, when some surpassing spirit
Whose light adorned the world around it, leaves
Those who remain behind, not sobs or groans,
The passionate tumult of a clinging hope,
But pale despair and cold tranquillity,
Nature's vast frame, the web of human things, Birth and the grave, which are not what they were."

Mr. Swinburne has rarely touched "the grand style," except, perhaps, in the self-restrained iambics of "Atalanta" and the other Greek play. Mr. Browning almost anxiously repudiates the grand style, his great ambition being to be familiar, modern, and interlocutory. But of Shakespeare, one naturally asks,—did not Shakespeare understand thoroughly the grand style? We should answer certainly he understood it, but he hardly ever used it when he was writing in his own name. He used it to perfection when writing in the name of a great prince like Hamlet, a Roman aristocrat like Coriolanus, a mighty magician like Prospero, a desolate queen like Cleopatra; but in his own "Sonnets" he hardly ever touches the grand style. He seems hardly to have thought enough of his own personality to write, when writing in his own name, with the high solemnity of Milton or Arnold. He reserved his illustrations of the grand style for the regal natures which he so finely painted,—for Cleopatra, when, in her passionate grief, she declares that,—

"—There is nothing left remarkable

for Prospero, when he tells us that,—

"We are such stuff
As dreams are made of, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep;"

for Macbeth, when he declares that,—

"Macbeth has murdered sleep."

The "grand style" used by a poet writing in his own name implies a deep sense of sonorous chords in his own being, in perfect harmony with the deeper chords of the universal order, and this many true poets have never felt at all, and many more only in rare moods. Wordsworth knew well what the grand style was, and used it not unfrequently with the most magnificent effect, as, for example, in the "Ode to Duty," every word of which is in the grand style,—and in the great ode, on the "Intimations of Immortality," almost the whole of which is written in that style, though with some curious and remarkable flaws. But some of Wordsworth's finer poems were in altogether a different key. "The Daisy," "The Little Celandine," "The Green Linnet," and all the poems of that class, are not and could not have been in the grand style. They do not echo the deep sense of personal grandeur in Wordsworth so far as he was in harmony with the universal order, and were not meant to do so, but only to reflect the little ripple of joy with which he received one of the smaller impressions of Nature's beauty. For "the grand style," it is requisite that the writer should first be conscious, either directly or dramatically, of some great personality; and next, that he should feel deeply the sympathy between that personality and the great music of the divine order of which it forms a part.

THE BILL TO PUT DOWN PIGEON-SHOOTING.

THE discussion on Mr. Anderson's excellent Bill entirely verified our recent remarks on the extraordinary power exerted by the leaders of Fashion to give the coup de grâce to a practice that is morally discreditable, and yet which shows enormous tenacity of life till it receives a stroke of this sort. Sir H. Maxwell, who moved the unsuccessful amendment which was meant to dispose of the Bill, actually confessed that the condemnation of the practice by the Princess of Wales, had he believed in it, would have had far more weight with him than anything Mr. Anderson had said; and yet Mr. Anderson (though not exactly a taking or persuasive speaker) had stated his case with remarkable force and cogency. "I do not believe," said Sir H. Maxwell, "that the Princess of Wales has expressed any opinion adverse to the practice of pigeon-shooting; but had she done so, her opinion would certainly have had far greater weight with me than the arguments which have been put forward by the honourable Member in support of his Bill." That is frank, at all events, and may be regarded as making out our position so far as regards the particular case of Sir H. Maxwell with perfect success and precision. And, moreover, the general drift of the debate points in precisely the same direction. The second reading was carried by 195 votes against 40, so soon as it was once understood that Mr. Anderson would withdraw his second clause, which was believed to interfere with "sport" of a kind not condemned by the fashionable world, though worthy of all condemnation,—the hunting, we mean, of tame stags carted to the "meet," and carefully saved from the dogs to be hunted another time, when the run is over; and the hunting also of bagged foxes and trapped hares and rabbits, which have far less chance of escape than the wild animal. The fashionable world has not yet been educated up to disapproving such ignoble sports as these, sports which inflict far more than the ordinary amount of torture, because, at least in the case of the carted deer, they inflict it on a creature which has already gained an experience of terror in the same field, and which has less than the ordinary resources for escape. But the fashionable world not having been yet educated up to this point, and the sporting world being able to plead that her Majesty's own staghounds should hardly be put down by law, Mr. Anderson thought that his Bill would be lost if he insisted on the second clause,—a clause which had not secured the high sanction accorded to the prohibition of pigeon-shooting,—and accordingly the second clause had to be thrown overboard, to save the first. We believe that he judged rightly, first, because it is far better in such cases for the law to follow the public conscience than to go before it, the only result of which is that the people revolt against the law; and next, because a real change for the better in the law, and one for which the public conscience is quite ripe, would probably have been indefinitely postponed by grasping at something for which the public conscience is not yet ripe. But nothing can show more powerfully the influence of fashion on the morale of the world than the mere fact that, while almost everybody was willing to give up the existing pastime of pigeon-shooting as cruel and ignoble, and even Sir H. Maxwell, apparently, wanted only to be convinced that the Princess of Wales really disapproves it, to give it up too, the great majority in the House were strongly disinclined to condemn so very cruel and ignoble a form of amusement as hunting a tame stag,—a stag that has lost all its wild habits and all that keenness of sense peculiar to the wild state,—and would have rejected the Bill altogether, rather than condemn that miserable form of sport. We are not often able to say anything in favour of the speeches of Lord Randolph Churchill, but his speech of Wednesday entitles him to our cordial thanks. For our own parts, we regard the form of amusement for which the House of Commons proved itself so zealous on Wednesday, as hardly less cruel, though certainly more inhumane in the strict sense of that word, than that cruel amusement by which Sir Walter Scott, in "Quentin Durward," represents Louis XI. as diverting from himself the wrath of Charles of Burgundy,—the hunting of the false herald of the Liègeois and the Boar of Ardenne, by the two monarchs and their followers.

Mr. Anderson more than justified the one provision of which he has really carried the second reading, the prohibition of Pigeon-shooting. He showed that it is not an athletic or skill-testing sport at all, that it is a mere form of gambling, a very cruel form of gambling, and usually deformed by the grossest inhumanities practised to weight the scales in favour of or against particular gamblers. He showed how often pigeons are half-blinded to make them fly awry, or tortured in the trap to make them spring at once into the air; and that even at its best, this wholesale pigeon-slaughter is not an amusement testing either the endurance, or the keenness, or the sagacity of the true sportsman; and, as we have said, he carried the House with him. But we very much doubt whether he would have carried the House with him, but for the previous sentence of high society. The truth is, that the House, while loudly professing its wish to put an end to all cruelty, does not as yet believe in any sort of commensurability between the pains and pleasures of the lower animals and those of man. The obvious belief in the minds of the majority of the Members is that no amount of animal pain is too great to compensate for a clear addition to human pleasure, however small, and that no amount of human pain is too small to outweigh in importance any amount of animal pain, however great. That seems to us an utterly immoral doctrine; but every victory like Mr. Anderson's will make some substantial inroad on the obdurate and portentous selfishness of our too self-important race.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE LITERARY DIFFICULTIES OF THE TORIES.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will the writer of the article on "The Literary Difficulties of Tories" tell us where "the authors of the Church Catechism" "make much of the virtue of content," meaning, probably, by "content," resignation? I know of none, and shall be curious to learn what he is referring to. I have, so far, supposed that the true Liberal's motto, "Onward and upward," could rightly be claimed by an English Churchman. If I am told the Catechism says "No" to this, it will be indeed a case of "an old friend with a new face." Absit omen!—I am, Sir, &c., L. T. RENDELL.

THE PROSPECTS OF ENGLISH LAND.

SIR,—Mr. F. Impey remarks that la petite culture is a lost art in England. Can he prove that, apart from pasture dairy-farming and market gardening, it was ever an art at all in this country? At all events, if it ever flourished, it must have existed under those very powers of settlement and feudal laws which he assumes to be such a hindrance to it now. Mr. Impey draws attention to the successful production of milk and butter on la petite culture system, applied to arable land in Denmark, and implies that the same system might be successful in this country. I agree with him that, as far as soil and climate are concerned, there is no valid reason why arable dairy-farming should not prosper here. The difficulty lies in the different habits of the people and circumstances of the countries. The Danish and Belgian peasant has inherited the qualities necessary to the practice of the extremely difficult art of la petite culture, and so, to a certain extent, have the animals, which are his intelligent fellow-workers. The traveller in those countries may see a cow and a donkey, an old woman and a pony, or any other pair of living creatures, yoked together to the plough or harrow, and getting on quite amicably together. In those countries, human beings and animals alike will do fairly well on food which neither would look at in England, and are no more exacting as to comfortable housing. The strictest economy in every respect is practised, hardly any straw is used for litter, being sold off the premises, I presume; general slush prevails; and the only clean thing which meets the eye is commonly the butter, which is to be sent to market. Belgium, being already dotted over with little homesteads, conveniently scattered amongst small holdings, and being inhabited by a thrifty and skilled peasantry, having the knack of taking catch crops, such as mustard and rye, and growing patches of hemp, flax, colza, &c., crops almost unknown to our people, and accustomed to utilise every scrap of fertilising matter, is a country which affords little or no parallel to England from which you can fairly draw any inference. In England, the ever-increasing demand for beef and mutton is what practically determines the nature of our agriculture. As long as our teeming industrial population insists on having home-grown joints, chops, and steaks, stock-farming on a large scale, by which method meat can be most excellently and economically manufactured, is sure to prevail. Change we our land-laws never so wisely, petite culture will never supersede grande culture, provided we maintain our industrial supremacy.

If it be alleged that peasant-proprietors keep as many head of cattle as our farmers, in proportion to the size of their farms, it must be remembered (supposing the fact to be admitted) that the cattle are kept for ploughing and milking, but not for the butcher. Sheep, absolutely requiring an extensive run and management on a considerable scale, are quite beyond the range of peasant-farming. I repeat the opinion expressed in the conclusion of my former letter, that it is only by some kind of co-operative association, or by being admitted to some share in the profits of farming operations on a comparatively large scale, that our labourers who elect to remain at home can reasonably hope to improve their material condition in the arable districts of England.—I am, Sir, &c.,

MR. BRADLAUGH'S DISCLAIMER OF ATHEISM.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your notice of "The Present-day Tracts" of the Religious Tract Society, in your issue of March 3rd, you say, with reference to Dr. Noah Porter's use of the term "atheism," as synonymous with "agnosticism," "Even Mr. Bradlaugh, we see, emphatically declares that he has never denied the existence of a God." In spite of this disclaimer, the following announcement appears week by week in the National Reformer. I quote from the current number of the paper, dated March 4th. The italics are my own:—"The full legal responsibility for everything which appears in these columns rests on Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant, as editors and publishers of the paper. For the opinions expressed in all signed articles, the writers alone are morally responsible. The editorial policy of the paper is Republican, Atheistic, and Malthusian; but all opinions are freely admitted, provided only that they be expressed reasonably and in proper language." I confess I was startled when I first read Mr. Bradlaugh's disclaimer, and still find it difficult to reconcile it with this announcement of editorial policy. Read in the light of this announcement, it is not to be wondered at if much that appears in the National Reformer, with Mr. Bradlaugh's own signature, be viewed as designed to advocate absolute atheism, although it may stop short of embodying in plain terms the conclusion, "There is no God."—I am, Sir, &c.,

CANON RAWLINSON ON THE ANTIQUITY OF MAN.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your appreciative notice of the "Present-Day Tracts" issued by this Society, you say, with reference to Canon Rawlinson's tract on "The Antiquity of Man, Historically Considered," that he goes "beyond his brief, when he says there are no traces of the primitive savage." "Such a very sweeping assertion as this," "opposed, as it seems to be, to what we know about the cave men and the implements found in the drift, seems somewhat out of place." On looking at the tract again, p. 26, your reviewer will observe that Canon Rawlinson's statement is more limited. He says:—"The explorers who have dug deep into the Mesopotamian mounds and ransacked the tombs of Egypt, have come upon no certain traces of savage man in those regions which a wide-spread tradition makes the cradle of the human race." The italics are not Canon Rawlinson's. As you say, a tract on the subject (the age and origin of man, geologically considered) will shortly appear.—I am, Sir, &c.,

COMPENSATION FOR PERMANENT IMPROVEMENTS IN TOWNS AND SANITARY IMPROVEMENTS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The annual reports of the two Sanitary Associations established in London have shown us pretty plainly how bad is the sanitary state of most of our houses. There is one cause of this which no amount of instruction in sanitary matters can destroy. This is the fact that the larger number of householders in London and our large towns are not only not the owners of their habitations, but that they receive no compensation from their landlords for any permanent improvements which they undertake. The consequence is that householders are most loth to do more than they are positively obliged to do in the way of permanent structural improvements. If they become aware that the drainage of a house is imperfect, they will either recklessly trust that they may not be injured by it, or they will adopt measures of the most inexpensive and temporary kind to palliate the mischief. On the other hand, if tenants were to receive some reasonable compensation from their landlords for structural and permanent improvements to their houses, there can be no question that a greater step would be taken to improve the sanitary state of London and our towns than by many years' lectures and addresses. It may be urged on behalf of the landlords that it is hard that they should pay for things which they do not desire should be done. But the answer to this objection is that their property is benefited by the improvements, and that it is for the benefit of society generally that dwelling-houses should be made as healthy and as comfortable as possible. It is contrary to public policy to let a man simply stand by and take rent to prevent improvements being done by the occupier. As long as they are permanent improvements, he should pay some share of their cost, when the house reverts into his possession. If those who are desirous of improving the sanitary condition of London houses were to direct their energies to this point, they would have strong support; and should they succeed, would have immeasurably advanced the progress of sanitary improvement.

THE "SCAMPER THROUGH AMERICA."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your interesting notice of Mr. Hudson's "Scamper through America," in the Spectator of January 27th, I find the statement made, I presume on his authority, that "the Railroad Companies killed, in 1880, twenty-seven hundred persons at their 'level crossings.'" Some "sad, preoccupied saturnine" humorist must have practised upon Mr. Hudson's credulity.

The evil is, indeed, serious, and the number of such crossings excessive. In Massachusetts alone there are, according to the returns for 1882, 2,151 over railroads and highways; and the Commissioners say that even this statement is not, and cannot be, exact, "as many ways crossed by railroads are of doubtful legal condition." But the number of persons killed at highway crossings in that State in 1880 was only nineteen; in 1882, twenty-one. I am not aware that there is any means of ascertaining the total number of such crossings in the United States, or the accidents occurring upon them; but by the census of 1880, the total number of persons killed or injured "upon or within the trains, the tracks, or the buildings," of all the Railway Companies in the United States during the last complete fiscal year preceding June 1st, 1880, including passengers, employés, and other persons, was,—killed, 2,541; injured, 5,674; or a total of 8,215.

The whole number in the United Kingdom for the year 1880 was killed, 1,135; injured, 3,959; and adding those killed, 45, and injured, 2,733, on the Railway Companies' premises by accidents in which the movement of vehicles used exclusively on railways was not concerned, the total was 7,872.

In the United Kingdom, in 1880, there were killed at level crossings, 74; in 1881, 83; besides, reported as suicides, whether at crossings or elsewhere, it is presumed, in 1880, 60; in 1881, 65; totals, in 1880, 134; in 1881, 148.

Perhaps some doubt may be entertained as to the justice of this accusation against the alleged suicides, in the absence of the most important witness, and I do not undertake to say how many of the "sad, preoccupied" victims of the American Juggernaut may have purposely thrown themselves under his car.

It may not be without interest to note that the comparative mileage and population of the two countries were as follows.—

United Kingdom, Population (1881)	35,246,663
United States " (1880)	50,155,783
United Kingdom, Length of Railways Open (1880)	17,933
United States " " Completed "	87,891

This is not, however, proposed as, in all respects, a fair basis of comparison in reference to the number of accidents.

You will, I am sure, pardon my unwillingness to leave such an error with even the apparent authority of the Spectator in its favour.—I am, Sir, &c.,
G. S. H.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The following passage, taken from an address of the late Dr. Vaughan, of Manchester, delivered in 1853 at a meeting of the Geological Society in that city, seems to be well worthy of quotation at the present moment. I copy it from "The Autobiography of Mr. Nasmyth," who observes that tunnels were not thought of at that time:—"After referring," says the writer, "to the influence which geological changes had produced upon the condition of nations, and the moral results which oceans, mountains, islands, and continents have had upon the social history of man," he (Dr. Vaughan) went on to say,—"Is not this island of ours indebted to these great causes? Oh, that blessed geological accident that broke up a strait between Calais and Dover! It looks but a little thing; it was a matter to take place; but how mighty the moral results upon the condition and history of this country, and through this country's influence, upon humanity! Bridge over the space between, and you have directly the huge, Continental barrack-yard system all over England. And once get into the condition of a great Continental military Power, and you get the arbitrary power; you cramp down the people, and you unfit them for being what they ought to be,—free! And all the good influences together at work in this country could not have secured us against this, but for that blessed separation between this Isle and the Continent."—I am, Sir, &c.,

BRAITHWAITE AND BUTTERMERE RAILWAY.

SIR,—Will you allow me space to call attention to a matter, recently come to light, which deserves not only that careful consideration which I have no doubt a Parliamentary Committee will give it, but some public criticism also?

One of the clauses of the petition to the Lords against the projected line, which has been largely signed by the resident gentry, the land-owners, the hotel-keepers, and the tradesmen of Keswick, tells us—I quote from memory—"That the petitioners hear and do verily believe that the promoters of the said line would not have applied for Parliamentary powers, had they not been compelled to do so by the terms of the Honister quarry lease."

This, if it be the fact, means that the Lord of the Manor has insisted, as part of his bargain with the lessees, that they shall go to Parliament and ask for powers to take away common's rights; run amuck through the most valuable residential and private properties on the west shore of Derwentwater; practically close one of the most favourite carriage-drives in the neighbourhood; damage the most enduring commercial interests of the tradesmen, lodginghouse-keepers, and hotel-keepers of Keswick, Grange, and Borrowdale; and do such harm to the natural quiet and beauty of the Lake and Vale as will be little less than a national misfortune.

That this is the fact, we infer from what, as we are informed, occurred a few years since, in connection with these same quarries. A lease was being entered into, had got so far that the agent of the noble owner had told the lessees they might get their plant and begin, when a clause was insisted on to the effect that, as part of the bargain, they must construct this railway. The lessees said it could not pay them to do so, but told the noble owner, if he would construct the line, they would pay freightage over it for their slate. His Lordship refused, and the lease fell to the ground. Though Honister slate was paying 90s. then, as opposed to 64s. a ton now, I trust the matter will receive the attention it deserves.—I am, Sir, &c., H. B. RAWNSLEY,

Hon. Sec., Borrowdale and Derwentwater Defence Fund.

P.S.—If any of our numerous friends who know the fact of the projected line or this district will correspond personally with the Lords during the next few days, the information they can give will, no doubt, strengthen the hands of the Peers when they vote upon the Report from the Select Committee.

BOOKS.

KOMPERT'S SKETCHES OF JEWISH LIFE.*

THESE stories, though written, apparently, as far back as 1848, are tolerably fair transcripts of Jewish life in Slavonic countries at the present day, and throw no little light upon the Juden-hass to which the Ashkenazim are still, as they were then, exposed. The Jew usurer and the Jew dram-seller are not, probably, worse than other usurers and dram-sellers, but the Children of Israel have for ages—be it their misfortune, or be it their fault—nearly monopolised both trades in Central and Eastern Europe, and cannot escape the penalty of mingled fear and hatred attached to pursuits that have become associated in their lucrative results with the necessities and failings of the weak and the vicious. Doubtless, this is by no means the whole explanation of the peculiarly bitter detestation in which they are held, wherever they form a notable element in the population. Their obstinate scorn, not so much of Christianity as of Christian folk, manifested openly enough, though after a passive rather than a militant fashion, and their persistent isolation from all but gainful intercourse with surrounding humanity, are permanent and more fundamental causes of Gentile hostility. "Schmah, Israel" ("Hear, Israel"), cries the wife of the "Randar," or farmer of spirits, in one of the most striking of these novellen, addressing her son, "do you want to drink brandy? Do you forget you are the son of Rebb (Master) Schmell? What Jewish child drinks brandy? Brandy is for peasants alone." "I am forbidden to kneel," cries the boy at school when ordered to do so in expiation of some fault. "Do you not prefer a single Jewish soul to a whole village of peasants?" exclaims an old-clothes man. "Your dear Moritz," writes the last-mentioned character to the Randar, "went with his chaver [companion] Honza [a Christian schoolmate] to the village, and there danced, drank, ate,—and with whom? Great God! with peasant girls and youths." Honza's father is sent to prison for having fired the Randar's house. "You Jews," shrieks his son, "are the sole cause of my father's misery! Have you not supplied him with drink, have you not made profit out of him, until he is at last in irons? Your father" (he is speaking to the Randar's son) "is a leech, glutted with the blood of the whole village." The Randar's daughter is reproached for singing a Bohemian song. "But they sing it in the village," pleads the girl. "That is the very reason," is the stern reply. Moritz cannot understand his father's unpopularity. At last he hits upon the reason,—it is his father's intellectual superiority. "If the Jews were a little less intelligent and the peasants a little more so, the true secret of accord would then have been found." As the tale, "The Randar's Children," proceeds, the son gets more enlightened. "It is precisely your present profession," he tells his father, "which puts you in such sad relations with the peasants. Can you not take farmland, and get your living by that?" Unfortunately, in those days, that was exactly what the laws did not allow a Jew to do. Moritz, who is intended for a doctor, and receives a fair education, becomes more and more liberal in his views. In a very curious written soliloquy, he speculates upon the quarrel between Jew and Christian. "Yesterday evening, I saw Hannele [his sister], lighting two wax tapers. But the first, in giving its luminous kiss to the second went out itself. Will it be thus with the Jewish and Christian religions?" He admires a State religion. "We Jews had one formerly in what does it really consist?" The people as a mass "ask but one thing,—to see" this religion "freely chiselled in all places on stone, declared verbally, represented by pictures, proclaimed to the sound of music." "It is rare," he laments, "in the Ghetto, to see a child with flowers in its hand. Are the Jews really deprived of the sentiment of nature? With them, even children can do without flowers." "What is wanting to our religion," he concludes, and doubtless the author speaks through him, "is the feminine element then would have disappeared some of that stiffness which is only now beginning to bend. Women know how to soften everything. As it is, the Jewish religion is only for men." The book abounds with like undesigned explanations of the ever-recurring Judenhetze. To be sad as a Christian, to take pleasure as a Christian, to eat or drink, marry or die like a Christian, is to be a posche Israel,—a bad Jew. The Jew is a foreigner in the land of his birth and life, out of all sympathy with his compatriots, who are so only by accident of locality; his religion is hard, unlovely, strange, Oriental, exclusive, disdainful, as repellent now as in the days of Moses, for never in the course of their history have the Jews attracted Pagan, Idolator, Christian, or Moslem.

The scene of these novellen, which are only four in number, is laid in Czeckish Bohemia. Despite the title, they are as descriptive of the life of the village Jew as of that of his fellow in the Ghetto. The portrait of the latter is not an attractive one. "The Jew of the Ghetto is rarely simple-minded and primitive; he is, on the contrary, sharp, angular, and as biting as an acid." On the other hand, the village Jew is "nearer to nature," but "heavier, and less keen;" living away from the Ghetto, he "has no need to be clever and cunning." "The Jew's sharpness," it is added—and the remark is as just as it is acute—"is, after all, a sort of moral weapon, directed against certain offences which he is either unwilling or unable to repress by physical means." The most interesting of the four stories are "The Randar's Children," which is rather a sketch of Jewish village life contrasted with the surrounding Christianity than a tale, and "Without Authorisation." The last named is one of the most charming stories we have ever read, and, even in the translation, is redolent of the humour of Otto Müller and the grace of Paul Heyse. It turns on the love and pride of a Jewish mother. Jaeker (Jacob) Lederer was the last-born of his father's four sons, and "being neither first-born, nor a doctor, nor a workman (like his elder brothers), could not, by the State laws, be the head of a family." In fact, he was a "State criminal," in merely continuing to exist. Nevertheless, he lived on and, what is more, fell in love with a "pretty girl, named Resel [Rachel] the daughter of a poor hawker like himself." Before he could marry, however, he had to get the proper reschojin, or official permission. Such a permission was not given save to a familiant, or Jew possessed of a "right of family," a right only granted in 1848, according to the translator, to some thousand families in all Bohemia. Without such a right, being neither a learned graduate nor a licensed artisan, he had no title even to residence. The pair, notwithstanding, were betrothed, and for fourteen years endeavoured, but without success, to get over the reschojin difficulty. Jaeker was now thirty-six, his fiancée three years younger, and, after much hesitation, they resolved to dispense with the reschojin, and to get as much married as was possible "without authorisation." A boy was born, and, some few years afterwards, a new burgomaster coming into office, discovered Lederer's contravention, and, with the zeal of a freshly-appointed functionary, cited the unlucky hawker before him. Jaeker consulted the "advocate," Rebb Lippmann Goldberg, "of whom people said, by way of eulogy, that 'he had a head of iron.'" The only way of getting out of the scrape was to avoid admitting the marriage, and, after much persuasion, the wife was induced to say before the official, but in the midst of tears and sobs, "Am I not his housekeeper?" The burgomaster, who saw through the matter, and regretted his hasty zeal, dismissed Jaeker, with a caution to treat his "illegitimate" child and his housekeeper as though they were legitimate child and wife. Jaeker was glad enough to get off so easily, but the mother brooded over the term "illegitimate" applied to her boy, and on learning its meaning was beside herself with grief. It was afflicting enough that she should be a "housekeeper," but that her boy should be a "natural child" broke her very heart. Then she conceived the notion of asking the aid of the Emperor towards procuring a "family right" to be conferred upon Jaeker, so that her child might be legitimated. Of course, every one, her husband loudest of all, ridiculed the idea; of course, the mother stuck to it, became more and more convinced of its feasibility, and with the help of an admirable petition drawn up by the advocate with "a head of iron," actually carried it out, with all the success her courage and constancy merited.

The book is full of vivid descriptions of the quaint life of the Ghetto. Every young Jew has to go through a somewhat trying ordeal on his bar-mitzveh (initiation). He reads or intones before the Synagogue a chapter of the Thora, and woe to him if he mispronounces a word, or stumbles over a punctuation; he is ever after a "stickit" Jew, like the schlemiel ("lout") in the first story, whose discomfiture upon such an occasion is most humorously described. The houses of the well-to-do Jews are rendezvous of wandering schnorrer, or bedesmen, who bring the news of Israel from the remotest corners of Central and

* Scenes from the Ghetto. Translated from the German of Leopold Kompert. London: Remington and Co. 1882.

Eastern Europe, and are often full of "good stories, clever tricks, and Talmudic subtleties." One of these schnorrer, Mendel Wilna by name, mentioned in the story of "The Randar's Children," was an ardent believer in the restoration of Jerusalem, and the glow of his enthusiasm seems to radiate from the carefully drawn and striking portrait which the author has presented to us of this strange tramp. Of the many Ghetto holidays, none is more welcome than the Holemood,—"it laughs, jokes, and performs a thousand pranks." Yet the Holemood is but a minor feast, inserted, as it were, to give relief, in the festivals at Easter and at Tabernacles. It is "the intermediary element between the silent lips of the Sabbath and the noisy gesticulations of the work-day." A peculiar festal air envelops everything; "nowhere can be heard the piercing business cry, and it is only to avoid losing the habit that people go their daily rounds." The sun itself seems "to shine in a more joyous manner. It throws its rays like so many golden threads on the narrow and pointed gable-ends of the Ghetto. Above the houses, daylight; below, twilight. But where the street widens, the golden threads disperse themselves, falling unobstructed to the earth; and the faces of those who happen to walk under these threads become covered with the sun's rays, and as if gilded."

We must not, however, linger longer over these charming stories, in turn pathetic and humorous, always picturesque in style, and simple, almost naïf, in language, but permeated by a reflective earnestness that lifts them far above the level of mere tales. A word of thanks is due to the translator, who, judging from the smoothness of his English, seems to have performed his task extremely well; and the reader will be grateful for the notes, in themselves often interesting, explaining the numerous Jewish expressions and usages mentioned in the text.

BRIGHTER BRITAIN.*

BRISK, frank, and cheery is the tone of these volumes, and they are written with sense, as well as spirit. The author, Mr. William Delisle Hay, dashes at once in medias res, and we shall follow his example. On landing at Auckland, his attention was drawn to the fact that all the Aucklanders he met had strangely aquiline noses. Hebrews he knew they were not, and he got the following explanation from a whimsical fellow-voyager, himself an old Aucklander:—

"Ah! that's a peculiarity of the climate. You'll have a long nose, too, after a year or so. There's an Auckland proverb, that a new chum never does any good until his nose has grown. It's like the proverbial cutting of the wisdom-teeth. After inhaling this magnificent air of ours for a year or two, your nose will grow bigger, to receive it; and about the same time, you will have spent the money you brought with you, gone in for hard work, learnt common-sense, and become 'colonised.'"

"New chum" is the name given by the old settlers to a fresh arrival from England. His ways are not their ways, and his doings are regarded pretty much as a "freshman's" are, or used to be, at Oxford. Mr. Hay, to bear out, as he says, one of the received theories about "new chums," namely, their utter want of frugality, took his ease in the Long's or Claridge's of Auckland, instead of in one of the minor inns. The tariff was not excessive, 8s. a day, inclusive of everything but liquors. The servants showed no symptoms of servility, but in ability they seem not wanting. One morning, soon after his arrival, he got down to breakfast rather late. Something seemed to have creased his landlady's temper, and she greeted him with, "Look here, young man! I can't have people walking in to breakfast at all hours of the day. If you don't come down at the proper time, you'll have to go without in future, mind that!" But the waiter, bringing with him a dish which he had been keeping hot for Mr. Hay, slapped it down in front of him, and observed, in a tone of mild remonstrance to his mistress, "Leave the man alone. I'll look after him. Now, just you walk into that, my boy, and see if it won't suit your complaint!" A sociological Cuvier like Swift might be able to construct from this incident a fairly correct picture of the "social relations that obtain" in Northern New Zealand. Mr. Hay spares his readers the trouble of so attempting anything of the kind, but we cannot quote any more of his illustrations of that "general fusion of all sorts of people," which produces, in his opinion, "a very amiable and friendly state of things."

We must, also, leave the reader to follow for himself Mr. Hay's vivacious narrative of the life he led after "going up country," and to make his own acquaintance with Mr. Hay's chums, "Old Colonial," "the Little Un," "the Fiend," and the Irishman "O'Gaygun." They are hearty, pleasant fellows, worth making acquaintance with; and their quaint sayings and doings add a Bret-Harte kind of flavour to the author's obviously literal descriptions of the herculean labours, which a colonist must be prepared to face, who is bent on forcing his way by axe and spade to a competence. We must, however, find room for the following passage, which contradicts a notion that is held by most of the colonists, and may possibly meet the eye of some of our "home-keeping youths," and be of welcome service to them:—

"The advantages which the average middle-class 'young gentleman' may reasonably look forward to from emigration to New Zealand are these:—In the first place, he may expect to enjoy robust health, more perfect and enjoyable than he could hope for if tied down to a counting-house stool in the dingy atmosphere of a city. He will exchange the dull monotony of a sedentary occupation in the chill and varying climate of Britain for a life of vigorous action in a land whose climate is simply superb. When he gets through the briars that must necessarily be traversed at the outset, he will find himself happier, freer from anxiety, and, on the whole, doing better than he would be if he had remained in the old life. If he be anything of a man, before ten or a dozen years are gone he will find himself with a bit of land and a house of his own; he will be married, or able to marry, his earnings will suffice for existence, while every pound saved and invested in property will be growing, doubling, and quadrupling itself, for his age and his children. There is something to work for here,—independence, contentment, and competence." "I am not," continues Mr. Hay, "an emigration tout, and have no interest in painting my picture in too vivid colours, and in these remarks I have transgressed against some of the ordinary colonial views on the subject; but I have done so with intention, because I consider them not entirely in the right. The colonist says, 'We don't want gentlemen here, we want men.' But he forgets that the unfortunate individual he disparages has often more real manhood at bottom than the class below him. Therefore, the middle-class emigrant must remember the qualities most required in him,—pluck, energy, and resolution."

As to the "superb climate" mentioned in the above extract, we have really, in this winter of our discontent, no heart to copy any of Mr. Hay's eulogies on that. His glowing descriptions of,—

"An ampler ether, a diviner air,
And fields invested with purpureal gleams," are, just at present, too tantalising. While the mirth of our December is quenched in fog, and the warmth of our July is served out to us with the chill on,—

"We have no mind to hear
The story of that distant bliss,"

which our fellow-mortals are enjoying, eight thousand miles beneath our feet. We prefer, rather, in the spirit of malevolence engendered by envy, to quote our author's account of the kauri bug. Northern New Zealand is as free from snakes and scorpions and poisonous centipedes as it is from "contagious fogs" and Stygian "mists and exhalations." But Beelzebub has taken it out of this earthly paradise in insects. "Spiders as big as walnuts, with great hairy legs two or three inches long," are encouraged rather than not, as they help to keep down the flies. Of these, the worst is the Maori blow-fly, which, soaring supreme, as Mr. Hay puts it, over all the blue-bottles' old-fashioned systems, is a coloniser with a vengeance, troubling itself to lay no eggs or nits, but carrying its family about ready-hatched, and prepared at a moment's notice "to deposit an incredible number of lively, hungry maggots upon any desirable surface." But the Maori blow-fly is nothing to the kauri bug. This creature is a "more fearful wild-fowl than your lion," and more terrible than the gruesome leeches which stalked Sir Emerson Tennent in Ceylon, and hung in bloody festoons about the ankles of his bare-legged attendants. Mr. Hay approaches this emperor of insect-pests in a jocular vein, but he is obviously laughing "with alien lips":—

"We do not know," he says, "whether this insect is known to naturalists, or not. That is a slight matter, and not particularly pertinent to the question of its interest for us. We believe, however, that no naturalist has yet been found of sufficiently ardent temperament, and of sufficiently hardy nerves, to attempt to classify or examine this most infamous of bugs. Appearances are deceptive very often; they are so in this instance. Nothing could look more innocent and inoffensive than the kauri bug, yet few insects rival it in crime. It is an oval shape, anything under and up to the size of a crown piece. It is flat, black, hard, and shiny, and resembles a cross between the English blackbeetle and the woodlouse or slater. It stinks. That is all it does,—but it is enough. Look at it, and it is harmless enough; but tread on it, touch it, disturb it never so slightly, and instantly the whole surrounding atmosphere is permeated with a stench more infernally and awfully horrible than anything else on this side of the Styx."

* Brighter Britain; or, Settler and Maori in Northern New Zealand. By W. D. Hay. 2 vols. London: E. Bentley and Co. 1882.

In his second volume, Mr. Hay gives a full and interesting account of Maori manners. But the race, he feels, is doomed, and he contemplates its doom with an equanimity which may seem cynical to a platform philanthropist, but to us seems sensible enough:—

"We do not need," he says, "to raise a cry of lamentation over the departing Maori. Let him go; we shall get on well enough without him. When the ordinary Englishman refers to the matter, he says:—'They're a splendid race, those Maories ["Maori" and "kaori" should be pronounced like "cowry"], and it's a thousand pities they should be dying out so fast.' With this commonly begins and ends the sum of his knowledge on the matter. Now, the Maori is not altogether such an absolutely superior person. Relatively to some aboriginal races,—the Australian black, for instance, and perhaps most of the North-American tribes,—the Maori may truly be described as a splendid race; but compared with the Anglo-Saxon, the Maori is nowhere. He cannot match our physical developments, nor our intellectual capacity, average compared with average. So let the Maori go. We do not wish him to, particularly. We are indifferent about the matter. We would not hurry him, on any account. Nay, we will even sympathise with him, and sorrow for him,—a little. We are content to know that he will make room for a superior race. It is but the process of Nature's sovereign law. The weaker is giving way to the stronger; the superior species is being developed, at the expense of the inferior."

As a subordinate illustration of the same law, it may be worth noticing that, owing to the pertinacity with which English traders send inferior goods to the Colonies, the superior cutlery of America is being rapidly developed, at the expense of the inferior cutlery of England. Mr. Bright's caveat-emptorism has its dangerous side; and the buyer who "boasteth when he is gone his way" is less to be dreaded than the buyer who sayeth, not in vain, after his purchase, "It is naught, it is naught!"

This notice does no manner of justice to the livelier portions of Mr. Hay's book,—to his vivacious sketches of originals like "Pirate Tom" and "Dandy Jack," to his bright, fresh pictures of colonial life and manners, or to the simplicity and clearness of his descriptions of scenery. We must make what amends we can, by heartily recommending Brighter Britain as a book which will excite and benefit the reader who has wisely made up his mind to emigrate to Northern New Zealand, and as a book which will amuse and interest him, if, with his lines fallen in decently pleasant places, he has quite as wisely determined to remain at home in England.

SUMMER SONGS AND POEMS.*

"AFTER a certain period," says Thomas Warton, "in every country and in every language, men grow weary of the natural, and search after the singular." The truth of the saying seems to be specially evident in our day, when the subjects chosen for verse and the method of treatment too often show a straining after singularity, a distorted vision, and feebleness of poetic power. These verse-men—for we do not care to call them poets—are not fools; it would be charitable to wish they were, so unmercifully do they treat the language, so fantastic, and not unfrequently sensual, is their imagery, so unwholesome is their representation of passion, so contemptible are their aspirations, so wanting are they generally in manliness of thought and simplicity of diction. That writers of this class, endowed though some of them may be with considerable, but perverted power, will permanently emasculate English poetry, we do not believe. This folly of the time, like the more innocent folly of Cowley's day, is but a passing fashion, the work of jaded intellects, appealing, as sensational fiction appeals, to jaded appetites.

Mr. Swinburne, in the early days of his career, catered to the taste we have been deploring, and thereby encouraged the extravagancies of smaller men. The spirit, for example, that pervades his Dolores has again and again inflamed the unnatural fancies of poetasters, whose verbiage and hollowness of sound are more conspicuous than the splendid music of their master. Summer Songs, and other Poems, are chiefly remarkable as exhibiting the defects of the erotic versifiers who, in turning Nature upside down, defy sense, morality, and grammar. In the love expressed by great poets, there has sometimes been too much of sexual passion, but the morbid sensuality which gloats over a woman's form and features, as if her flesh, and not the divinity that encircles her, were the sole object of attraction, is a product of our day. In this respect, Mr. Hewitt sins less than some verse-makers of his school, probably because his power is less, for in a long, maundering poem, called "Gitana," which contains quite as much nonsense as rhyme, he tries his best, or worst, to follow in their wake. The poet is about to part for ever from his "temptress," but before doing so, while lying together, with the great sea at their feet, he describes his past passion, confessing that it holds him captive still, and that while knowing the woman to be false, her eyes of fire burn him "soul and body through," so that he is forced to do what he would not do,—

"Love, woo and wear thy lips with mine,
Caress thee as I have caressed,
Cling to and fold thee, as a vine,
And sow with kisses.

And wearying, draw thy sweet, small head
Down to my lap and toss thy hair,
And whisper what may not be said,
And kiss down from thine ear to where
The throat is bare."

The next stanza, in which the poet tastes "the new-milk sweetness" of his lady's lip, cannot be quoted; then follows an inventory of her charms, consisting of a finely pencilled brow, sweeping, bronzed temples, a dainty head, eyes whose glory "may not be overmatched nor told," a delicately curved nose and melting mouth, and "cheeks that the black-thonged lashes lace." He asks, too, though it seems an unnecessary question, where the spot was in which first they knew of love,—

"When love and lip together grew,
As the vast ocean to the shore,
Or tidal bore?"

The elaborate account of this first meeting, when,—

"Spirit unto spirit slid Through lip and lid," is secure from quotation, but two stanzas further on may be given without offence. The writer is still recalling past delights:—

"I, too, would come upon you here,
And all unseen your arms entwine,
Then to my shoulder press thine ear,
And sideway pluck those lips of thine,
To touch with mine.

Or leaning over as you sat,
Your neat head lapped upon my knees,
Bend, till my mouth inverted gat
Thy rose-lips' honey to the lees,
Sweeter than bees'."

The position seems a difficult one, and Mr. Hewitt is, we believe, the first poet that ever plucked a woman's lips; but he achieves greater wonders still. Not only does passion fuse his "solid soul and purpose," while either the passion or the purpose, or both together, flash forth like molten snow "to fold her in its flow," but, to quote his own words,—

"I wove a song, you wound the tune,
Of loves that last—it was the mood
Which caught the colour of the noon,
And shot the world's weal rosy hue—
We dreamed love could."

The song, it may be remarked, is better than might have been expected, from this prelude. It is not original in thought, but it is more musical in expression than the larger portion of Mr. Hewitt's verses,—

"Life is not life if love in life be vain, Love is not love if love in life can die," is a couplet to be read with pleasure, which is more than can be said of any three consecutive stanzas out of the one hundred and seventy-five which form this poem.

Enough of "Gitana," and of the fault characteristic of a school of poets that led us to mention it. Other faults equally significant may be noted, namely, a disregard of common-sense and a striking confusion of similes and metaphors. Good-sense, says a living Professor of English Literature, is more essential to prose than poetry, "inasmuch as prose is destitute of that metrical rhythm and variegated embellishment with which verse can often conceal or disguise poverty or incorrectness of thought." A more unfortunate, we had almost said a more ignorant, remark was never made by a man of letters. Wherever "variegated embellishment" conceals poverty of thought, there, be sure, you will find no poetry; and the same remark holds good when a verse-maker considers himself superior to the ordinary rules of composition, deems that all is well, if only he can "rhyme and rattle."

In an Introduction, which commences with a wail of despair, so familiar that it has become common-place, Mr. Hewitt sings, in the second stanza, that his "blood had frozen motion," and also that,—

* Summer Songs and Poems. By J. A. Hewitt. London: Remington and Co. 1882.

"As the sea-beat's travail and sorrows
On the sea-board, seemed the smart
Of the blood-wave on the furrows
And reefs of a broken heart."

This may be "variegated embellishment," but it is certainly not sense, any more than it is grammar to say that the sun has "plentied" the earth, in order that the writer may add the amazing couplet:—

"By the merciless winter's untented Punition consigned to dearth."

The writer has a rather pretty song of "The Rose," but we conclude that the last line of the following stanza is due to the exigencies of rhyme:—

"I care not for that or this dress,
I am fairest of all in all;
I am loved by men as a mistress,
And kissed by maids as thrall."

The same reason may account for the writer confessing, in words that resemble neither prose nor poetry,—

"There gnaws
Within my bosom, deep within the cone,
The weevil-cark of love, unloved, unknown."

The use of metaphor is one of the privileges of the poet, but he should use it correctly; and the orator who saw in his mind's eye the vessel of the State floating on the brink of a volcano was not more absurd than Mr. Hewitt, when he writes of Scandal's dunghills flapping their wanton wings. The want of the imagination that sees into the life of things leads the writer to adopt outrageous expressions. If great thoughts are absent, it cannot be denied that we have in their place what an old writer would have called "a mighty pother of words." There is a piece called "After Parting," in which a bad woman is frankly told how very bad she is. The poem is an amazing production, but we must content ourselves with quoting a stanza or two:—

"How thou wert moulded who can tell,
So brave and bright in blade and hilt?
Perchance from human dregs that fell Into the crucible of Hell,
By Devils gilt."

And the end is foretold, when she will descend,—

"Hell deep in gulphs of sin and shame,
A mangled Pariah, fangless, tame,
Waiting the end.
Thy end of blasphemous remorse,—
A boiling, brine-dipped, burning rod;
No hope consoling thee thy course;
Thy latest life-breath hissing hoarse
Curses on God."

We owe, perhaps, some excuse to our readers for quoting passages like these, but the disease of which they are typical is so common among the poetasters of our time, that Mr. Hewitt may at least say that his portentous imagery, his carelessness of construction, his unwholesome allusions, the utter hopelessness which leads him to pore "on a waning ember" in the first page of his volume, may be all met with elsewhere. It is as strange as it is true. Mr. Hewitt is right in saying that his spirit "no more, like the raven, shall range over destitute seas." He belongs to a brotherhood in song. He sings of wild desires, of fathomless regrets, of solitary shores strewn with the hopes of the past, of delicious miseries and a blighting heritage of woe, of tasting the heaven of a woman's white skin; of much that is "wan," much that is "jaded," and much that it is impossible to utter with a decent respect for sense or grammar. Singing thus, he does not stand alone, as every one who is forced to read much recent poetry knows. We quit Mr. Hewitt with the hope that he will live to do better things, and be ashamed of his Summer Songs. He has at times an ear for rhythm, witness a "Serenade," on p. 140; and if he be a young man, his imitative power may be turned to better account. But he must begin a wholly new life in verse, before he will be able to produce poetry worthy of the name.

PROFESSOR MORRIS ON KANT.*

MANY of our readers will remember Brown's remark with reference to the philosophies of Reid and Hume. Hume—the typical sceptic—and Reid—scepticism's deadliest foe—did not, in reality, Brown said, differ at all. Hume cried out, "You can't give any satisfactory reason for believing in a world external to your consciousness!" and added in a whisper, "But you can't get rid of the belief." Reid insisted loudly, "A belief in the external world is an essential part of the constitution of man's nature!" and then whispered, "He can't justify it by any sufficient reason, though." Whether or no this be a true account of the matter so far as Reid is concerned, it certainly expresses a truth of wide application. There is, in many a great philosopher's works, a class of opinions that is loudly insisted upon, and a certain proportion of admissions, not falling in with the rest of his theory. To take instances near home, the late Mr. Mill, the most strenuous opponent of the Intuition Philosophy, granted that our belief in the veracity of memory is "ultimate," or, in other words, that memory gives us an intuitive knowledge of the past. Dr. Bain admits that one must assume the uniformity of Nature. Mr. Herbert Spencer's whole philosophy, though displaying in every page constructive genius, quietly takes for granted first principles which no experience could give him. Some one has said of Feuerbach that his Atheistic philosophy amounted to the solution of the following problem:—"Given that there is no God, how can you best account for religious belief?" We should, similarly, state Mr. Spencer's problem thus:—"Given that the Evolution philosophy contains the true account of mental and social phenomena, how are its principles to be best harmonised with observed facts?" It would take too long to examine in detail, and in each individual case, the causes to which we must attribute inconsistency of this kind. We can only state, briefly illustrating our statement by the work of which we are about to speak, that it seems to us due to the double aspect of truth to the philosopher. He attempts two things,—to observe phenomena, and to construct a theory which should account for them. If facts are brought under his notice which do not seem to square with his theory, "tant pis pour les faits." He is too much interested in and committed to his theory to revise it,—to abandon it for the time, perhaps. He is conscious that there is much truth in it, and yet the facts are undeniable, therefore he gives up neither; the real truth being, generally, that he has carried a theory, true within limits, beyond the sphere of its legitimate application.

We had occasion, a short time ago, to allude to the contrast, so often pointed out, between Kant's practical belief and his speculative principles. But there is a farther point to be noted in connection with the purely speculative philosophy of the Königsberg sage, which is brought into prominent relief in the volume before us. It is well known that two quite distinct schools of philosophy claim Kant as the original source of their teaching. There is the German school, represented in its gradual development by Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel; and the school of destructive thought, which looks upon metaphysics as an impossibility, and upon all reasoning with respect to "things-in-themselves" as illusory and self-contradictory. Dean Mansel and Mr. Herbert Spencer represent two successive stages of this school, and certainly if we judged of Kant by the "Antinomies of Pure Reason" alone, these writers would seem to be the true exponents of his views. But even in the Critique of Pure Reason itself, to say nothing of the "Practical" critique, there are indications of another line of thought, separating him completely from Hume, the father of scepticism, and the rest of his school, which later German writers claim to have explained and developed, and which issues, in them, not in the denial of the possibility of metaphysics, but in a system of ontology. The great question in these days, now that the cry "Back to Kant!" has become so general, is which of these schools is Kant's legitimate child, and which the bastard? Or to revert to Brown's mode of expression, "What was Kant's shout, and what his whisper?" Professor Morris's account of the matter, in the interesting little volume on the Critique of Pure Reason, with which he commences a series of German philosophical classics for English readers, is briefly as follows. Kant was early in life educated in the current philosophy of his time, which he found highly unsatisfactory:—

"He had been bred in the current metaphysics of his time—the so-called Leibnitz-Wolffian philosophy—in which the living thought of the acknowledged master Leibnitz had been reduced to a systematic, but lifeless, and hence comparatively unconstructive, formalism. Through this, as will be subsequently seen, Kant, nevertheless, imbibed many a germ of real philosophic thought; but it did not satisfy him, and in his very first published work, he expresses incidentally his distrust of all current metaphysics, by declaring that 'our metaphysics, like many other sciences, has, in fact, only come to the threshold of real and solid knowledge; and God only knows when we shall see it step across the threshold.'"

Dissatisfied, then, with mental philosophy, he betook himself more and more to the study of physics, and thus fell under the influence of British writers, such as Newton. Side by side with

* Kant's Critique of Pure Reason: a Critical Exposition. By George S. Morris, Ph.D. Chicago: B. C. Griggs and Co. London: Trübner and Co. 1882.

British physicists, he studied Locke, Hume, and others of our "experience" philosophers, whose systems he found at all events definite; and, up to a certain point, satisfactory. The method of metaphysics should, he said, be the same as that which Newton followed in physics with such signal success. It must find its place "on the lowly ground of experience and common-sense; all we can do is to analyse the 'confused content of consciousness.'" Those convictions which are necessary to our happiness have, fortunately, been written by God in our hearts, and we hold them by an invincible, moral faith, which, however, defies theoretic justification.

Here is the point at which, according to Professor Morris, Kant reached philosophical low-water. His after-career consisted in a gradual progress towards emancipation from the trammels of Hume's scepticism,—never, indeed, thoroughly completed. This is the key-note to Professor Morris's work, which traces, with respect to each distinctive feature in Kant's philosophy, both the sensational principle from which it departed, and what the author holds to be the true view which the succeeding Kantians in Germany developed from it. To take one instance, Kant's account of Space. Hume held that the spatial relations, investigated by geometry, are purely generalisations from experience; that our belief that a straight line is the shortest way from one point to another is an induction, and has no necessary character in it. Kant, on the other hand, saw that the observation of one instance was quite sufficient to show that such relations must universally hold good. Such a belief is founded on no induction, but on an a priori judgment of the mind. Here, then, he seems to depart from the sensational theory. He grants—or appears to grant—the mind's perception of necessary objective truth. But at this point he stops short, and draws back. At the moment when he appears to be casting off his fruitless subjectivism, he halts, and seems afraid to proceed further. True, he says, the mind can know synthetic, a priori truths about space; it knows beforehand that in any part of space the geometrical truths hold good; but space itself is, after all, only subjective. It is a "form" of thought. It is the indispensable condition of our sensible knowledge, as time is, and they shape and arrange it. But they have nothing to do with the "thing-in-itself." Neither space nor time can be absolutely objective, because, if they were, they must be either substance or the attributes of substance, and they are neither. But Professor Morris points out that elsewhere Kant had explained that substance and attribute are terms derived "by abstraction from material things," so that this reasoning is no more valid than would be the reasoning of one who denied that he had sensations of sight, because they produced effects on him which he could not explain in terms of sensations of touch and smell.

We are unable to follow Professor Morris in his distinctively Hegelian tenets, to which we observe he gives the name of "philosophy," par excellence. We have no space to discuss the question here, but we think he would have done better to have examined the intuitionist belief in an external world, instead of dismissing Reid's account with the remark that the problem is artificial. His own remarks on the subject are rather poetic, than a definite handling of the difficulties of the question. He sums up thus:—"Being is Doing, and Doing is, in the first and last resort, the operation of Spirit. But the activity of Spirit is Life, and so Life is in some sense coextensive with Reality. It is the contemplation of such results as these that Plato terms the Absolute, the Good; Aristotle, pure Energy St. John, Love; Hegel, Spirit." All this savours of Hegel, and we have looked in vain for any account of the matter which solves the real problem otherwise than by ignoring it. But it is extremely interesting to trace the influence of Kant on the later Germans, however little we may think they improved upon him, or were, in detail, true exponents of his principles; and the work before us goes far to show that Kant's scepticism was only a halting-place, and that he himself did not look upon it as final, or as an account of his full mind. He rested in it, when his powers of analysis failed to carry him further; and, again, there was an element of reaction against the unsatisfactory metaphysics current in his time; but he saw that truth was to be gained, though he had not succeeded in tracing the path to it. He saw the mountain in the distance, but could not find the road by which it was to be approached. The last words of the Critique are certainly in a hopeful strain, and would sound strange indeed in the mouth of an Agnostic:—"The critical way alone is still open. If the reader has had the courtesy and patience to wander through it in my company, he may now judge whether, if he will contribute his share towards making this foot-path a highway, that which many centuries could not accomplish, may not be attained before the lapse of the present century,—namely, the complete satisfaction of human reason respecting those problems which have at all times aroused its curiosity, though hitherto in vain."

AN ICONOGRAPHY OF CULTIVATED ORCHIDS.*

OF this sumptuous volume, it may fairly be said qu'il sent l'opulence. There is a ring of wealth about the very name of the publisher, one of the first among the half-score or so of Parisian éditeurs who vie with each other in perfection of typography and superbiess of illustration. Then, the cultivation of Orchids, owing to the rarity and consequent high price of these beautiful plants, is a pleasure almost exclusively reserved for the rich. Lastly, the wealth of colour displayed by their blooms, by turns gorgeous and delicate, is unrivalled in the plant-world; while the strange and striking forms, the wonderful modifications and adaptations of the parts of the flower, cause the order to be even more interesting to the botanist than to the horticulturist. Of no other order of living organisms, probably, is the study so fruitful of results, or so rich in suggestive and luminous explanations of some of the deepest and most attractive of Nature's mysteries.

The author introduces his subject by a brief sketch of the botanical relations of orchids, and a more extended and valuable account of their geographical distribution. From an economical point of view, the order is of little use to man, vanilla-pods and orris-powder being the sole products it offers for human consumption. But a more liberal philosophy has replaced the narrow theory that the efforts of Nature are to be admired so far only as they minister to the wants and pleasures of mankind, and the fact that to the vast world of insects—from the dank and steamy forests of the equatorial zone to the snow-covered tundra of the Arctic Circle—the Orchidaceæ furnish the sweetest and most delicate of foods, well named nectar, is an ample vindication of their existence. M. de Puydt is an horticulturist rather than a botanist. Of Robert Brown, the founder of the study of the order, he makes no mention, neither does he refer to Darwin's wonderful treatise, and we are not, therefore, surprised that no allusion whatever is contained in the volume to the marvellous results of the investigations of these great naturalists. But we think the omission is a defect; orchidaceous flowers are, no doubt, in the highest degree attractive and interesting by reason of their forms and colours alone; but a brief résumé of what is now known of the meaning and value of their parts, and of the mode in which these enable the members of the order to maintain their place in the great struggle for existence, would have invested the subject with a higher interest in the eyes of horticulturists, and perhaps have induced some among them to make use of the ample opportunities at their disposal of following up the history and habits of these singular plants.

According to M. de Puydt, about four thousand species of orchids exist. But the number in reality approaches six thousand, of which at least fifteen hundred are well known to horticulturists. The plants are of all sizes, from the small Spiranthes to the gigantic Grammatophyllum speciosum, of which the stem is eight feet long, and the spike of golden, brown-spotted flowers has a droop of two yards, or more. Sometimes only a single flower is produced, as in the Cypripedium; sometimes a hundred large flowers are borne, as in the snowy inflorescence of the magnificent Phalenopsis grandiflora, of which a beautiful plate is given opposite p. 307. Of most of the species the blooms are very durable, in not a few cases lasting for several months, and rarely less than six to eight weeks. The majority are scentless, but some give out an exquisite perfume, such as many of the otherwise generally unattractive Epidendreae. Of the genera Cattleya, Odontoglossum, Oncidium, and Vanda, examples of all of which are figured by M. de Puydt, some species possess both showy flowers and a fragrant perfume, thus offering a double attraction.

European orchids are invariably terrestrial, and comparatively inconspicuous in the size and colouration of their flowers. It is among the epiphytous members of the order, found growing high up in the branchage of tropical and semi-tropical forests, that we must look for the gorgeous hues, the delicate tints, the strange forms, and the opulent inflorescence that are the delight of the horticulturist. The chromo-lithographs of some of the most important of these, contained in this volume, are among the best of the kind we have seen. That of Cattleya Dowiana reproduces with admirable fidelity the splendid amethyst and topaz of its magnificent flower, often over six inches in breadth. Of Oncidium splendidum, no palette can give the rich golden hue, blotched with cinnamon-brown; but the approach to reality is as near as the resources at the author's command permit. With Odontoglossum triumphans, an "arrangement" of gold, pink, and burnt sienna, he has been more successful; and the delineations of the singular forms of Stanhopea Devoniensis and Cypripedium caudatum, the two lateral petals of the latter of which hang down in extraordinarily long festoons of a rich cinnamon-brown, leave nothing to be desired. In short, the plates, without exception, are good, and the only defects we have to notice are a slight crudeness in the green of the stems, together with a certain want of accuracy in the botanical detail of the flower, for which, however, the horticultural public, to whom the book is addressed, will not greatly care.

The terrestrial orchids are easier to grow than the epiphytous species, all of which require hot-house or warm temperate treatment. But though tropical plants, they avoid the hotter, low-lying lands, and prefer the woods that clothe the slopes of lofty hills, at a height of from six to eight thousand feet above the sea-level. M. de Puydt gives a plate of a very beautiful and fragrant Trichopilia (T. suavis Lamarckiae), found only on the volcano Chiriqui, in Central America, at a height of 9,000 feet. It has large crenulate petals and labellum, abundantly marked with streaks and blotches of a delicate rose-pink. Unfortunately, the flowers last only a fortnight; on the other hand, the plant hardly needs a hot-house, and is not difficult to grow. Mr. Burbidge, who saw numberless epiphytous species, such as Phalænopsis grandiflora, flourishing wild in the forests of Borneo, gives, in his interesting Gardens of the Sun, a description of their habitat, which serves as a guide for their treatment by the horticulturist. Living high up in mid-air, they are screened from the direct action of the sun, the heat-rays, not the light, of which they dread, by the leafy canopy, deluged by rains for half the year, and fanned by constant breezes blowing in from the sea. The best that Art can do is to follow Nature as closely as possible; and the orchid-grower, dreading neither light nor air, must give his epiphytous plants copious showers of water, surround them by an atmosphere of a proper temperature and sufficiently damp, and, observing the usual horticultural precautions, may then rest pretty sure of success. The Cypripediums, some of which pass the winter under Siberian snow, need only a temperate house, and among them are many beautiful species. They are, however, the least, as the Vandæ are the most, orchidaceous of orchids. But they are comparatively inexpensive; the tropical plants, owing to the slowness and difficulty of their propagation, necessitating continual replacement by importation from little-known and not easily accessible tropical tracts of country, are much more costly,—some of the species of Masdevallia, indeed, are worth three or four times their weight in gold. A very full and practical account of the best methods of cultivating the various species of orchids under glass will be found in the present volume, which is an exhaustive and splendidly illustrated treatise on the most attractive department of floral culture—one peculiarly English, too—in which the lover of these beautiful and curious plants will find his tastes sympathised with and his difficulties removed.

THE STATESMAN'S YEAR-BOOK FOR 1883.*

THE new issue of this well-known annual deserves somewhat more attention than is usually given to revised editions. The Statesman's Year-book is now within a short period of its majority. It is one of the most respected and respectable of reference-books,—so much so, that one is apt to treat it as one does the tried family lawyer or doctor, and take everything it says on trust. Yet it is an open secret that hard-worked politicians and publicists of experience, to whom well-condensed and reliable information means—as Mr. Arnold says of "conduct"—three-fourths of their business life, have lately found it disappointing, inaccurate, and inadequate, and without absolutely discarding it, have been compelled to resort to the Almanach de Gotha, and even to such humbler publications as Whitaker's and the Financial Reform Almanac, to obtain much of what they need. No doubt, this failure of the Year-book to keep abreast of the times has been due to the infirm health of its founder, the late Mr. Frederick Martin, who did his work admirably at first, but who was forced to retire from the editorship in December last. Further, even a hurried glance at the new volume will show that Mr. Martin's successor, Mr. Scott Keltie, has endeavoured to the utmost of his ability, and within the limited time at his disposal, to remove the inaccuracies of the past. It would not be difficult to point out several errors, mostly, however, of a trifling character, that remain; but it should not be forgotten that editors and publishers, even if animated with the spirit of the "new broom," are only mortal men, and cannot be expected to do in less than two months the work of a year. As it stands, however, the Statesman's Year-book for 1883 is a most decided and encouraging improvement on its more immediate predecessors. Almost every page bears evidence of revision and of anxiety on the part of the editor to bring it up to time. Antiquated statistics that had done duty for years have been swept away, to give place to others of the year, and almost of the hour. Finally, the present, when the Statesman's Year-book is in a transition state, is the time to make suggestions—such are, indeed, asked for, in the preface to the new number—which may help in making the Statesman's Year-book as fitted to meet the requirements of 1884 as the first issue was to meet the requirements of 1863.

A word or two on some of the strong points of, and the interesting, because fresh, material contained in the new volume. One of the former is population. The new census returns have all been taken advantage of. The leading results of that for Great Britain are clearly stated, while Russia and the United States have also justice done them. We are glad to see that special pains have been taken to give accurate information as to the diplomatic representatives of our own and other countries, which had been neglected of late; and that the particular statistics which are "everybody's business," such as those of trade, shipping, railways, &c., have been brought down to date. Countries and provinces which have lately, from one reason or another, come into prominent notice, e.g., Greece, Roumania, Servia, and Egypt, have manifestly received great attention. The statement which appears on the subject of Turkish finance is the freshest and clearest we have seen. The results of the Indian census, particularly those of the various religious creeds, are very valuable. Some pieces of information are, however, given in a rather indefinite way. Thus, in an otherwise very good account of the recent constitutional changes in Italy, scrutin de liste is mentioned as if everybody knew what it is. Yet how many electors, we might even say Members of Parliament, are there who could tell off-hand the difference between scrutin de liste and, we shall not say scrutin d'arrondissement, but the present mode of returning our House of Commons? A short explanatory note on this point would have been appreciated by many readers. Then, again, it is quite true, as stated on p. 213, that the recent addition to the Army and Navy Estimates caused by the Egyptian Expedition has been met by "an addition to the Income-tax." But why not state exactly what that "addition" is, especially at this season, when we are all feeling it?

The Statesman's Year-book stands in need of improvement, if not of complete reorganisation. Why should we not have satisfactory information about Independent Burmah, Corea, Hawaii, Zanzibar, Madagascar, the Transvaal, the Orange Free State, and other countries that are attracting an increased amount of attention? Besides, a great deal of the information which Mr. Scott Keltie has been at such pains to collect is obviously new wine put into old bottles. Matters which were of great importance twenty years ago are but of comparatively slight importance now. We have no hesitation in saying that all that need be said of the constitution, government, and reigning families, of the countries of the world, certainly of what the late Mr. Bagehot called their "theatrical" elements, could with ease be compressed into one-fifth of the space here allotted to them. Even the necessary information as to revenue, ecclesiastical matters, education, trade, &c., could be better condensed and tabulated. The editor and publishers of the Year-book should, in fact, try to realise what English politicians and publicists must be thinking, writing, and speaking about,—and all too hurriedly,—too, during, say, the next quarter of a century. What an enormous advantage to public men, and to the nation, whose servants and, at the same time, guides they are, would be a book in which they could easily compare, possibly by means of tables, the various land systems, schemes of taxation, and local self-government, and methods of solving the problem of pauperism, which prevail throughout the world! Yet these are only a few of the things that our statesmen will have to be looking at and to, during the next few years, and a thoroughly reorganised Year-book might supply them with the spectacles of cosmopolitan knowledge. This work could be made—we do not say with ease, however—a very much better book than it is, and a very much better book than any other publication at all resembling it.

THE subject of this book will probably remind those who have read Gil Blas, of Elvira de Pinarès, and that which she spoke of as “une peinture fidèle des malheurs de ma famille.” In both cases there is a picture of a tragic event that happened to the ancestors of the family to whom it belongs; and in both cases does it represent the fatal termination of a duel, which has been fought in a room in the presence of a lady between her husband and lover. But here the similarity ends. Even if the Belmonte tragedy may have been the source whence Mr. Pollock drew his original inspiration, yet his treatment of it is very different from that of Le Sage, and introduces an element of the supernatural, in that he invests his picture with a sort of unholy power. It has been shut up for generations in a sealed room in a house believed throughout the village to be accursed, and which is never inhabited by its owners. At last the head of the family, Lord Falcon, goes to live there with his young bride, and has the room thrown open, and the picture cleaned, notwithstanding the head-shakings of old servants, who look upon his proceeding as a direct temptation of Providence. And in the sequel is shown the strange way in which the sight of the picture seems to contribute to bring about a repetition of the terrible scene that it illustrates. Here is its description:—

“In the foreground of the painting are three figures, two men and a woman, habited in the costume which has been rendered familiar through Lely's and Kneller's portraits. One of the male figures was ascertained by reference to contemporary pictures to be a portrait of Lord Falcon; he stands with a drawn and blood-stained sword over the other, writhing in his death-agony on the ground. The woman, probably intended for Lady Falcon, stands a little back, in an attitude indicating a mingled triumph and despair. Her hands are stretched towards the dying man, presumably her lover, in a gesture part caressing, part shrinking; and on her face is an expression difficult to describe, so much is there in it of horror, so much also of a fierce joy. This was strange, and there was also something strange in the look of the dying man, whose eyes, expressing all the terror and remorse that can be crowded into a man's last moments, were turned, not to Lord Falcon, not to the injured husband who had just dealt him his death-blow—a well-merited judgment, it may be, for his crime—but to Lady Falcon, the partner of that crime. Had they been turned to her in love, in pity, even in reproach, that direction might have been easily understood, might well have been the last direction in which his heart might have guided them; but they were not so turned. They looked towards her with an expression of bitter, hopeless misery, of vague and sudden horror, such as may be seen on the face of a man who struggles with some overpowering nightmare, which chills his blood and draws cold drops of sweat to his brow, and who wakes to find his vision true. Such a look might have been seen on his face had the thrust that let out his life come from the hands of the woman whom he had loved, and who had loved him, instead of from the hands of the man whom he had dishonoured.”

What expression the dying man beheld in the lady's countenance is a puzzle to all who see the picture, and one which greatly occupies the mind of the actual Lady Falcon, who, from the first, regards the picture with a curious mixture of attraction and repulsion. But when love and crime have, in course of time, wrought the old story over again, there comes suddenly into her face a look which shows her to have fathomed the mystery, by her own experience of what must have been the emotion of her predecessor; and so terrible and expressive is that look, as to cause her lover to cry out in surprise and horror, whilst at the same moment it reveals to her husband the treachery that he has till then never suspected.

The chief female personage is named after, and an embodiment of, the Lilith whom Faust saw on the Harz Mountains, and in regard to whom Mephistopheles utters the caution,—“Wenn sie den jungen Mann erlangt, so lässt sie ihn sobald nicht wieder fahren.” It is no easy matter to delineate satisfactorily so uncanny and fantastic a being, and we congratulate Mr. Pollock on the success of both conception and execution in his representation of this mysterious, goblinish character. She is evil, yet somehow does not give the impression of being wholly responsible for it, because she is apparently destitute of the ordinary moral sense of right and wrong, and does not understand the existence of such a thing. To condemn her as wilfully wicked seems unjust, when she has no consciousness of guilt, and is never ashamed of it. Now and then, indeed, her mind is illuminated by a vague idea of the possibility that she is behaving badly; but the flash of light merely perplexes her for a moment, and then vanishes as suddenly as it came; and that is the only approach to a conscience of which she appears capable. Beautiful, with a strange look, as though she saw more than was visible to other mortal eyes, affectionate to her father, playful, usually gentle and pleasant to every one, notwithstanding all her feminine and agreeable attributes, she conveys, even to her lover, an impression of having unknown evil hidden in her mind,—some dark spot of iniquity lying out of his sight, perhaps out of hers also. In her disposition is a combination of tenderness and ferocity, which is exemplified in a scene where she nearly strangles her kitten without the slightest provocation, and which we quote:—

“‘Clever boy,’ she said. ‘But what is “a smile that can caress and kill?”’—‘If you do not know I can hardly explain it to you,’ he replied.—‘I think I do know the kind of thing that you mean. It is the sort of feeling that I have sometimes for my kitten—haven't I, Kitty?—or for anything that is soft and nice, and that I can caress. I would like to tighten my hold on its little neck, make it tighter and tighter yet, until —’ As she spoke she suited action to word until the kitten cried out in pain and terror; but Lilith seemed not to hear it, she only wound her fingers closer round its throat, and Vane, looking at her, saw in her face so strange an expression of pleasure, that his fear for the kitten's life was merged in that indefinite fear of her which had before possessed him.—‘Lilith,’ he said, gravely, ‘for Heaven's sake, do not give way to such feelings!’—‘What feelings?’ she asked, with one of her innocent smiles.—‘I wish I knew. Surely you do not wish to kill your favourite kitten?’—‘No. I only thought it felt so good to squeeze. I did not want to hurt it, poor little thing. Why should I?’—‘Your looks belied you strangely, then,’ said Vane, with a sigh. ‘See: it crouches away from you; it loves you no longer.’—‘Loves me no longer?’ she repeated, angrily. ‘No; it is you who love me no longer. If you did you would never talk to me like this: you would never have accused me of cruelty: how can you do so?’ She took up the kitten in her arms and fondled and caressed it until, forgetting with its short memory her past unkindness, it purred with responsive gratitude. ‘The kitten loves me as much as ever,’ she said, indignantly; ‘it is you who have ceased to love me.’”

After this, it is less surprising to read of her face as showing “tigerish joy and ruthless craving for destruction,” at the very instant that her irate husband is about to kill the man whom she really supposes herself to love.

With a heroine like this, and people whose presentiments come true (which, by the bye, is the only possible justification for introducing such things into a novel at all), it is evident that the book cannot be considered exactly as a study of everyday life. But it is none the worse for that, because a work that appeals mainly to the imagination is often more effectual than any other for the rest and refreshment of a tired brain. The author appears to have a natural leaning towards whatever is weird and fiendish, and to be of the same mind as his heroine, who says that she likes all that has to do with diablerie; therefore, in the book before us, he has selected a theme to which nature has especially fitted him to do justice. That he possesses the spirit of an artist is evident throughout, and also that he appreciates the advantage of an harmonious whole; this is particularly manifested in the skill with which all minor accessories are arranged, so as to contribute to the general ghostly and unearthly effect intended to be given to the entire story,—e.g., when the characters go to the opera, Der Freischütz is the one chosen; and when an artist's studio is described, it is that of a man who delights in illustrating such supernatural subjects as the revels of witches, elves, and fairies. Our opinion of the author's strong penchant for all that is eerie and fantastic is confirmed by a second and shorter story in the book, which relates how a man imagined the Devil to be constantly pursuing and trying to get his signature out of him, and which is more like a sort of feverish nightmare than anything else. It is far inferior to The Picture's Secret, and is very likely an old magazine article, thrown in to increase the size of the single volume of which the work consists.

To conclude with one or two verbal criticisms, we would observe that we do not think “fitting like a cat” a very happy simile, because that animal's movements hardly correspond to the popular idea of fitting. And a person careful about grammar would not talk of “birds singing cheerily among the early leaves, as they walked through Kensington

* The Picture's Secret. By Walter H. Pollock. London: Remington.

Gardens," when in the whole of the preceding paragraph there has been no plural noun except "birds," or "leaves," which could possibly refer to the pronoun we have italicised. But these are merely trifling defects, in what is certainly a fresh and in some ways, almost a remarkable novel.

THE MAGAZINES.

THE Magazines of the month are fairly interesting. The solid paper of the Nineteenth Century is the conclusion of Mr. Rathbone's essay on self-government in England, in which, after describing the infinite confusion of the present system, he advises that the Union should be the unit of self-government, that the Union Council should concentrate all local powers, and that it should be responsible to the County Board, with which the sole power of taxation should rest, besides the control of workhouses, asylums, highways, licences, rivers, and public buildings. The Union Council would, of course, be elected by the ratepayers, but the County Board by three sets of electors,—the Justices, the ratepayers, and the Union Councils. Mr. Rathbone would, at the same time, simplify rural finance, by substituting for the complex rates now levied one single rate, which he would raise in part like the district-rate and in part like the poor-rate; but, in order to make the local burden fall in part on personalty, would supplement the rate by grants from the Treasury, assigned, like the Education grants, on condition of good work. The whole paper is worth careful study, as the plan of a thoroughly competent and informed mind, and to us suggests only one criticism. It is a little wanting in rough simplicity. Practically, interests are a little too well balanced, and indirect election by the Union Councils only would be easier and more workable. The J.P.'s would always have the best chance as candidates for the Board, as they have for seats in the House of Commons. Mr. F. Harrison puts in a most eloquent plea for the "Eighteenth Century," which he declares was a period not of exhaustion, but of preparation for the remoulding of Society which we now witness. That is true, as it is true that only from the death of the seed can arise the corn. But still, in the imperfect language of humanity, though death is rebirth, it is hard to describe it save as death. Surely, if we may say anything so ridiculous as that "a century," a purely artificial period of time, has a character at all, we may say that the Eighteenth was the century of the fall of the leaf. Everything in that little corner of the planet which historians insist on considering "the world"—whereas it is a tenth of it—was slowly rotting down, no doubt to feed a renaissance, but still rotting into manure. Mr. Theodore Watts gives us another vigorous eulogium on Rossetti, in whom he sees an imagination vigorous and lofty beyond compare; and Lady Paget a rather dogmatic and scattered paper on dress and fashion, the most notable idea of which, apparently, is that every woman should dress specially to her own figure. "A person with a large nose will do well to wear much hair at the back of her head, so as to re-establish the balance." In other words, every woman should perceive where her own charm lies, and dress to that. As about one woman in fifty is competent to do anything of the kind, the dress of a reasonable age would be somewhat anarchical. Fashion is tyrannical, but at least it is started by artists, and places the sexes for a time in costume. Crinolines and "pull-backs," curls and chignons, worn at the same period, would frightfully accentuate each other's defects. Mr. Leslie Stephen begins what promises to be a very thoughtful argument against the suppression of poisonous opinions by force, but his paper as yet is injured by too much concession to practical men. The unsettled question is not whether you can suppress a poisonous opinion by force, but whether you ought to try. Most men see what is and is not possible at any given time; what worries them is the difficulty of seeing the ideally right course. The common-sense of the majority has on this subject arrived at a "working" conclusion, but it has not arrived as yet at a certain conclusion of any kind. The majority objects to persecution, unless the idea persecuted, e.g., that of the Peculiar People, injures society. Then it "persecutes,"—that is, punishes an honestly held and in itself quite moral opinion. What we want to know is the intellectual formula according to which it should or should not do this. That case of the Peculiar People is a crucial one, because it does not rouse either the social abhorrence created by some forms of belief hostile to property, or the instinctive abhorrence created by some forms of belief hostile to morality. May society punish a man who honestly believes and acts on his belief that, when

God has stricken him with scarlet-fever, it is wrong to call in a doctor to resist the will of God? Mr. Kebbel, in a good paper on "Party Obligations," pleads hard for stiff fighting in Opposition. He thinks it silently prepares the public mind for a change of policy. There is much to be said for his view, but we are convinced that the illustration which seems to him so unanswerable is a mistake. He will have it that the bold fighting of Opposition against Lord Beaconsfield changed the public mind. We wish we could think it, for we should then give still higher value to debate; but we do not. We do not believe that Lord Beaconsfield ever had a majority for one minute for his foreign policy. He was put in power as a lesson to the Liberals; but from the moment his line was perceived, he lost the people, and a dissolution on any single day between 1877 and 1880 would have ended in his dismissal. The Liberal speeches expressed, much more than they made, the general opinion.

The most interesting article in the Fortnightly is Mr. Labouchere's, on "The Coming Democracy," on which we said enough last week; and the best written is Mr. Auberon Herbert's, with the odd title, a "Politician in Trouble about His Soul." Mr. Herbert accuses both parties of failing to lay down clear principles of right and wrong which it is possible to follow, and supports his opinion with a shower of epigrammatic sentences. The general effect is not, however, enlightening, but only cynical, the conclusion hinted at being that politicians and parties have no principles, and only do their best to keep in power. The Tory interlocutor, for instance, for the paper is in form a dialogue—talks in this style:—

"I am often tempted to despair about ourselves. Our misfortunes seem to do us no good; they give us no steadiness of purpose; we show none of the better qualities which belong to minorities; our highest aim seems to be to make a damaging speech against Gladstone—and how can you damage a man whose supporters are all caucused?—or to make some new combination, some flank movement, or do some clever sleight-of-hand. Our leaders are always ready at a moment's notice to pour out any quantity of criticism, as if they were engaged to do it by the piece, and they are good enough to throw in a certain number of epigrams for us without charge; but even the epigrams, when we get them, only seem to leave us in much the same unimproving condition of mental health after as before. Of any distinct leading, of any attempt to rally the party to definite opinions, to touch our reason and redeem us with a faith,—of these things there is no spark to be seen in our darkness. All that happens is material for party criticism, and nothing more. But low in the world as we are, I still hope more from our men than from yours. There is an incurable 'Sand-the-sugar and come-to-prayers' snuffle about your Government, which they share with the grocer of pious and practical habits. I suppose you can't help it; and perhaps some day, when you are all Republicans and atheists, and are no longer half-ashamed of your own opinions, and are not trimming between two or three sets of supporters, you will get rid of it."

Whether Mr. Herbert quite believes statesmen to be dishonest, we do not know, for he propounds a theory about the collective forces of the age always acting on them; but certainly his interlocutors are so. The writing of his paper is, however, delightful; full of sparkle, and quite free from the prolixity which, in his letters to the Times, is his besetting temptation. Mr. Bryce sends a thoughtful paper on "The Future of the English Universities," which, he says, ought to attract and educate the whole nation, to offer to all comers the best teaching on every subject, bringing the teaching power of the country, as it were, into a focus, to advance inquiry, and to stimulate study in men who cannot enter their walls. These functions are not now fully performed, and the reasons are, in Mr. Bryce's judgment, cost, the late age of entrance, and the absence of professional instruction. He contends that the Commission has done little or nothing to secure improvement, and would, as practical steps thereto, increase the pecuniary contribution from the Colleges to the University, greatly enlarge the number of Professors, make much of their income depend on fees, admit scholars at sixteen, and attract students who intend to take up one subject or group of subjects only. Mr. Kebbel writes sensibly and moderately on County Boards, on which he would seat at least one-third of the members through selection by Quarter Sessions; but his object evidently is to preserve the ascendancy of a class whom he greatly admires, the country gentry with estates large enough to make them seek culture. Mr. E. Gurney and Mr. F. Myers have injured a remarkable collection of stories of apparitions and dream appearances by calling it a paper on "Transferred Impressions and Telepathy," a nomenclature which will only excite prejudice. The collection of cases is, however, well worth study, and we honour the courage of complers who can face so coolly the charge of being credulous fools, and can demand that, whatever they are, their facts, or alleged facts, shall be studied, and accepted, or rejected, like any other set of phenomena. This particular critic being a total unbeliever in the whole theory, the story which "fetches" him most is, as usual in all such cases, one of which the evidence is probably the slightest. It gives us an impression of truth, but is too old to test:—

"In 1739, Mrs. Birkbeck, wife of William Birkbeck, banker, of Settle, and a member of the Society of Friends, was taken ill, and died at Cockermouth, while returning from a journey to Scotland, which she had undertaken alone—her husband and three children, aged seven, five, and four years respectively, remaining at Settle. The friends at whose house the death occurred made notes of every circumstance attending Mrs. Birkbeck's last hours, so that the accuracy of the several statements as to time as well as place was beyond the doubtfulness of man's memory, or of any even unconscious attempt to bring them into agreement with each other. One morning, between seven and eight o'clock, the relation to whom the care of the children at Settle had been entrusted, and who kept a minute journal of all that concerned them, went into their bedroom as usual, and found them all sitting up in their beds in great excitement and delight. 'Mamma has been here!' they cried; and the little one said, 'She called, "Come, Esther!"' Nothing could make them doubt the fact, and it was carefully noted down, to entertain the mother on her return home. That same morning as their mother lay on her dying bed at Cockermouth, she said, 'I should be ready to go, if I could but see my children.' She then closed her eyes, to reopen them, as they thought, no more. But after ten minutes of perfect stillness, she looked up brightly and said, 'I am ready now: I have been with my children; and then at once peacefully passed away. When the notes taken at the two places were compared, the day, hour, and minutes were the same. One of the three children was my grandmother, née Sarah Birkbeck, afterwards the wife of Dr. Fell, of Ulverstone. From her lips I heard the above almost literally as I have repeated it. The elder was Morris Birkbeck, afterwards of Guildford. Both these lived to old age, and retained to the last so solemn and reverential a remembrance of the circumstance that they rarely would speak of it."

We note that "Home and Foreign Affairs" has again become, as under the old management, decidedly Liberal. Its main thesis is the imbecility of the present method of Opposition.

Sir Richard Cross, in the Contemporary, evidently wants the new County Boards to be as feeble and as full of J.P.'s as can be managed, and would suggest, apparently, that Boards half of nominees and half of elected members chosen by the Boards of Guardians would do very well; but he evidently anticipates a much more revolutionary scheme. We hope he is right, or that the counties will be let alone, for elected bodies never work unless they have within their area independent power; and County Boards weaker than Municipal Councils would simply be condemned. Who would go through the turmoil of an election, if his vote at the end was to be neutralised by some nominated J.P., selected solely because of his acres and of his presumed support at the last election? Mr. Rae sends a most convincing account of the difficulties in the Highland Croft system, which are now attracting such attention. He thinks that the old clan tenancy and family tenancy, called usually "runrig," and which was a complicated system of co-operative tenancy, worked better than the croft system, which is one of cottier tenancy-at-will. The people had grazings in common which were most valuable to them, and are now absorbed into the large sheep-farms. Even at present, where the old tenure subsists, it works well; and Mr. Carmichael, a resident of long experience in the Hebrides, gives a most interesting account of Long Island, where the old runrig commune still subsists, and where it manages its affairs like a Hindoo village. The system, whatever its other faults, begets brotherhood:—

"'Compassion for the poor,' says Mr. Carmichael, 'consideration towards the distressed, and respect for the dead, are characteristic traits of these people.' They indulge, says he, in a wholesome and friendly rivalry, but nothing more; and when they meet on the village knoll at the summons of the constable, they discuss their common affairs with force and, he adds, with eloquence, but they sternly repress everything calculated to mar good neighbourhood. They conduct their open-air court by a procedure more ancient than that of the Imperial Parliament. The constable sits on the knoll with his face to the east, and if, after deliberation, a division is required, the eyes go sunwise to his right, and the noses sunwise to his left, just as their ancestors did ages ago, when they worshipped the Sun. If any one still argues after the vote, he is hooted down with cries of 'Goat tooth,' and finds it convenient to submit. In the summer months, the whole village goes to the hill shealing, as the Swiss herdsmen go to the châlet. Their shealing is a group of low beehive huts, a prehistoric British village, situated on the green banks of a mountain stream. They move to it in a long procession over the moor, and when they arrive they sit down together on the grass, to their shealing feast. The fare is simple, but it is the bread of a village communion. 'Every head is uncovered, every knee is bowed, as they dedicate themselves and their flocks to the care of Israel's Shepherd.'"

The brotherhood could withstand an arbitrary rise of rent, and they could not subdivide beyond reason, as is the tendency of the Crofters, who have fallen back more and more on the profitable, but most uncertain, culture of the potato. The present state of the Crofters Mr. Rae believes to be entirely bad, and the most immediate remedy is to restore their old grazings in common, which made to them the difference between rough comfort and starvation. His paper is a most valuable and, what is of the first consequence, intelligible contribution to the literature of the subject. Sir Richard Temple supports, in the main, Lord Ripon's proposals for introducing "self-government in India," and approves the extension of the elective principle, though he sees more clearly than some critics do the vastness of the scale upon which elective institutions must be introduced:—"Thus local funds amounting to several millions sterling annually, roads of many thousands of miles in total length, rustic school-houses numbered by tens of thousands, medical and other institutions to be counted by hundreds, will be hereafter administered by Boards elected by electors from the villages of British India,—in number about 400,000. This is of itself a considerable piece of administration." Besides the villages, there are 1,500 towns, large and small, in British India, and in each it is intended that a local municipality should govern. Sir Richard remarks that the electoral qualification is singularly well defined, being in rural districts the peasant-proprietor and the tenant not liable to eviction, and in the towns the ratepayer. Mr. Kay, in a careful account of existing land tenures in Egypt, which seem to bear a singular analogy to the Zemindaree tenures of India, the peasant being irremovable, but the rent-paying grantee over him entitled to a permanent share of the produce, argues strongly that the peasants' right to create a mortgage should be limited to his crops, and should not extend to his land. Otherwise, the fellah will mortgage all, will be dispossessed of all, and will become disaffected to a degree unknown in the history of Egypt. He thinks the present average taxation, which amounts to twenty shillings an acre, is not excessive, but urges the completion of a new cadastral survey. "Miss Burney's Own Story" is an account of Miss Burney's life, by Miss Christie, which clears up many points left obscure in Macaulay's well-known sketch, and especially Miss Burney's motive in submitting to the thralldom of Court life,—it was clearly filial affection, her father having fallen into deep, though secret, poverty; but, perhaps, the gem of the number is the "Enchanted Lake," Mr. E. Arnold's translation of an episode in the "Mahābhārata." We have seen nothing better done. We suppose it is hopeless to ask him to attempt the translation of the whole epic, though he could do it, if he only boldly stated that there must be a Pope's "Iliad" before a perfect one can be produced, and that his duty is intelligible rather than literal rendering. We must quote this one of thirty-four conundrums asked by a fairy, or rather a "Spirit" in the Shakespearian sense, of King Yudhishthira:—

"Yaksha. 'Whose eyes are unclosed, though he slumbers all day?
And what's born alive without motion? and, say,
What moveth, yet lives not? and what, as it goes, Wastes not, but still waxes? Resolve me now those.'

King. 'With unclosed eyes a fish doth sleep;
And new-laid eggs their place will keep;
Stones roll; and streams, that seek the sea,
The more they flow the wider be.'

Mrs. Oliphant continues her admirable work in Blackwood and Macmillan. In the former, in "The Ladies Lindores," an incident has occurred which brings half-laughing, half-painful tears to the eyes; but in the latter, in "The Wizard's Son," the authoress has for a moment shrunk from her own supernatural machinery. We expected her to tell us why the heir suddenly turned into a gloomy man, but after introducing the Wizard, she reports nothing that he has said. Perhaps that is reserved for the sequel; but without this explanation, the tale, admirably clever as it is, will fall comparatively dead.

Longman's would be heavy, but for Mr. Hardy's "Three Strangers," a slight tale, admirably told; and in the Cornhill we note nothing except "Le Marquis de Grignan," a little memoir of the grandson of Madame de Sévigné, quite exquisitely done by "M. F. Domville," a name which we do not recall, but which we trust we shall speedily meet again below a paper dealing with some one of more importance to French history than the well-educated and well-conducted, but rather uninteresting Marquis, who seems only to have done nothing admirably well, and whose fit epitaph would have been,—"A Peer of promise."

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The most interesting article in the Atlantic Monthly is Mr. G. P. Lathrop's account of the "Hawthorne Manuscripts." There is scant piety to the dead in publishing what was obviously never meant for publication; but criticism such as Mr. Lathrop's, as reverent as it is acute, is perfectly legitimate. It is most interesting to watch, under the guidance of one thoroughly acquainted with the subject, the workings of a great artist's mind. "By Horse-cars into Mexico" is an "incident of travel" vigorously described. "Mr. Carlyle's Country" gives us familiar scenes from a fresh point of view. Fiction is represented by what must be called, we suppose, a novelette, "Antagonism." It seems meant to show us what the fiction of the future in America is to be. Here we have some twenty pages without so much as a single incident in them; two young people talk together, and let us see what it is that hinders the result wholly desired by others and half-desired by themselves,—that they should fall in love. It is clever enough, but a trifle wearisome. Longfellow's posthumous poem, "Michael Angelo," is brought to a conclusion.

Letts's Illustrated Household Magazine is a new venture, which promises to perform a useful function. It is to be "a complete encyclopædia of domestic requirements," telling us where we are to live and how, what we are to eat and drink and how we are to be clothed, furnishing us, in fact, with a practical guide in all the requirements of life. Among the contents are articles on poultry, on dress, on domestic medicine, and on cookery. There is much that is valuable in these, but we must ask the author of the "Dining-room" whether his bill of fare is not far too costly for the use of families of average means. It is intended, he says, for a "comfortable" income. Now, we have been at some pains to calculate the expense, and find that the butcher's bill could hardly be less than £3 per week, and the poulterer's and fishmonger's nearly half as much, ham, bacon, sausages, sardines, and the like being still left unaccounted for. In fact, this family of seven or eight must be able to spend not less than £1,600 per annum. Is not this a little too magnificent?

Three Recruits, and the Girls They Left behind Them. By Joseph Hatton. (Low and Co.)—This is a vigorous novel, in the best style of the author, who can tell a rattling story literally well enough, and can paint villains and heroes of the old-fashioned sort, and set them to belabour each other to decided purpose. There is less in it than in most of Mr. Hatton's works of what better judges than Mr. Edmund Sparkler would call "nonsense," although the reader will be occasionally irritated by some of his peculiar egotisms, and by digressions beginning in this fashion,—“If you would study this philosophy of love in a philosophical way, you will turn to dear old Burton's famous work.” The soldiers who are driven by stress of circumstances to take part in the war with Napoleon are flesh and blood; and of the heroines, one at least, Susan Hardwick, is fresh and full of spirit. The villains of the story, however, are, without exception, sad caricatures.

Essays in Philosophical Criticism. Edited by Andrew Seth and R. B. Haldane, with a Preface by Edward Caird. (Longmans.)—That this collection is not unworthy of the memory to which it is dedicated, would probably be felt by its contributors to be the best thing they could wish thought of it. It has been said with truth that the late Professor of Moral Philosophy at Oxford neither founded nor sought to found a school. But “a certain community of opinion in relation to the general principles and methods of philosophy,” such as Professor Caird's preface acknowledges in the writers of these essays, was a more or less recognised outcome of his teaching, and individual essays in this volume show a more special indebtedness. Four of the nine are by Oxford men, and, dealing as they do with Logic as the Science of Knowledge, the Rationality of History, the Philosophy of Art, and the Struggle for Existence (as “an economical fact that reaches far beyond economy, and is a crucial problem for the philosophy of man”), may give a fair idea of the intellectual interest of Oxford. In three of these four cases, the writers have Scotch antecedents, and the remaining five contributors are representatives of Scotch academic training, so that the book has a unity besides that alluded to above. The strictly scientific side of philosophic study is represented in Messrs. Bosanquet's, Seth's, and Haldane's papers, the latter two treating of Philosophy as Criticism of Categories, and in its Relation to Science; while on the political and religious side, we have essays by Messrs. Jones, Bonar, and Kilpatrick; and history and art fall to the share of Messrs. Sorley, Ritchie, and Ker. For almost every one who may be said to “take an interest in philosophy,” some reading is thus supplied; in one or two instances, notably in the essay on Philosophy as criticism of categories, and in that on Logic as the Science of knowledge, the position of those who hold Metaphysics to be something other than “the elaboration of transcendent entities, like an extraneous Deity, or Mr. Spencer's unknowable, or the Comtian noumena” (the words are Mr. Seth's, he is saying that most men of science take this view of metaphysics), and who, as Mr. Bosanquet says, “cannot conceive any difficulties to be so formidable as those which attend the method of a direct or uncritical metaphysic,” is stated in a clear and serious manner that is very valuable. Seriousness, indeed—a quite different thing from the moral earnestness (that is, “gush”) of much pseudo-philosophical utterance—marks all these papers; there is now and then some irony, and (as in Mr. Bonar's work) a quaint Scotch humour, but the academic offence of fine-writing is hardly half-a-dozen times committed (Mr. Bosanquet goes so far the other way as to use the word “scientist”), and the impression cannot but be left on the reader that “c'est icy un livre de bonne foy,” and the editors have done well to choose the book form rather than venture in a new philosophical serial. They may not again get a preface of such content in matter and manner as Professor Caird's memorial of Professor Green, but it is to be hoped that the “agreement as to the direction in which inquiry may be most fruitfully prosecuted” among their contributors, and among others, perhaps, who share the same beliefs, may give us from time to time a volume like this first.

Holidays in Spain. By F. R. McClintock. (Stanford.)—This little volume contains some account of the tours made in Spain by the author, and, we believe, his wife, in 1880 and 1881. He was so delighted with his experiences, that he is anxious to induce others to go and do likewise. M. Tchibatcheff tells us that Spain is the only country in Europe which has much that is non-European and old-world about it, and commends it to any one desirous of a complete change. And this is essentially Mr. McClintock's conclusion, and we have no doubt that readers of his pleasant narrative will wish they could follow his example.

The Story of Chief Joseph. By Martha Perry Lowe. (Lothrop, Boston.)—Chief Joseph is, as was shown a few years ago in the North-American Review, an interesting Indian, and his story deserved preservation in prose and in such illustrations as this little volume contains. But Miss Lowe's verse—she says she has endeavoured to preserve “the simple and direct style of the Indian—is so bald, that we are rather glad when we learn, on her authority, that,—

“In-mut-too-yah-lat-lat
Has spoken for his race to-day.
In-mut-too-yah-lat-lat,
Has finished what he had to say.”

Victor Emanuel (the New Plutarch Series), by Edward Dicey (Marcus Ward), is in every respect an admirable biography. It is written with spirit, fairness, and knowledge. That Mr. Dicey was the very man to write such a book those were aware, who remembered that he resided at Naples during the last days of the Bourbon monarchy and throughout the Garibaldian Dictatorship. We feared, however, he might be disposed to be more than just to Victor Emanuel and Cavour, and less than just to Garibaldi. He has, however, distributed merit as regards the work of making the kingdom of Italy with perfect impartiality. He does not conceal the personal weaknesses of the late King, whom he reckons, and rightly, as “a man with great qualities, many failings, high ambition, and strong passions, but both in his virtues and in his faults, above all, a man.”

Juvenal, Persius, Martial, and Catullus. An Experiment in Translation. By W. F. Shaw, M.A. (Kegan Paul and Co.)—The question whether it is desirable to render these four poets (or, as Mr. Shaw in one place calls them, “these amusing writers”) “attractive in English” for the benefit of the general reader, will obviously depend on the amount of taste and discretion possessed by the translator, of which we shall speak presently. Being of opinion that the prose translator must sacrifice “the pleasure of the reader to fidelity to the text,” while in verse translations “the exact meaning often has to be sacrificed to the exigencies, of rhyme” (of which, as is truly remarked, “there is none in the original”), Mr. Shaw has adopted an unrhymed “trochaic, octosyllabic” metre, which will be recognised, though in some cases with difficulty, as the metre of “Hiawatha.” The extent to which Mr. Shaw has been able to combine the merit, of both styles may be fairly judged from his rendering of Juvenal, iii., 299-308:—

“Noble freedom of the poor man!
Isn't he free to get well adulged?
Isn't he free to beg permission
To get home to bed, before his Few remaining teeth are knocked out?
Worse than all remain the burglar
Who will rob you when work's over,
And the shop-door is chain-bolted [sic],
And to cut your thro't, the foot-pad. . . .
Then it is these fish discover
That the best baits in the city.”

The felicity of the last two lines is especially noticeable. Among isolated specimens of Mr. Shaw's mastery over his metre, we award the palm, after some consideration, to “Juno was a maid, then; and Jove,” “His nail to the quick; come hither,” and “A cross sometimes, sometimes a crown,” the effect of which we consider superior to that of passing a lawn-mower over a rockery. The spelling of the volume is occasionally eccentric, as in “donned her whip,” and "bread of finest flower." In punctuation, a corrupt following of what may be called the Cambridge system, combined with a wonderful degree of inaccuracy, has produced some odd results, perhaps the oddest of which is seen in such notes as these: "Men kiss you not out of friendship, but mere flattery, Paley," and "that stingy old Laetorius, Paley," where, though there are several other possibilities, Mr. Paley's name seems at first sight like a profane counterpart of that mystery of our childhood, "selah." But faults of execution are as nothing, compared to the fault of publishing the book at all. Whether or no "it is possible to eliminate what is obnoxious" from the Sixth Satire of Juvenal, we are quite sure that Mr. Shaw has not succeeded in doing so, and the evil is by no means confined to this one satire. The notes frequently make the matter worse, sometimes needlessly, as in the extraordinary note on p. 262, recording an observation made by Mr. Shaw in Italy. It seems to us a blunder of a very serious kind to publish for the "general reader," in a form which may reach the drawing-room table, such hints of the things which "it is a shame even to speak of" as may be found freely scattered over Mr. Shaw's pages. The translator should have put to himself, in a quite different sense, the question on the title-page,—"Quis leget hæc?"

The Library Manual, by J. Herbert Slater (L. Upcott Gill), which aims at being a guide to the formation of a library, and "the valuation of rare and splendid books," is one of those works which it would be perfectly easy to pick holes in; and, indeed, the author looks forward to some such experience. At the same time, it is full of useful information, is well arranged, and contains much sound advice. But when Mr. Slater was giving counsel as to the formation of a library, why should he include among books of reference (p. 20) the edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" for 1860? Surely the book collector should either take the edition of this valuable work which is now being issued, or he should take a complete edition of another encyclopædia of later date than 1860, if he wishes to use it as "a work which may help him to further information."

Madeline's Fault: a Story of French Life, translated by Morris Neale (Remington and Co.), is pathetic enough, and has the merit of being short. The "fault" of Madeline, though French in character, will not be considered a very heinous one, except by those who set up an almost Pharisaical standard of morality. Yet we should have preferred to see the real sinner punished, in the shape of M. Robert Wall, who tempted Madeline, rather than Madeline herself. But then, French literature is nearly as deficient in "poetic justice" as, according to Mr. Arnold, French character is in "morality."

An Introduction to the Science of Comparative Mythology and Folklore. By the Rev. Sir G. W. Cox, Bart., M.A. (Kegan Paul and Co.)—This work, of which our notice has been delayed too long, is intended by its learned author to occupy a middle place between his "Manual of Mythology," and his more elaborate examination of the "Mythology of the Aryan Nations." Its aim is to give a general view of the mass of popular traditions of the Aryan peoples of Asia and Europe, and, by submitting them to the test of a scientific comparison, to ascertain their mutual relation, their real nature, and their intrinsic value. Under the general head of tradition are included all the myths, folk-lore, fairy tales, and romances which for centuries formed the delight of Hindoos, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Germans, and Celts. Many of these, in various forms, are as much alive and as much loved to-day as they were thousands of years ago. The science of comparative mythology must be considered as yet only in its infancy. Those who know Mr. Ruskin's "Queen of the Air" will remember what charming speculations are there connected with some of the Greek myths. The skilful handling in that instance applied to one group of subjects was, as it were, a flash of revelation on the possibilities of the vast area which lies ready for exploration by competent travellers. The work under notice throws a fuller and broader light over the same field of work, and, beyond any doubt, the attraction increases in proportion as the light reveals more clearly the nature of the ground. Starting from the idea that the myth is a kind of parasite, ready to twine round any stem, the author sets himself to examine the various stems round which the leading myths of the great Aryan family have become entwined; and truly, the work is as delicate as to uncurl the clinging tendrils of a vine, nor does it fix the thought on forms of less obvious beauty or habits of less curious interest. The work is one of comparison and analysis, for comparative mythology deals with the stories of the world, just as philology deals with its speech. By following the indications of significance in the names which appear in the earlier myths, it detects the meaning of the tale in which they first took definite shape. Then, tracing the great river of tradition down from its source, it notes the variations, losses, and accretions which gradually transform the original tale. One great cause affecting the development of myths was the dispersion of the primitive Aryan race over certain parts of Asia and Europe, and the probable working of this cause is very ingeniously tracked out in the opening chapter. As one follows the subject further, one is struck by the fact that the study of mythology is to a great extent the study of corruption. The original beauty of the story or tradition becomes, principally by failure of memory, but also by misunderstanding and defective expression, so changed and transformed in its onward progress, that it reminds one forcibly of the children's game called "Russian scandal," in which similar causes, arising from the frailty of our common nature, work out an exactly similar result. It should not be left unmentioned that the author energetically protests against the common impression that comparative mythology resolves everything into allusions to the Sun. He admits, indeed, that an immense proportion of myths do relate to that luminary, in virtue of its essential importance to human life and action; but he gives ample illustration that the dawn, the fire, the winds, the waters, the clouds, the earth, the under-world, and the darkness, all have their parts to play on the great and crowded stage on which human intelligence and fancy placed them before history was born. A discussion, in one of several appendices, of the theory that the Olympian gods are an anthropomorphic representation of a series of truths divinely revealed to man, which is strongly maintained by Mr. Gladstone in his "Homeric Studies," and is here vigorously contested, will assuredly not diminish the value or interest of a volume which can certainly lay claim to much of both.

Mr. B. A. Proctor republishes from Knowledge twelve star maps, under the title The Stars in their Seasons. (Wyman and Sons.)—There is a list of stars of the first three magnitudes, a table of reference for using the maps, and a general explanation. Each map is accompanied by a time-table. The general result is that the whole subject is made easily intelligible. The colouring of the maps, a blue ground with white lettering, is both attractive and appropriate; but, for use at night, a white ground with black lettering would have been, we think, more practically useful.

Flowers of the Sky. By B. A. Proctor. A new edition. (Chatto and Windus.)—We have no doubt that this handy little edition of one of Mr. Proctor's most attractive series of papers will be welcome to many. It is a fine example of the author's power of combining a modicum of fact with much attractive speculation.

BOOKS RECEIVED.—Vol. III. of Gladstone and his Contemporaries. By Thomas Archer. (Blackie and Son.)—This work, which is now brought down to 1860, continues to merit what we have already said of the earlier volumes. The story of the Indian Mutiny is very satisfactorily told.—The Amusing Adventures of Guzman of Alfarague. By Mateo Aleman. Translated by Edward Lowdell. (Vizetelly.)—This is a very well-executed translation of a famous "Rogue's Progress," which, however, we cannot place on a footing of equality with "Gil Blas."—The Adventures of a Tourist in Ireland. By J. L. Joynes. (Kegan Paul.)—The public knows the character of this book sufficiently, on account of the notoriety and "martyrdom" it has secured its author. We confess that we are surprised there should have been so much ado over what is rather a juvenile performance.—Chums: a Tale of the Queen's Navy. (Tinsley Brothers.)—This three-volume novel contains more vulgarity of thought and language than we have seen for a long time. We regret that it should be associated with so honourable a service as the Navy, and that it should have ever been published.—Outline of the History of the English Language and Literature. (W. and R. Chambers.)—A useful, compact, little manual. We do not quite understand, however, what principle the compiler of the final "Tabular Outline of Modern English Literature" has adopted in his descriptions of authors. If Bacon be correctly designated as an essayist, why should Addison be dismissed simply as Secretary of State, and Hume only as a librarian and Secretary to the British Embassy in France?—Links with the Absent; or, Chapters on Correspondence. By a Member of the Ursuline Community, Thurles. (Washbourne.)—This is neither better nor worse than most Complete Letter-writers. Does the author, however, recommend for imitation the example given (p. 114) of an address of the pupils of some seminary to an Archbishop, in which there is very fine-writing about "the moon's dimpling smiles on some fair lake," and the voice of gratitude is directed to "be heard in music's swelling tide, in every note of silvery song, in the word and gesture of the personated native of sunny France, the Italian, or the dweller by the matchless Rhine"?—Charles Albert Fechter. By Kate Field. (Osgood, Boston.)—A collection of criticisms, by a variety of writers, which may be dismissed as appreciative rather than discriminating.—The School Board Chronicle Edition of the New Code. (Grant and Co.)—The New Code is here annotated, analysed, and indexed specially for the use of members of School Boards and the managers and teachers of public elementary schools. Mr. Richard Gowing, who has brought out this edition, has done his work well.

MAGAZINES, ETC.—We have received the following for March:—Part 22 of English Etchings, containing commendable specimens of the work of G. Aikman, A.R.S.A., R. Currie, and W. P. Crooke.—The Magazine of Art, an average number.—Art and Letters, an interesting and well-illustrated number.—L'Art de la Femme.—Part 5 of Greater London, which deals with the districts of Harlington, West Drayton, Norwood, Croydon, &c.—The Journal of Psychological Medicine.—The Folk-lore Journal, to which Mr. Black contributes an interesting account of "The Hare in Folk-lore."—The Gentleman's Magazine, which gives some curious accounts of "Perversion of Herbivora." We have heard of sheep being fed on fish, but a sheep that will eat a mutton-chop is a novelty; and it will be news to most persons to learn that old or ailing horses, if fed upon "flesh-meal," will increase in health and weight.—The Theatre, containing photographs of Miss W. Emery and Mr. S. B. Bancroft.—Science Gossip.—The Army and Navy Magazine.—The Month.—The Law Magazine.—Time.—The Nautical Magazine.—Colburn's United Service Magazine.—Tinsley's Magazine, which opens with the first chapters of a new serial story.—Belgravia, in which Ouida's "Frescoes" are concluded.—London Society.—Chambers's Journal.—Cassell's Magazine.—Aunt Judy's Magazine.—Good Words.—All the Year Round.—The Sunday Magazine.—The Leisure Hour, containing an account of the sheep-eating parrots of New Zealand.—The Sunday at Home, which has for frontispiece a very good specimen of oleograph printing.—The Ladies' Gazette of Fashion.—The Continent, the principal illustrated article in which is devoted to "Terra Cotta in Architecture."—Harper's Monthly.

ERRATUM.—The edition of "Othello" referred to in our last number is by Mr. E. K. Purnell, and not, as printed, Mr. E. R. Parnell.

SPECTACLES V. BLINDNESS.

ONE-FOURTH of those suffering from blindness or dimness of sight can trace their calamity to the use of common spectacles or lenses imperfectly adapted to the sight. Mr. HENRY LAURANCE, F.S.S., Oculist Optician, PERSONALLY adapts his Improved Spectacles at his residence, 3 Endsleigh Gardens, Euston Square, London, daily (Saturdays excepted), ten to four. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal opticians in London without success, but your spectacles suit me admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, late Surgeon-Major, W.E.M., writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age, 83. I can now read the smallest print, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Similar testimonials from John Lowe, Esq., M.D., J. P. Lynn, Physician to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales; Ven. The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other inventions of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name,

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

AT nine o'clock on Thursday evening a great explosion took place in the Local Government Office, which wrecked the room in which it appears to have occurred and forced out the windows, hurled a huge stone, weighing between one and two hundred weight, through the wall of the Police-station in King Street, and broke almost every window, including all the heavy plate-glass windows, on the south side of Parliament Street. For one hundred and fifty yards the heavy plate-glass lay literally in heaps in the streets of Parliament Street, King Street, Charles Street, &c. The effect of the explosion is described as resembling that of an 80-ton gun. It startled the House of Commons, and the Speaker sent to ask what had caused it, and was then told it was due to a gas explosion, which, however, is certainly now known to have been a mistake. Gun-cotton, dynamite, or ordinary gunpowder will alone account for the appearances; but it is not yet known where the explosives were placed, whether in the cellars of the Local Government Office or between the balustrades and the windows. It is not seriously doubted that the explosion was due to some infernal machine placed in the Local Government Office by Fenian conspirators, as a kind of answer to Mr. Gladstone's speech of Wednesday last,—and a very imbecile as well as wanton answer too, an answer which can only confirm every one who previously objected to further concession, in the wisdom of that attitude of finality.

An hour and a quarter earlier an attempt was made to blow up the Times' office, in Printing-House Square, by someone who fixed a tin-box containing explosives on the ledge of one of the ground-floor windows. Mr. Alfred Evans, of Playhouse Yard, who heard the explosion, says that on rushing out he saw flames rising over the large front window of the Times' publishing office in Playhouse Yard, and rising at least ten feet from the box of explosives. He immediately threw a bucket of water over the tin-box, and extinguished the flames. Another account represents the watchman as having extinguished the fire, and does not make so much of the flames. But there can be little doubt that the attempts on the Local Government Office and on the Times' office were concerted, though it is quite possible that other besides political motives may have entered into the attempt to destroy the Times' office, where there have been several symptoms within the last year or two of serious disaffection on the part of some of the employés.

The Tories won the Mid-Cheshire election on Wednesday by a majority of 622, the Hon. Alan de Tatton Egerton obtaining 4,214 votes, against 3,592 given to the Liberal candidate, Mr. Latham. Both candidates increased their poll over the poll of 1880, Mr. Latham by 218, and the Tory candidate by 346, so that the Tory majority, which was 494 in 1880, mounted up to 622 on this occasion,—i.e., was increased by 128 votes. The poll was nearly exhaustive, and conclusively proves that the Tories retain the feudal power in Mid-Cheshire which they have so long held there.

A second riot occurred at Paris on Sunday, readily put down by the police; and a serious one is arranged for to-morrow, when the Anarchists will celebrate the anniversary of the Commune. It is not expected to result in grave consequences, but foreigners are leaving Paris, and the two Chambers have postponed their recess till the 20th inst., lest any upward incident should occur. General Thibaudin is evidently aware of the truth that no force can operate against mob-like cavalry, and he disperses crowds without shedding blood. There is a certain uneasiness in Paris, caused by the fact that the men of the building trade are out of work; and by rumour, peremptorily denied, that M. Grévy intends to resign the President's chair. These last appear to be circulated by Reactionaries, whose hope is that if M. Grévy resigned, the consequent confusion would be so great as to induce the Army to interfere. There is no chance of the resignation, and if it happened, the Army would probably watch the transfer of power quite quietly. Observers interpret the tone of the French Army too much by that of the superior officers. They forget that when the orders to be given are illegal, the consent, or at least the acquiescence, of the non-commissioned officers, and even of the men, is required. Of the non-commissioned officers in France a singular proportion are citizens of the great towns, who are devoted to the Republic, a fact well understood by Gambetta, when he finally faced Marshal MacMahon. The French officers are keen politicians, but they will not run the danger of civil war in the barracks.

On Wednesday, Mr. Parnell moved the second reading of his Irish Land Act Amendment Bill, a Bill which, in principle at least, would transfer the whole land of Ireland, except the rent representing the value of the wild land, to the tenants; and which would subject the rents of all the leaseholders, as well as all the tenants-at-will, to the judicial parings of the Land Commission. Further, it proposes to extend very greatly the purchase clauses, and to make the judicial rents date, not from the time of the Court's decision, but from the time of the notice given to ask the decision of the Court. Mr. Parnell went over the ordinary Irish reasons for this great reopening of the whole question, but especially signalised his speech by the remark that the new judicial rents are in effect rack-rents which it will be quite impossible for the Irish tenant-farmers to pay,—a declaration which is too likely to be taken in Ireland as the inauguration of a new agitation against the machinery of the Land Act itself.

Mr. Chaplin moved the rejection of the Bill in a furious speech of the old kind against the plunder and pillage of the Irish landlords, and concluded by quoting Lord Hartington's and Lord Derby's strong declarations of the necessity for not again raising new issues of principle on the Irish land question. Mr. Dickson, on behalf of the Ulster farmers, made a strong appeal for new powers to break leases which had been dictated by overwhelming pressure, and for a Parliamentary overruling of the judgment given in "Adams v. Dunseath;" and then Mr. Gladstone, in a speech of great power, but much less sympathetic in character towards the Irish demands than his various declarations of last year on the amendments needed to complete the Land Act, declined to hold out any promise with regard to the points needing amendment, while he held up Mr. Parnell's attempt to throw discredit on the new judicial rents to the indignation and censure of the House. His reason, of course, for not undertaking to amend the Act was other more urgent claims on the time of the House and the attention of the Government, and the great danger of unsettling the remedial operation of the Act. It is generally understood that Lord Spencer has appealed to the Government not to reopen Land-Act questions at present, and hence perhaps the discouraging tone of Mr. Gladstone's speech. Mr. Bryce, on the part of the independent Liberals, expressed his great regret at that discouraging tone, and pressed strongly on the Government the very great grievances of some of the Irish leaseholders. Sir Farrer Herschell, in a very able speech, contrasted Mr. Parnell's Bill with the scope of the Land Act, and then the second reading was rejected by 250 votes to 63.

Mr. Gladstone's most interesting statistics were those showing the rapidly accelerating progress made in the settlement of the judicial rents. Of the contentious cases, one-third (30,000) had been settled by the end of January last, while two-thirds (60,000) remained to be settled. But the rate of the judicial decisions, which showed at first only fourteen a day, had increased to the number of 100 a day, or more than 30,000 in the year; so that at this rate, by the end of 1884 we may hope for the settlement of much the greater number of the contentious cases. For every case settled in Court, one at least,—indeed, more than one,—is shown to be settled out of Court by a voluntary agreement which the Court is asked to sanction.

The French are evidently about to take strong action in Tonquin. On Tuesday, M. de St. Vallier argued in the Senate that the possession of Cochin China ought to be made "more fruitful," by the seizure of territory in Tonquin, "in which a French colony might be planted;" and the Foreign Minister, M. Challemlacour, said he agreed with him. France must make her influence felt among distant populations, who had misread the events of 1870. The Sovereign of Anam had violated the Treaty of 1874, and recognised the suzerainty of China, and the Government was therefore resolved to pursue an energetic policy, to show that French occupation was not temporary. The Ministry would, therefore, after Easter, demand a credit for an expedition which would permanently occupy certain points of Tonquin, the division of Anam nearest to China. M. Challemlacour, it is clear, does not understand China. If he really uttered the absurdly incautious words we have italicised, and is prepared to make the Chinese suzerainty over Anam a ground of war, he will be compelled to dictate terms of peace at the gates of Peking. The Chinese will pour an army into Anam, and will defend the Sovereign to the last, wearing out the French soldiery by their numbers. What can have induced M. Challemlacour voluntarily to place the quarrel upon a ground so offensive to Chinese pride, it is difficult to imagine. It was only necessary to say, as he did say, that the Sovereign of Anam encouraged brigandage in French Cochin-China, to localise the war. Now, the Chinese Empress will consider it war against herself.

Lord Spencer has resigned the Presidentship-in-Council, but retains his seat in the Cabinet. It is supposed that Lord Rosebery will be President-in-Council, but nothing is yet known, and Mr. Gladstone has stated that the opportunity will be taken to improve the Departmental arrangements for Scotland and for the representation of agriculture. Two ideas are said to be before the Cabinet,—one, that there should be a separate Ministry of Education and a Vice-President of Council for Agriculture; and another, that Agriculture should be a sub-department of the Board of Trade. It would be easier to adopt the former, which cannot be long postponed, and assign Agriculture to the President, with a Vice-President for Scotland. The President even now manages himself the most pressing of agricultural business, the Act for stamping out cattle disease. Any arrangement, however, is good, provided it does not increase the number of Cabinet Ministers.

Mr. Lowell, the American Minister in London, on July 14th informed the Government of Washington that the Prevention of Crimes Act included a revival of the old Alien Act, and though "he had every reason to believe the Act would be applied with caution and discrimination, and only to persons who may make themselves particularly prominent by incitement to disorder," he requested instructions. Mr. Secretary Frelinghuysen, in a long despatch, of September 22nd, does not give instructions, but leaves action to Mr. Lowell, only saying, "I need scarcely add that this Government has no sympathy with the motives or methods of the class of indiscreet individuals, insignificant in number, in this country, whose ill-directed zeal can neither serve the cause of Ireland, nor reflect credit on the country of their adoption. Law-abiding, peaceable American citizens of Irish birth should not be exposed to suffer on their account." The truth of the matter is, that General Arthur's Government has no sympathy with Irish Extremists, but is unwilling to irritate the Irish vote.

The Tories think they have at last found a good case in South Africa, where the Government of the Transvaal, either from weakness or connivance, has allowed its subjects to oppress two Bechuana chiefs in a manner prohibited by the Convention. Lord Cranbrook brought forward the subject on Tuesday in the Lords, and drew from Lord Derby the important statement that the protection of the Bechuana chiefs would involve a serious campaign, and a subsequent military occupation. The Government, therefore, though aware that the Convention had been broken, proposed to compensate the chiefs with money and lands, instead of going to war. Earl Cairns and Lord Salisbury followed Lord Derby with speeches of bitter reprobation, Lord Cairns' in particular being very able, but no Peer ventured to suggest an expedition. The Tory idea was only to show that the Convention was a blunder, to which Lord Granville replied that it might be, but if so, it was a blunder consequent on the original mistake, the annexation of the Transvaal.

In the Commons, the first desire of the Tories is to waste time, and so exhaust "the Gladstone period." While Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, therefore, "asked for a day" to discuss South-African affairs, Mr. Gorst had a motion on the paper for Tuesday calling attention to the position of natives under the Convention. Mr. Gladstone, not seeing the necessity for two debates on one subject, refused to answer Sir Michael Hicks-Beach until he saw what became of Mr. Gorst's motion, which that gentleman was accordingly constrained to bring forward. He did so in a speech made effective by quotations from the despatches of Sir Hercules Robinson, who undoubtedly accuses the Transvaal Government of "unwillingness to control their marauding subjects." Mr. Cartwright met Mr. Gorst, who had demanded "energetic action," with an amendment calling upon Government to "confine its action within the limits of unavoidable obligations;" and Mr. Ashley, in answering for the Government, upheld that view. He admitted fully that the wrongs perpetrated "were a disgrace to humanity," but declined, for the reasons advanced by Lord Derby, to go beyond remonstrance, which he thought would be felt at Pretoria. For reasons stated elsewhere, we think the Government right, but we have little hope from remonstrance. The Doppers, the most energetic section of the Boers, believe that they hold the Transvaal by divine right, and that they have a special mission to despoil and "govern" all African blacks. Mr. Kruger cannot control these men, even if he would.

The Indian Budget was published on Thursday in Calcutta, and is on the whole favourable. The account for 1881-82 proves that the revenue was £73,696,000, and the expenditure £71,113,000, leaving a surplus of £2,583,000. The revised estimate for 1882-83 shows a revenue of £67,914,000, and an expenditure, after providing for the Egyptian Expedition, of £67,854,000, or a minute surplus of £60,000. Major Baring, moreover, hopes that in 1883-84 the revenue will be £67,274,000 and the expenditure £66,817,000, thus leaving £457,000 in the Treasury. The Government is able to send £1,000,000 home for the repayment of sterling debt,—quite a new process,—and the Treasury is satisfied as to its future prospects. Major Baring denies that the revenue of India is inelastic, and says the increase in the use of salt is so great, that the reduction made last year is partly recouped already, and will very shortly be fully made up. The bad features in the situation are the continued fluctuations in the value of silver, and the decline in the sales of opium, due to the increasing growth of the drug in China itself; but "I see no reason for taking a desponding view of the financial situation at present."

The very important, though little noticed, Conference of the Powers upon the navigation of the Danube, held in London, came to a conclusion on Saturday, when a Treaty of nine clauses was provisionally signed. By the terms of this agreement, which was described to the House of Commons on Monday by Lord E. Fitzmaurice, the control of the European Commission created by the Treaty of Paris over the navigation is extended for twenty-one years, that is, to April 24th, 1904, and for such additional time as may elapse without any Power demanding a fresh Conference. The management of the river for such distance as its banks belong to Russia and Roumania is confided to the delegates of those two States; but the European Commission is to be informed of everything done, and if any dispute arises in consequence, the matter is to be referred to the Powers collectively. Russia may levy what tolls she pleases on the Kilia mouth, but she must inform the other riverain States, so that they may take what action they please. There is no doubt that the Treaty is a compromise of grave importance to the peace of Europe, or that its arrangement is mainly due to the impartiality and tact of Lord Granville, who saw from the first that the question touched the pride as well as the interests of the Powers very closely. Under the arrangement, pride is satisfied; but Europe continues to regulate the Danube, the control of which would otherwise be settled by a savage war. It is just the question that the North and South Slavs would select for their battle-ground.

The Italian Chamber has been debating the action of the Government in Egypt with great vehemence, the Right contending that the British offer to accept Italy as an ally in putting down Arabi's insurrection ought to have been accepted. S. Mancini, Minister for Foreign Affairs, in reply made a curious speech, affirming first that the refusal was not absolute; secondly, that the German Powers, though acquiescent, left to Italy the responsibility; and, thirdly, that if Italy had agreed, France would have gone to Alexandria too, which one would have thought was a reason for accepting Lord Granville's offer. He denied that Italy was not ready and was afraid of the expense, but admitted that the latter consideration had weighed with the Ministry, who, we may add, after the refusal abused England publicly and privately for going on alone. Altogether, the impression left by the speech is that the Italian Ministry do not quite know what they want, unless it is cheap glory; and that, in any case, they are not the men with whom one would care to go hunting tigers. It is evident from the debate that grave Italian statesmen like S. Minghetti feel very keenly the loss of the entente cordiale with Great Britain.

There was an attempt made in Supply on Saturday to reduce one of the votes, for conveying "distinguished persons" across the Channel in special packets, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Illingworth, and others freely expressing their opinion that these distinguished persons should pay for their own passages across the Channel out of the allowances made them by the country. This seems to us a reasonable demand. It is all very right to support the Throne with a certain liberality and splendour, but there is no reason at all why the members of the Royal Family, once properly provided for, should not pay their own way as other people do, instead of constantly asking for fresh votes of money for the very needless purpose of distinguishing all their movements from those of ordinary subjects. The junior members of the Royal Family ought not to regard it as a matter of the first importance to the Throne, that they should shrink from all contact with ordinary subjects. In reality, they would make the Throne a great deal more popular by living well within their incomes, and showing their friendliness to the people on the few occasions on which they would be called upon to share the accommodation provided for less exalted persons.

Mr. Biggar is an obstinate man. His counsel in the breach-of-promise case brought by Miss Hyland against him applied for a new trial on Wednesday to Lord Justices Brett, Cotton, and Bowen, on the ground that the jury had found that there was a conditional promise to marry, although there was no corroboration of the lady's statement in the sense required by the statute; that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, and that the damages were excessive. The Lords Justices, however, dismissed the appeal with costs, Lord Justice Brett holding that the conduct of Mr. Biggar, as described by himself, afforded what the jury were warranted in regarding as sufficient corroboration of the alleged promise, and that his story of praying in church that the obstacles to his marriage might be removed, could only mean, under the circumstances, the obstacles to his marriage to this particular woman, and ought to be construed as confirmatory of the promise to marry her which he now denied. Lord Justices Cotton and Bowen concurred, and Mr. Biggar took nothing but additional costs by his appeal. We confess that, to our minds, the evidence of a promise appears highly inferential and dubious; but undoubtedly Mr. Biggar's story, as told by himself, was not of a kind to incline any jury or Court to put the most favourable construction on his own conduct, or to limit to the most honourable significance the meaning of his words. There are some men who never gain by keeping themselves before the public. Mr. Biggar would have done better to retire as soon as possible into the comparative privacy of political life.

The use of electricity as a motor is developing, though not very rapidly. It appears from a lecture by Professor Ayrton, delivered at the Royal Institution on the 15th inst., that on the Portrush Railway to the Giant's Causeway, in Ireland, a tramcar driven by electricity runs steadily at ten miles an hour, and but that the speed is limited by Act of Parliament, could easily do twenty-five miles. "We took six tons the other day," writes the chairman, "up an incline of one in thirty-five." A heavy tramcar has been tried on the tramway to Acton, and worked admirably, drawing an omnibus holding forty-six people, at six miles an hour, for an outlay of six shillings and eightpence a day, against twenty-eight shillings required for the necessary horse-power. This tramcar is driven by Faure accumulators placed under the seat, as is also an electric launch, which now does fifteen miles an hour, with tide, upon the Thames. Professor Ayrton also shows an electric tricycle which runs eight and a half miles in the hour, with an ordinary driver's weight, and can run for two hours without being recharged. The accumulator is being rapidly improved, and the practical point now is to secure an ultimate charging force which shall be cheap. This must be a natural rush of water, and will be found at last either in some tidal river like the Severn, or in the tide itself. In Canton Vaud, a heavy waterfall is to be utilised, so as to distribute light at a cheap rate throughout the Canton. If we could once use the tide, it would be possible even now to distribute motive force stored in accumulators at a price with which no other motor could compare.

There was a "No-Popery" tumult at Pembroke College about a fortnight ago, the cause being the presence of a Papal Chamberlain, an M.A. of Brasenose College, of the name of Grissell, who was supposed to be using persuasive influences to induce Protestants to go over to Rome. Mr. Grissell and the party which entertained him were first screwed up in one of the sets of rooms at Pembroke; and then, when the authorities of the College had released him, he was hustled out of College with a storm of missiles after him. We supposed that demonstrations of this kind were more or less things of the past. It is quite clear that if a man is inclined to join the Roman Church, he will find ample excuses for doing so without the blandishments of a Papal Chamberlain; while if he is not so inclined, the blandishments of a Papal Chamberlain, even though also an M.A. of Oxford, will not go for much. We suspect, however, that Oxford Undergraduates need very little prompting to revive an almost obsolete form of amusement, when they see a good opportunity. Hustling a Jesuit is ignoble perhaps, but so is wrestling with a bargee. Comparative novelty is the recommendation in matters of this kind, which is most certain to fascinate Undergraduates.

There was also a most disgraceful scene in Bordesley Church on Sunday, when the Rev. Alan Hunter Watts, who has been appointed by the Aston Trustees to succeed the Rev. R. W. Enraght, displaced by the operation of the Public Worship Act, read himself in as the new Vicar in the morning, and preached, or tried to preach, in the evening. In striking contrast to the conduct of Mr. Enraght, who has strictly obeyed the inhibition of the Bishop of Worcester, his Ritualistic friends, aided by roughs, organised a scene of tumult and insult which, within the walls of a church, was as profane as it was criminal. The new Vicar's personal safety was only ensured by the attendance of a very large body of police, while the indecency of the tumult can hardly be exaggerated. It is not by accepting demonstrations of this kind that the Ritualists will gain the toleration they deserve. Hitherto, it has been their boast that they have suffered these things, and overcome persecution by suffering them, not that they have enlisted coarse violence on their side.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE USE OF THE NEW FENIAN OUTRAGE.

IT is said to be an ill wind which blows nobody good, and we are not sure that even in this dastardly attempt at Westminster we may not find some room for satisfaction. We believe that it will demonstrate beyond question to the wretched "Invincibles," or whoever they may be who fancy that the Land Act was the result, not of the English sense of justice, but of the English terror of Irish outrages, that outrage, even when it reaches Westminster itself, and threatens every Londoner with the possibility of a violent death, instead of producing more disposition to yield to Irish demands, renders Englishmen less and less disposed to open our minds even to what may be just in those demands, and more inclined to sustain the Government in its present attitude of finality. We have said our say on the Irish debate of Wednesday, and we shall not unsay a word of it, though we wrote as we did before the outrage of Thursday was known to us. We still hold in the strongest manner that whatever reforms the Government thinks needed in Ireland, they ought to urge on so soon as may be, absolutely without reference either to the monstrous threats of the violent Land-leaguers, or to the passionate criticisms of the violent landowners. They should ignore Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Chaplin with perfect impartiality, and do justice, without relation to the false motives to which on either side that justice may be attributed. Still, we all know that whatever we may regard as "the counsel of perfection," there will be a great effect produced on the temper of the Scotch and English people by such attempts to blow up portions of London as that made on Thursday night; and what we wish to point out is that that effect will not be favourable to the policy of absolute and indifferent justice for which we contend, and will be only too favourable to the policy of convincing the Irish agitators that they gain nothing and lose much by such wicked attempts as that of Thursday. We have been assured over and over again by the Irish party that England never concedes the policy of justice except to threats of violence. Well, let them try their own creed by the results of Thursday night's outrage. We venture to predict that it will cure them of that curious and ignorant superstition. We venture to say that, so far as that outrage operates at all, it will operate to harden the hearts of Englishmen against doing anything which may look like concession to terror. We venture to say that Englishmen never have done justice to Ireland in concession to terror; that the chief difficulty in persuading them to do justice has been all along that they feared lest that justice should look like a concession to terror; and that it took all Mr. Gladstone's eloquence to convince them that they ought to remedy the great national grievances of Ireland with no less earnestness, that cowardly attempts had been made to wring the remedy of those grievances out of them by terror. And now, when they think, —as they justly think,—that a very great and heroic effort has been made to do Ireland justice, the completion of which is only a matter of minor rectifications, so far from being predisposed in favour of these minor rectifications by attempts of this kind, they will be strongly predisposed against them, and will say to themselves,—'Let the Irish see what they are likely to gain by this ignoble attempt to wring further concessions from our fears. We followed Mr. Gladstone in a heroic effort to do justice, but if this is the reward, so far from going out of our way to complete what we have done, we will let the cowardly agitators who organise these outrages see that the English people are not the people to be easily intimidated.'

And really, difficult as it is to anticipate anything but evil from these reckless injuries and the serious resentment they excite, we are not sure that some good may not come out of the outrage, if it only convinces these light-headed plotters that they are adopting the very course least likely to lead to the ends they desire. Politicians who know anything have long known that the Irish creed that the fear bred of outrage carried the disestablishment of the Irish Church and the two Land Acts, was founded in a blunder as disastrous as the human understanding could make. Now, perhaps, the Irish agitators—if they are capable of learning anything,—will learn this too. They will see that what has resulted from the attempt of Thursday is not dismay and dread, but wrath and scorn. They will find the understanding, even of the most friendly English, much less accessible to reasonable argument than it has been for years past, and they will recognise as the cause of this the malignant attempt to frighten us into concessions. The Fenians may destroy millions' worth of property, and even scores of valuable lives, and yet produce nothing but a more iron determination not to concede anything to such arguments as these. If the Irish agitators had had any true imagination, they would have seen long ago that terror has not even constituted a single element in the complex motives which have converted so many English politicians to the justice of the Irish tenants' case,—that the outrages affected us only as symptoms of a very deep-seated and dangerous disease; and that it was the wish to cure this disease, not the wish to be able to sleep in peace, which led to the policy of generous and healing legislation. The new outrages, attempted after the most critical remedy in the policy of justice has been boldly applied, will not produce the same effect on our minds. On the contrary, they will convince many of us that it is even more dangerous to seem to yield to Irish menaces than to seem to neglect them, and that, at all events after applying so great a remedy as the Land Act, it will be best for a time to show the Irish agitators that they can extort nothing more by their crimes. And if the Irish agitators can be convinced of this, something will really have been done. To convince black-mailers that they will not succeed in wringing black-mail out of their intended victims, is always of some use. There is no particular enjoyment in incurring danger for the purpose of trying to extort what cannot be extorted; and that justice to Ireland cannot be extorted from the British people, though it may easily be obtained from them by appeals to reason and justice, we at least are finally and absolutely convinced.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE IRISH LAND ACT.

THE tone, even more than the substance, of the Prime Minister's speech on Wednesday will be a serious disappointment to a considerable section of the English Liberals. Mr. Sexton at once took advantage of that tone to say that, by the contrast which it presented to a speech on the same subject delivered last June, it would teach Ireland once more the old lesson that the Government never listens to Irish grievances except when the Irish are able to force their own dissatisfaction on the attention of the public by the alarm and anxiety which their violence excites. We believe that doctrine to be false,—we believe that it was not in the least the Fenian plots, but Mr. Gladstone's profound sense of justice, which disestablished the Irish Church; and that it was not in the least Irish outrages, but the report of the Land Commissioners—which, no doubt, Irish outrages had rendered almost necessary,—which induced the present Government to introduce the great Land Measure of 1881. Still, it is no doubt an unpleasant fact that the Prime Minister spoke last year,—when the outrages had not ceased,—with much stronger appreciation of the efforts made to amend the Land Act than he spoke this year, when they have almost ceased. Mr. Gladstone may have been right in refusing to attempt this year what he could not achieve except by the sacrifice of all English and Scotch legislation; but he can hardly have been right in altering his tone from one of strong sympathy for the reforms still needed, to one of absolute discouragement—not to say something like depreciation of their importance. It may be urged with plausibility that to have given any promise of amending the Act next year, would have disturbed the settlement of Ireland and made the Irish tenants restless, without a sufficient equivalent of immediate good. But that is no sufficient reason for the marked change of tone from June, 1882, to March, 1883, in relation to the character of the defects in the Land Act now established and verified. English Liberals,—at all events English Liberals of the advanced school,—are eager for the time when the Government shall guide their policy in Ireland without regard either to the panic of English Tories or the menaces of Irish agitators,—when they shall do what they think just and right in Ireland all the more willingly because there is no agrarian crime going on there to enforce it, and none the less willingly because English Tories, like Mr. Chaplin, scream out denunciations on the disastrous sympathy of the Government with pillage and plunder. We go heartily with Mr. Bryce in his very just and thoughtful expression of regret at the attitude of the Government. We cannot help fearing that Lord Hartington and Lord Derby have gained too much ascendancy in the Irish counsels of the Government, and that for the present we have got a Government determined only on not yielding another inch of concession in Ireland, whether justly or unjustly, to a party whom they not naturally regard as pledged to carry Ireland, if possible, into anarchy and chaos. They are quite right to resist plunging Ireland into anarchy and chaos; they are not right in refusing to amend, at the very earliest moment possible, obvious and admitted flaws in the great reform on the efficiency of which so much depends. No doubt, Mr. Parnell's language, in speaking of the new judicial rents as rack-rents which it will not be possible for the Irish farmers to pay, was most reckless and dangerous language—the kind of language of which he almost always interpolates some specimen into otherwise moderate speeches, with the view, as we suppose, of retaining his hold on the extreme party. Mr. Gladstone did nothing but his duty in commenting with the force of his whole eloquence on that reckless and dangerous sentence. But it was no sufficient reason, we submit, for attenuating as he did the expression of his sympathy with the demands of Ulster tenant-farmers, and for making so light of flaws which only last year he still appeared to regard as calling for an early and serious remedy.

Three defects of permanent importance, and one of some practical interest, seem to us to have been made out against the Irish Land Act. One is that the judgment in the case of "Adams v. Dunreath," unquestionably defeated an admitted intention of Parliament in passing that Act. This was, we believe, declared by the great legal authority in Ireland who had followed most carefully the discussions in the Legislature on the subject. The second is that Irish leaseholders have often had the conditions of their leases extorted from them by pressure fully as overwhelming as that by which the conditions of tenancy-at-will were extorted from tenants-at-will under the old law,—and that the clause which was intended to provide for this case in the Irish Land Act has proved so completely inoperative, that we have been told, on the highest authority, that no leases have been broken through under it which could not equally well have been declared void in a Court of Equity. The third is that the purchase clauses have, at present at least, fallen dead. And in addition to these three radical flaws, it has, in our opinion, been conclusively shown that the reductions or other changes ordered in fixing the judicial rents, once established, certainly ought to date back to the first notice of application for the decision of the Land Court, both because those changes ought not to be postponed for the years which may have to elapse before the Court gives its decision on the case, and also because a motive ought not to be artificially supplied to the landlords for postponing a voluntary settlement with their tenants. All these flaws seem to us real and serious flaws, which diminish the efficiency of the Land Act, and the confidence felt by the Irish tenants in its justice. And though necessity has no laws, and it may well be that the Government could not have passed in this Session an amending Act, yet they could have borne their witness afresh to the justice of the demands made, and expressed their desire to see a remedy applied so soon as may be practicable consistently with the legislative exigencies of other portions of the United Kingdom.

It is to be feared that the tone of the Government on Wednesday will alienate to some extent the Ulster Liberals, who constitute the only body of politicians in Ireland at present disposed to support Mr. Gladstone's Government. In the rest of Ireland, what the Home-rulers or Nationalists lose, the Conservatives win; and what the Conservatives lose, the Home-rulers or Nationalists win. But that, after all, though it weakens still further a Government already almost destitute of popular support in Ireland, is not the most serious part of the matter. What we want to see is an English popular opinion springing up which shall insist on applying the best remedy in its power to the evils of Ireland, and which shall not be disposed to wait for Irish clamour before it urges redress. If there is to be, what we all desire to see, a true Union between the two countries, we must get over once for all our idea that the urgency of Irish questions is a nuisance, for which we owe Ireland a sort of grudge. That phase of feeling is utterly inconsistent with a true Union. In a really United Kingdom, that part of the kingdom which is most in need of political reform should receive attention first, even though the same part should absorb attention for several consecutive years. There was much truth in Mr. Parnell's remark on Wednesday that Ireland is so prominent solely because Ireland is comparatively so miserable, and that where England and Scotland can afford to wait, Ireland in matters of any urgency, cannot afford to wait. If Lancashire had suffered even for five or six years together from the cotton famine, as Ireland has been suffering for the last five years, Parliament would hardly have grumbled at being asked, for four, five, or six consecutive years, to give a great part of its time to the troubles of Lancashire. Ought we not to find Liberal opinion in England and Scotland,—we do not mean among the Anglo-Irish, but among the English and Scotch themselves,—perfectly willing to postpone matters of really considerable importance to this Island, so long as matters of still more importance to Ireland continue to claim attention? We do not deny the great inconvenience of such postponements, but we do say that in a genuine Union, the material point is not an equal distribution of attention among the various geographical regions of that Union, but the willingness of the whole to endure great sacrifices for the cure of any vital malady in the parts. We observe with great anxiety not the growing impatience of Irish Obstruction,—that is both healthy and right,—but the growing impatience of Irish questions because they are Irish, even where there is no obstruction. We should have liked to see a strong pressure put on the Government from English quarters, to purge, so far as is possible, the great Land Act of 1881 of all admitted flaws, even at the further sacrifice of Legislative time. We should have liked to see Mr. Gladstone, while rebuking Mr. Parnell in the eloquent language which the Prime Minister actually used, assuring him that, though he would not concede an inch to menace, he would not allow any serious defect in the Land Act that experience had verified, to remain a day longer than he could help; and that in judging of the claims of various measures on the attention of the Legislature, he should be guided by the absolute urgency of the case alone, and not in the least by the desire to treat the demands of different portions of the kingdom with any kind of geographical equality. In the human body, if one limb be mortifying, and other limbs be only aching, we do not insist on attending to the minor aches and pains of the latter out of any notion of abstract justice, but attend first to the greater evil. We do not say that the admitted flaws in the Irish Land Act are so grave that it was absolutely essential to remedy them this year. But we do say that they are serious enough to command more respectful attention than on Wednesday afternoon the Government seemed disposed to give them, and that hope should have been held out that Great Britain, for her own sake,—and not solely for the sake of Ireland,—would insist on remedying them so soon as experience has shown by what means the best and most adequate remedy can be applied.

M. GREVY'S POSITION.

THERE is not much truth, we imagine, in the rumours of M. Grévy's resignation. He may have said in a moment of impatience that if the Chamber did not mend its ways, he must resign; but the step between that and resigning is a long one. M. Grévy likes his position, which is dignified and well paid; the popular dislike of him is absurdly exaggerated by the Reactionaries; and unless it be an error of judgment, he has nothing with which to reproach himself. No failure of the Republic, if there has been any failure, can be traced to his initiative. He has throughout maintained the position which he has said from the first he would maintain. In 1848 he strenuously resisted the adoption of the Presidential Constitution, declaring that a President was not needed, and would be often a danger to the State. In 1875 he was of the same opinion, though he admitted that his ideas were inopportune; and in 1879, when he was himself elected, mainly because he could be trusted not to aggrandise the Presidency, he promised to govern through and with the majority of the Chambers. So far as can be perceived, he has kept that engagement with scrupulous good-faith. A man of decided opinions, of a type infrequent in this country—for our Whigs are rarely bourgeois—he has, of course, expressed them, both in the Council-room and among his friends; but if they have brought him a certain influence, that is no fault of his. In action, he has been strictly "Constitutional," in the English sense, has never rejected any Minister, though under the Constitution he has a right of choice, and has passed over Ministers whom he preferred, to accept others more likely to secure a majority in the Chambers. In the most recent case of all, it is known that he would greatly have preferred M. de Freycinet, but he found that appointment would disgust the Senate—which is afraid of M. de Freycinet's finance—and irritate the Chamber, in which the Gambettists hold the balance of power; and he sent for M. Jules Ferry, though one item at least in that Premier's programme, the extension of the Dependencies of France, must be peculiarly offensive to him. He is distinctly of opinion that dependencies weaken France. Indeed, he has carried his constitutionalism to the verge of weakness, for it is in part due to the knowledge that he would yield, that the Chamber has overthrown and set up Cabinets with such startling and perilous rapidity, till a Premier who has held office for twelve months is credited from that fact alone with special qualities. His persistence in this course, in the face of such a Chamber, argues strong conviction; and though M. Grévy may feel acutely the situation of affairs, he will probably persist to the end, or at all events not resign until he has tried through a Dissolution to ascertain the true mind of the country. He must know better than any other politician that a Dissolution with himself as the only prominent figure left in France is a very different thing from a Dissolution with M. Gambetta still alive, and ready at any moment, if the people desired it, to be Premier, or President, or Dictator.

Whether M. Grévy is well advised in his interpretation of his position is a different matter. It can hardly be doubted that he is incorrect, and we suspect that he has been unwise. The framers of the Constitution intended it to be monarchical, and monarchical in the French sense, which allows the monarch to submit to the Chamber, but does not expect him entirely to efface himself. It certainly never was proposed that the immense powers confided to the President, his right of selecting Ministers outside the Chambers, his right of dismissing them individually, his right of sending Messages, his right of controlling patronage, should never be employed. He must have been intended to employ them as a French King would have done, that is, subject to the advice of a responsible Ministry, but with a strong and visible initiative of his own. That such an initiative is possible under the Constitution is evident from the fact that M. Gambetta wished for the Presidency, nor does any Frenchman doubt that if he had obtained it, he would have made the President the first figure and the most potent individuality in France. M. Grévy, acting, no doubt, in full accord with his avowed political convictions, in full knowledge of which he was elected, has withdrawn the Presidency from political strife to an extent which those who drew up the Constitution did not foresee, and has interpreted its rights upon a theory which, however praiseworthy and self-denying, is English, rather than French. Frenchmen hardly understand rights which are never used, and expect an official to strain rather than to abnegate his powers. The Presidency as an institution is not stronger, but weaker, for M. Grévy, who has nothing like the position either of M. Thiers or of Marshal MacMahon. That is no blame to him, for he has never disguised his dislike of the institution, but it is a result unexpected by the founders of the new Republic.

The variation from the original idea of the Constitution is, we think, past question; and we doubt if that variation, strongly though it may commend itself to English ideas, has been altogether wise. M. Grévy may have reason for his opinion that France would do best without a Presidency; for the Cabinet, if solely responsible for order, would have concentrated public attention upon itself till its overthrow would have been incomparably more difficult. At present, a Cabinet falls as a stone in water, creating only a ripple hardly perceptible beyond an official circle; but if no President existed, a Cabinet in resigning might alarm or delight all France. The resignation would be an event. The Chamber would be held by the country much more responsible for its votes, or if it treated Ministers as clerks would, like the Convention, concentrate upon itself the whole regard of the population. It would be so completely and visibly responsible, that it would be compelled, under the pressure of millions of eyes, to organise itself into consistent parties capable of continuous policy and government. But while the Presidency exists, we fear that it attracts too much attention for its inertness to be unimportant. It shelters Ministry and Chamber too much from the consequences of their acts. The people of France have been long accustomed to individual leadership, and when there is no other leader, no great and predominating individuality, they expect general guidance in crises from the Head of the State. Even if they do not take his opinion, the fact that he has pronounced it gives a kind of solidity to their own. They know when he has spoken what the alternative courses are, and can act with decision, if not wisely. M. Thiers knew this well, and insisted on retaining his right, when affairs grew serious, to go down and address the country from the tribune. The French people do not take their advice from Ministers, whom they seldom understand, and whom they regard as mere employés, very frequently changed, but either from a great individuality, or from the Head of the State, or very often from the Assembly itself, whose decrees have always, from the time of the first Revolution, had an exceptional weight in France. Resistance to them has been wonderfully slight. When none of these speak, Frenchmen are left to themselves in a way which they do not like, and feel as average Englishmen would feel if all great Party leaders suddenly resigned. They have plenty of opinions, and a great deal of obstinacy, but they have not knowledge enough to feel certain how they ought to act, and are painfully aware of the want. We suspect that if M. Grévy, departing for once from his own view of his own obligations, were to address a Message to the Chambers, or even a manifesto to France, stating clearly his own view of what was required, he would find that he had made a vast mass of fluid opinion suddenly solid, and that the Chambers would be subjected to a pressure which would evolve a trustworthy majority. The electors in France make themselves very audible to their representatives, and that with greater rapidity even than in England. Nothing of the kind could be done, of course, while the Ferry Ministry retain power, for any such action would reveal want of confidence in them; but if they fall, M. Grévy might, we think, ask France to aid him in removing the causes of such dangerous instability. The electors, we think, would answer by instructions to their representatives which could not be disobeyed. Certainly, if the President at last resolves on a Dissolution, this will have to be done in some form or other, either by message or manifesto, or the new Chamber may be as chaotic as the old. It may be said that this would be a return to personal government; but an address is not an order, and the question is whether the Constitution, in giving a person such a position, did not expect from him some sort of leadership. The French people, we fear, do expect it; and if they do, it is far better that they should look for it to the impartial head of the State, than to a Minister whom the bureaucracy are anxious to conciliate, or to an aspirant whose first object may be the overthrow of the Constitution. M. Grévy's first mandate is to protect the Republic; and if he cannot protect it while effacing himself, his duty is to modify his view of his obligations, and endeavour personally to obtain the aid of the people. After all, the first test of a Constitution is that it can work; and if this one does not work, as its best friends begin to suspect it does not, any mode of strengthening it is better than total failure, to be followed by the old weary round of half-popular, half-military coup d'état. As to resignation before the people have been consulted, that is the counsel of secret enemies, who hope that France, still further confused, may call upon some Dictator to save her from herself.

THE NEW SOUTH-AFRICAN TROUBLE.

IN most places it is safe to expect the unforeseen, but in South Africa it is safer to await the disagreeable. Within the last thirty years, we never remember a piece of intelligence from South Africa which could give Englishmen unmixed pleasure. Even when the Diamond-fields were discovered, the news was spoiled by the intimation that the natives would be prohibited from digging; while the annexation of the Transvaal, which at first seemed to promise a long régime of peace, to be followed by federation, was accompanied by too many protests to allow any feeling of security. The last news is as disagreeable as any that have preceded it. It is evident that the Convention with the Government of the Transvaal has been broken, in part, it may be, without fault in any responsible statesman; and it is evident also that mending it would involve human suffering, greater than that which the document was intended to prevent. When the British retired from the Transvaal, the Convention which took the place of a Treaty was based upon two leading principles. One was that the Boers should within the Transvaal possess a complete autonomy, subject only to the right of the British Resident, as representative of the Paramount Power, to confer with and advise the Government. His influence, as was acknowledged by both sides in the plain-spoken debates of Tuesday, was to be exclusively "moral." Some politicians ridicule that phrase, but in reality it serves only to formulate in one particular way the state of affairs to which, under other formulas, we are quite habituated in Canada. We can in practice affect Canadian legislation only by moral suasion, careful diplomacy, and, of course, the threat of retreating altogether. As regards external affairs, however, and especially external native affairs, the Convention reserved a veto to the Crown, which it was fully understood would be exercised in native interest. The Boers are not to attack the Zulus on the east of the Transvaal, or the Bechuanas on the west, without the Queen's consent. The Boer Government has now, it may be from helplessness, set this provision at naught. Two Bechuana chiefs, named Montsioa and Mankaroane, during the struggle with the Transvaal took up arms on our behalf, and defeated a rival chief, Moschette, who had declared himself upon the Boer side. The motive of our friends was probably tribal hatred of Moschette quite as much as love of us, just as the motive of the Sikhs in 1857, when they joined Sir John Lawrence, was to avenge their ancient wrongs at the hands of the Delhi Emperors, but still the two Bechuanas did take up arms on our side. The neighbouring Boer farmers resented this, and after the conclusion of the Convention aided Moschette to avenge himself, compelled Montsioa and Mankaroane to sign an illegal treaty ceding their lands, and occupied those lands in force. They have divided them, in fact, into the regular 6,000-acre farms. The British Resident, Mr. Hudson, remonstrated with the Government of Pretoria, and they promised redress, and sent a force to guard the frontier against the Boer raiders. The soldiers of the force, however, joined the invaders, and, as usual when Boers are fighting natives, either committed, or allowed Moschette to commit in their presence, hideous massacres. Further correspondence with Pretoria produced only excuses and evasions, and it is now admitted on all hands that the majority of Boers, both in the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, approve the depredations, and that the Government in Pretoria, though it may be inclined to respect the Convention, is either unable or unwilling to carry out its main provision. The injured Chiefs have appealed through Mr. Hudson directly to Great Britain for protection, and the Government has to decide finally whether or no it will coerce the Transvaal into keeping its engagements.

The Government have decided, as appears from Lord Derby's speech—Mr. Gladstone's will reach us too late for this issue, and Lord Derby is Secretary for the Colonies—not to coerce the Transvaal; and we believe, disagreeable as their decision must have been to themselves, they have decided rightly. If it were absolutely impossible to shelter the Bechuanas without war, if hesitation meant massacre or total spoliation for them, the decision might be wrong, but this is not the case. We can give the two chiefs, with their tribes, ample compensation for their direct losses, new lands, and complete safety within our own dominions; and in inviting them to "trek" southward, we do them no considerable injury. They must concede something to circumstances, like ourselves, and suffer something for their irrepressible proclivity to intertribal fighting. Their personal claims being thus disposed of, the only solid reason for using force against Pretoria is to convince the Boers that we will have the Convention obeyed in future, and the question to be settled by the British people is whether that document is worth first, a war, next, a military occupation of the Transvaal, and, finally, a quarrel with all the Dutchmen in South Africa. Both Lord Derby and Lord Kimberley were painfully plain in their statement of the facts as to the impossibility of peaceful coercion, and as to the dislike of the Dutch population in all the colonies to anything like war. We can defend the Bechuanas as they stand, but only by marching a strong force from the Cape northward, through a thousand miles of roadless territory, without help from the Cape Government, which has categorically refused to assist us, and in the face of incessant attacks from Boer parties of guerillas, who will emerge both from the Orange Free State on our right flank, and from the Transvaal in our front. We cannot run risks in South Africa, and the expedition must be of a strength which will make it cost as much as the Abyssinian war, with the immense aggravation that we cannot retire from Bechuanaland after the campaign. The day we retire, the Boers will set on the Bechuanas again, and the business will recommence. The British Government really cannot waste its people and its treasure in that way, not to protect allied Bechuanas, which might be an adequate object, but to protect them on lands no better than those we can offer them farther south. The Government cannot, in fact, spend £10,000,000 at once and £500,000 a year thereafter to save two small savage tribes from making a march which, if they took it into their heads, they would make without demur. The only alternative is to coerce the Transvaal from the sea, that is, from the eastward, as we did before; and though this is possible, it would involve an equally expensive war, and the military occupation for an indefinite period of the vast Transvaal plateau; while the Boers would "trek" northward, destroying in their path much finer tribes than the Bechuanas. The proposal is unreasonable, and fiercely as the Tories have leapt upon their chance of showing that the Convention was a blunder, they do not venture to bring forward the only alternative. They evade the true point, which is the policy to be pursued, and only reiterate their assertion that Liberal policy was foolish, and their imputation that the reason for the foolishness was want of nerve. We may pass over both accusations without pain, for if there has been foolishness, it has been in respecting Tory policy too much, and if there is a want of nerve, it is produced by a just reluctance to waste English lives and money on an unnecessary undertaking.

While, however, we can heartily support the Government in their main decision, we must strongly press upon the Colonial Office two points. One is, that these Bechuana chiefs must be thoroughly well treated, and have no cause to say they suffered through adherence to the British. A mere grant of money is not sufficient, even if they will accept it. They ought to have a "country" given them, and a good one, even if we have to buy it by the square mile. Nothing else will settle their moral claim as it ought to be settled, and Lord Derby should see to it that the promise is kept to the fullest extent. They will then be no worse off than if the execution of the Convention had been the material impossibility which politically it is. The other point is that the arrival of Mr. Jorissen, the new Transvaal Envoy, should be taken advantage of to transmute the Convention into a Treaty with the Transvaal, enabling us to interfere for Zulus and other natives, whenever they are attacked. Englishmen do not like to see the Queen's Government responsible, even indirectly, for the conduct of a State which, whether from weakness or from willingness, acts so completely on the principle that a "black man has no rights which a white man is bound to respect." The only advantage of the Convention is that it gives the British Government a right to interfere, if slavery is set up in the Transvaal, or if the Boers attack the Zulus; and we can secure both rights as well by Treaty as by Convention. We shall then be able to judge in each case whether we can interfere, and ought to interfere, without the complications introduced by a nominal sovereignty, which may in itself be advantageous, but which the British people in their present mood will not allow the Queen's Government to enforce. It may be—in our judgment, it is—imperative to keep a check upon the Boers, who, whatever their merits as patriots, are as slaveholders among the most cruel of mankind; but in keeping that check, a nominal sovereignty which it costs too much to enforce is only an impediment. We still maintain, as we have always maintained, that if this country were prepared to govern all South Africa as we govern India, in the interest of its whole population, there would be ample justification for the conquest of the Transvaal; but the people are not willing, and the alternative is to define our rights and duties outside of the Colonies by Treaty, and not by the assertion of an indefinite and, as we now see, unworkable claim to obedience. If we have to fight the Dutch of the Transvaal—and we warn them that, if history can be trusted, their conceit, graspingness, and contempt for human rights will drive us to that, one day—let us fight them as enemies, and not as recalcitrant and sullen subjects. It is a bad ending, for the present, to a promising, though over-hasty adventure in a good cause; but it is the only possible one, and the history of South Africa has not ended yet.

THE MID-CHESHIRE ELECTION.

THE election of Mr. Alan Egerton for Mid-Cheshire is a severe party defeat for the Liberals. There is no explanation of it, except that the majority of electors in that county division are still Tories. The Liberals had an attractive candidate, they worked hard, and they polled 218 more votes than at the last election. The Tories, however, exerted themselves, they brought up every man they could influence, they polled 346 more votes, and they won by an increased majority. That is defeat for Liberals, and we hate disguising defeat. It will be said, of course, that the Tory landlords "put on the screw," and that the Liberals were weighted by the Bradlaugh question, and both affirmations are true, but neither of them is of much importance. The landlords would have been defied, if the tenants had been excited, and the principal use to Tories of the Bradlaugh business is that it enables men who are yielding to pressure or to blandishments to plead a conscientious reason. Many electors were, no doubt, annoyed by what they thought religious treason on the part of the Liberals; but many more, who were disposed to vote with their landlords, but had talked Liberalism, pleaded Bradlaugh as an excuse for deserting their colours. The true reason for the defeat is that Liberalism has not penetrated far enough into the purely agricultural villages; that the farmers are still, in the main, on the landlords' side. They scarcely believe in Liberal promises, they are accustomed in their dreams to think what they would do as owners—a most Conservative method of musing—and they retain to a degree which townsmen can hardly appreciate, the old idea that “land” is something more than a subject of commerce, and that a kindly landlord has a sort of moral claim to his tenants' support. The landlords of Cheshire are rich, of old standing, and kindly, and the farmers feel as if there were something of ingratitude and frowardness in refusing requests for assistance so urgently pressed upon them. We all assume in London that an agent's letter is a threat, but very often it is only a reminder of the landlord's wish which the tenant is quite happy to receive. The farmers regard independent voting as a sort of rebellion, and they are not yet interested enough to rebel; more especially as, living in a grazing county, they have escaped any sharp pinch of distress. They still look upon themselves and the landlords as all in one boat, and do not yet see that if this is so, the landlords may as well follow them as they follow the landlords. As to Mr. Egerton's failures as a speechmaker, they care nothing about them at all. He will vote straight, and the tendency of the country-side is to distrust intellectual capacity, and think that ability, or at all events quickness of thought, is, as George Eliot put it, “slightly diabolic.” Townspeople are like that, but not men properly sobered down by living with a healthy consciousness on their minds that they have all the cows to calve, and Thornaby Waste to plough.

There is no remedy, except more pains, and more readiness to pay the expenses of tenant-farmer candidates. The Liberals, till very lately, have neglected the farmers, ever since the Reform Bill, and have to overcome the irritated feeling of two generations; and they can only overcome it by carrying their doctrines into the villages, through men whom the farmers and rural artisans and agricultural labourers will understand. It is of no use to send sharp townfolk to talk to men who think that if a lecturer does not know bearded wheat from barley, he is of necessity quite a fool, and probably a little bit of a rogue. It takes a countryman to talk to countrymen, and it is through talking, through “the foolishness of preaching,” that the work, as yet hardly commenced, has still to be accomplished. More sympathy must be established, before the Liberal leaders can be fully understood; and that sympathy can only be created by patient expositions, offered by men who really comprehend, or rather feel, where the gaps and barriers in the agricultural mind are to be found. What is the use of a lecturer, be he never so eloquent, who tells farmers they would do better if they paid their rent quarterly, and so could leave at short notice? It is vain to trust so exclusively as the Liberals do to the coming suffrage. Half the electors to be enfranchised regard politics from a stand-point which Mr. Smith, for instance, the new Member for Liverpool, who delivered an admirable speech for Mr. Latham, would never even perceive, and the other half would be immensely influenced by old reverence for the owners of the soil. The householders will need instruction as much as the farmers, and the Liberals in country districts do not give it, or rather give it in an unsympathising and “superior” way, which, to the farmers' minds, is inexpressibly irritating. “Too clever by half,” is the most crushing sentence which, in some districts of wet meadows, can be cast upon a speech.

The Government will not, we trust, relax their determination to bring forward a fair Compensation Bill, which is heartily desired, and which Tories will not steadily resist. That is mere justice, and ought not to be delayed by any consideration that no Bill will greatly affect agricultural votes. The defeat, however, does greatly increase their difficulties, because it shows that in the event of a dissolution the counties will still give a majority to the Conservative side. Had the election gone the other way, the Peers would have been afraid of an appeal to the country, which might have ended in the complete, though temporary, extinction of the Tory Party in the House of Commons. As it is, they will think that by forcing a dissolution before the Reform Bill is brought in, they cannot injure their party much, and may even improve its chances of regaining power.

THE BLASPHEMY CONTROVERSY.

THE impressive letters which we publish from Mr. Hansard and another correspondent on the recent sentence passed upon Mr. Foote and his colleagues in the Freethinker, will shed much light on the feeling of those who think that scurrilous and indecent attacks on the deep religious convictions of others ought to be punished, though they reject with indignation the notion that the most absolutely negative opinions or expressions of opinion should render those who hold them liable to prosecution. We have never denied, we have indeed directly maintained, that some penalty should be imposed for religious or irreligious lampoons,—especially if in any sense forced on the attention of the public; and most of all we would say, if forced on the attention of the young, who look at them without any ability to perceive the real significance of the matter, but with minds in a condition to be easily prepossessed by any plausibility, false or true, that catches their fancy. But the point to which we have chiefly desired to draw attention is the scale of punishment inflicted. A man kicks his wife, seriously injuring her, and gets a sentence of three months; while a coarse, ill-educated man, who probably saw little more that was culpable in his naturally coarse ridicule of the Christian faith than refined thinkers whom we all know must have felt culpable in their own banter of the doctrine of the Trinity, gets a year's imprisonment for his offence. Our contention is this,—not that coarse, irreligious lampoons intended to preoccupy superficial minds with what is strictly and absolutely an irrelevant, though a very startling, view of the supposed incredibility of the Christian faith, are not very serious evils, and evils which the law would be quite right in attempting to prevent; but, first, that the actual law directs its penalties, if not solely to the opinions expressed, at least as much to these as to the indecent form in which they are expressed; and next, that, culpable as all this indecency is, it is culpable in a minor degree in the vulgar and ill-educated, being culpable, indeed, exactly in proportion to the culture of those who originate it. It ought to be punished, therefore, in the case of coarse persons with comparative leniency, and not with that manifestation of profound indignation which such indecency, if committed by the class who legislate and administer the law, would naturally excite. If we once admit that Mr. Foote ought not to have been liable to any prosecution at all for holding and publishing his atheism,—and that is, we may say, a view on which practically we are all agreed,—the question of what is indecent ridicule in the mode of publishing it becomes a very different one. We must then ask ourselves how far it is wise or right to inflict severe punishments for bad-taste and bad-feeling on people who could often hardly be expected to show good-taste and good-feeling. Is it natural to expect that in such a class of life the wrong in grossly attacking other persons' religion should be (say) as clear to the conscience, as the wrong in assaulting and beating their persons? If not, is it wise,—can it be likely to end in anything but an increased feeling of soreness against the religion attacked,—to punish more severely for blasphemous indecency than for a brutal attack on the person? We must not consider these things solely from the educational point of view, though we ought to consider them also from that point of view. We must remember that the impression of vindictiveness,—vindictiveness on the part of the State because it is Christian,—is made on coarse unbelievers, by punishing them more severely for attacking grossly the faith of Christians than we punish them for attacking their persons. For our part, we would punish all gross outrages on serious and honest convictions, but we would punish them leniently, at least in the case of people who could hardly be expected to know what the real gravity of such offences is. Once admit, as we must admit, that it is not the atheism which ought to be punished, but the injuriousness and scurrilousness of the way in which the atheism is expressed, and we cannot resist the conclusion that severe punishments for scurrilousness and injuriousness ought only to be inflicted on those who are well able to appreciate how deeply these qualities may wound, and how terrible is the scar they may leave on many imaginations. It is quite true, of course, as Mr. Hansard hints, that children, seeing these obscene libels in shop-windows, and tempted to laugh over them, may be diverted from the path of morality altogether, and drawn into a thoroughly vicious circle of companions, by the contagion of such libels. But can we reasonably suppose a sincere atheist,—and we are bound to consider Mr. Foote a sincere atheist, till we have proof of the contrary,—holding that the eradication of Christian belief, even by coarse ridicule, is likely to have the frightful moral consequences which we know it to have? Would not such an atheist almost necessarily hold that he had done nothing but good by clearing a child's mind of gross superstitions? If we punish him for holding that, do we not really punish him for thinking Christianity a gross superstition, quite as much as for coarsely expressing his thought? We sympathise to the fullest extent in Mr. Hansard's horror and dismay at the depraving effect of these coarse attacks on our religion, but, so far as we can see, the policy open to the Legislature is a choice of grave evils. If coarse ridicule of our religion is to be severely punished, and coarse ridicule of other religions is not to be severely punished, or not punished at all, then the crime really punished is the ridicule of Christianity, though it is permissible to aim ridicule at other faiths or unfaiths. And that will and must produce the natural consequence of all persecution, a reaction in favour of the doubter's scoff. If, on the other hand, all coarse attacks on anybody's faith are to be punished equally, it is clear that people like Mr. Foote should only be punished as we would punish corresponding attacks on Mahomedanism or Mormonism. And that, we need hardly say, would be very leniently. Assume for a moment that the Freethinker had published an equally gross attack on Mahomedanism, and just imagine the outcry that would have been raised, if he had been imprisoned for a year for that attack. The dilemma is a very difficult one. But of this we are sure,—that the most lenient punishments for offences of this kind against the sensitiveness of religious feeling, are at once the most just and the most likely to educate public feeling to a sense of disgust at such attacks. It is simply impossible for Christians to measure fairly the offence committed by atheists when they make gross attacks on the Christian religion, unless they do it in the spirit manifested by their Master when he prayed for forgiveness for those who "know not what they do."

THE RESCUE OF EPPING FOREST.

MR. BRYCE is to be congratulated on his first Parliamentary appearance in the character of Chairman of the Commons Preservation Society. The Bill to make a Railway from Chingford to High Beech had one characteristic which made its rejection at once specially uncertain and specially important. It was possible to support it on a genuine, though mistaken, public ground. Here is a beautiful tract of country, bought with great liberality by the Corporation of London, and dedicated for ever to the enjoyment of the people. But the finest part of this possession is virtually inaccessible to many of those to whose benefit it has been devoted. The railway stops at Chingford, and High Beech is some way from Chingford. It is not too far, indeed, for moderate walkers; but then, a large part of the visitors to Epping Forest are not even moderate walkers. The East-end excursionists include many old people, many weak women, and, still more, small children. To tell any of these to walk from Chingford to High Beech is like telling them to walk to the Land's End. They look to the Great Eastern Railway as their only friend in the matter, and if this beneficent Company is forbidden to carry them whither they would go, they must stay at that point of the Forest, whatever it be, to which it at present affords them access. Consequently, to make a railway from Chingford to High Beech is simply to extend the admirable policy which gave Epping Forest to the public. The Corporation and the Great Eastern Railway are the joint benefactors of East London. The one provides the ground wherein a million or so of people may enjoy themselves, the other provides the means of carriage without which a large part of this million cannot reach the scene of its enjoyment.

The answer to this plausible way of putting the case is double-shot. First, we deny that if people are to be taken to High Beech by the Great Eastern Railway, they need be taken by the route proposed in the Bill which was rejected on Monday. Next, we deny that there is any need to take them there at all. The line which the Company asked leave to make separated some 200 acres of the Forest from the remainder. Why could not it have been taken round instead of across these 200 acres, so as not to meddle with the Forest in any way? It would be quite possible to make a railway from Chingford to very near High Beech without making any encroachment upon the Forest, and if this had been proposed, one of the great arguments against the Bill actually brought forward would have gone for nothing. The Forest itself would have been left uninjured, and yet the Great Eastern Company would not have been checked in this work of mercy. All that would have been necessary was that the line should describe a moderate circuit, instead of joining the two places by a straight line. It would have been equally easy to take this circuit as to go more directly, since the compulsory powers conferred by an Act of Parliament override all opposition on the part of landowners. But though equally easy, it would not have been equally cheap. It is assumed that the landowner suffers by having his land taken from him; consequently, he is well paid for what he loses. But until lately, no one has supposed that the public can suffer anything by having its land taken away; consequently, no one proposes that the public shall be compensated. If a law were passed declaring that no common land shall be bought by a railway company except at the best price that has been paid for the private land in the neighbourhood, there would no longer be any inducement to take common land rather than private land. It is not denied that all but one of the benefits which are claimed for the Chingford and High Beech Railway Bill could be equally obtained by carrying the line outside the Forest, instead of within it. Weak-kneed excursionists could be carried to the goal they now vainly sigh for; children could gambol amid the finest scenery of the Forest; and their parents could watch them at their ease from the benches in front of the public-house. The only difference would be that the profits of the Great Eastern Company would be smaller, by reason of having paid the full price for the land they wanted, instead of getting it for next to nothing from the public. This does not seem to us a sufficient reason for severing 200 acres from the Forest, and disfiguring the landscape by the usual alternation of embankment and viaduct.

We go farther than this, however, and deny altogether that there is any need for such a railway at all. Of course, if the railway were made, abundance of people would be found to travel by it. High Beech would take its turn with the other stations near the Forest; indeed, being more famous, and having a more picturesque name, it would probably prove the most attractive of them all. But to this result there would be one fatal objection. It would destroy the pleasure of a minority, without really increasing the pleasure of the majority. Besides the crowds of excursionists who frequent the Forest, there are a good many working-men—botanists, entomologists, lovers of scenery, and the like—to whom it is of the utmost moment that the seclusion of the Forest should not be altogether destroyed. It has been greatly impaired by the recent changes which have made the Forest more accessible, but there are still parts of it in which rare plants and insects may still be sought by members of field clubs, and the working-man who knows the value of solitude can still leave the crowd behind, and find himself, for a time at least, alone with Nature. If railways are carried any further into the Forest, the hundreds and thousands of the London Poor who at present find keen enjoyment in some one of these ways, would be entirely debarred from such enjoyment in the future. This is not a question of the enjoyment of the few giving way to the enjoyment of the many. The many have their share of pleasure already, and the opening of a railway to High Beech would simply give them another place in which they could take exactly the same pleasure as they can now take elsewhere. The great mass of London excursionists hang about the neighbourhood of the station at which they are landed. What they want is some open space where the young may play at cricket if they are athletic, or at kiss-in-the-ring if they are social, where the children can run about without fear of being lost, where the old may sit and look on, and where all may be within easy reach of refreshment, and run no risk of losing their train back. If a railway is made to High Beech, this is what will go on there, just as it now goes on at half-a-dozen other stations in the same district. We do not for a moment grudge these harmless pleasures to those who enjoy them, but we do protest against their being multiplied at the cost of another class, equally poor, and far more worthy of sympathy. With the Forest left as it is, it will be enjoyed, let us say, by 200,000 poor in one way, and by 2,000 poor in another way. If the Forest is made more accessible, it will be enjoyed neither more nor less than it is now by the 200,000, and not at all by the 2,000. Is that a result which any reasonable man can deliberately wish to bring about?

The case against the Braithwaite and Buttermere Railway is, of course, much stronger than the case against the Chingford and High Beech Railway, because the former line does not pretend, as the latter does, to consider the public pleasure. It is the common-place story of destroying what, if let alone, will minister delight to generations of Englishmen so long as the world lasts, in the interest of some traders who want to make larger gains. Let them increase their gains, by all means, only we prefer that they should increase them at the cost of their rivals or their customers, not at that of the nation. If, by some lukewarmness or oversight, the Bill should ever reach the Commons, we hope that it will meet the same fate as that which Mr. Bryce dealt out to the Great Eastern Bill on Monday afternoon.

QUEEN VICTORIA AS GODDESS.

THE Athenæum mentions casually a striking incident which is stated to have recently occurred in Orissa, and which would have broken Lord Beaconsfield's heart. Sergeant Atkinson, presumably an Inspector of Roads, or, it may be, police officer, reports to the Indian Spectator, a Native paper published in English, that a tribe in Orissa has adopted Queen Victoria as its deity. We have no details either as to worship or creed, though they will, no doubt, be speedily obtained; but the story is prima facie probable. A Sergeant would never have invented such an incident, so entirely outside his experience, and such an elevation for the Queen is in entire accordance with all that is known of the operation of religious feeling among the lower castes and wilder tribes of the Indian Provinces. It is impossible to read the wonderfully suggestive and instructive "Essays" recently published by Sir Alfred Lyall—essays which want nothing but length and dryness to place their author in the front rank of Asiatic authorities—without perceiving that Brahmanism, so far from having ossified itself, is still a living and changing creed, that it constantly creates for itself or assimilates new objects of worship, fresh deities, and even in rare but most important cases, new philosophies. The regular process is for a philosopher, or chief of a tribe, or otherwise influential person, to recognise in some system of thought, or person, or rare object—which latter may vary from an épergne to an oddly-shaped rock or strangely placed clump of trees—either a fitting symbol of the universal and divine, or an embodiment of it, or an earthly manifestation of some subordinate but powerful deity, and gradually belief, or worship, or reverence accretes to the idea, or person, or thing, till he or it becomes an object of worship, and a centre of faith, it may be to scores of thousands. Chaitanya, founder of the Vaishnavas, is revered by millions. If the idea spreads, or the person is believed to work wonders, or miracles are reported of the thing, the circle of worshippers extends, the worship becomes a cult, with separate ceremonial and ritual; and behold a new caste, with a new faith, fully born. If the new force is locally considerable, Brahmanism, as represented by local priests, or occasionally by teachers of wider influence, steps in, and either denounces the new teaching as utterly evil—in which case every charge the foul imagination of Asia can invent is hurled at its votaries—or, much more frequently, adopts the idea, person, or thing, declares them all sacred, gives them Brahmanical names, and, so to speak, consecrates the whole affair, which thenceforward is an integral part of Hindooism, and develops till the teacher is considered not only inspired, but a source of inspiration, or the person is worshipped as an avatar, or the thing becomes a sacred idol:—

"Of the numerous local gods known to have been living men, by far the greater portion derive from the ordinary canonisation of holy personages. This system of canonising has grown out of the world-wide sentiment that rigid asceticism and piety combined with implicit faith gradually develop a miraculous faculty. The saint or hermit may have deeper motives—the triumph of the spirit over corrupt matter, of virtue over vanity and lust, or the self-purification required of mediæval magicians and mystical alchemists before they could deal with the great secrets of Nature; but the popular belief is that his relentless austerity extorts thaumaturgic power from reluctant gods. And of him who works miracles do they say in India, as in Samaria they said of Simon Magnus,—'This man is the great power of God;' wherefore after death (if not in life) he is honoured as divine indeed. Now the word miracle must not be understood in our sense of an interposition to alter unvarying natural laws, for in India no such laws have been definitely ascertained; it means only something that passes an ordinary man's understanding, authenticated and enlarged by vague and vulgar report. And the exhibition of marvellous devotion or contempt for what is valued by the world stimulates inventive credulity. He who does such things is sure to be credited with miracles, probably during his life, assuredly after his death. When such an one dies, his body is not burnt, but buried; a disciple or relative of the saint establishes himself over the tomb as steward of the mysteries and receiver of the temporalities; vows are paid, sacrifice is made, a saint's day is added to the local calendar, and the future success of the shrine depends upon some lucky hit in the way of prophecy or fulfilment of prayers. The number of shrines thus raised in Berar alone to these anchorites and persons deceased in the odour of sanctity is large, and it is constantly increasing. Some of them have already attained the rank of temples, they are richly endowed, and collect great crowds at the yearly pilgrim gatherings, like the tombs of celebrated Christian martyrs in the Middle Ages. But although the shrines of a Ilinda ascetic and of St. Thomas of Canterbury may have acquired fame among the vulgar and ignorant by precisely the same attribute—their reputation for miraculous efficacy—yet the only point of resemblance between the two cases is this common inference from eminent sanctity in the world to wonder-working power in the grave. For whereas the great Catholic Church never allowed the lowest English peasant to regard St. Thomas or St. Edmund as anything higher than glorified intercessors, with a sort of delegated miraculous power, the Indian prophet or devotee does by the patronage of the Brahman rise gradually in the hierarchy of supernatural beings, until his human origin fades and disappears completely in the haze of tradition, and he takes rank as a god."

Sir Alfred Lyall declares that he could, if required, give minute details of such elevations, and this not of persons only, but of things; and he proceeds to defend a theory which we cannot now examine,—that this may have been the origin of much of the Hindoo polytheism, which in its wildness and impossibility so puzzles those who know that behind Hindooism lives a vast and subtle philosophy worthy the study of the keenest minds. What is certain is that the process goes on, that the Indian people, with their hunger for belief and reverence, are constantly begetting new gods, and that Brahmanism, with its rooted notion that bhakti (faith) is in itself a holy condition of mind apart from the object of faith, and its theory that anything may be an embodiment of the Universal Spirit, lends its sanction to the process, and in lending it sends crowds, it may be millions, hunting for what of benefit or good of any kind may be derivable from the new worship. It is a logical induction from the Brahman faith, strange as it may seem, that creed, colour, or history is no bar to the acceptance of the person or thing thus deified. If the Universal Spirit, or, far below him, Vishnu or Siva, chooses to take an ugly stone or a silver dish for symbol, or to embody himself in a negro or a white man, there is no law of limitation upon his actions. The white man, however unaccountable, or barbaric, or unclean, was still created. The French General Raymond was worshipped as a god, though he probably believed nothing; so was General Nicholson, though he was, we have heard, of the strictest sect of Irish Orangemen; so was a military philanthropist, whose name we are ashamed to have forgotten, who devoted his life to a wild tribe in the Bengalee Himalayas; and so also may be the Queen. As to things, the instances of their elevation are endless. Sir A. Lyall knew of scores of shrines reared over stones and among sacred copses, and himself "knew a Hindu officer, of great shrewdness and very fair education, who devoted several hours daily to the elaborate worship of five round pebbles, which he had appointed to be his symbol of Omnipotence. Although his general belief was in one all-pervading Divinity, he must have something symbolic to handle and address." There is a silver dish, an épergne, which is going through the process at this moment. It was presented to a Goorkha regiment by Queen Victoria, and is already such an object of reverence that it has a voluntary guard, that officers dismount as it passes, and that it is as certain as anything human can be that, while it is on the ground, its Goorkha devotees—all Hindoos to the bone—will die before they retreat without it. Grant it victory in a skirmish or two, and the épergne will be a true object of worship, more than a symbol, possibly with a temple raised above it, and an admission from regular priests that in it resides some portion of the power of the Supreme.

The adoption of Queen Victoria into a system like this is so natural, that we wonder it has never occurred before. She is just the material to make a goddess of; a living being, of far-reaching power, invisible, yet present throughout India; a worker, in native eyes, of many wonders; and on the whole beneficent, though that, indeed, to the devotees of Smallpox and Cholera, both of which have worshippers, and the first very many, would make but little difference. God creates, and God crushes also, in the Hindoo mind. There is no reason in the world, on the Brahmanical theory, why the Universal should not express himself in Queen Victoria, or why Vishnu or Siva, or better still, Saraswuti, the mighty goddess of wisdom and knowledge, should not express himself or herself in her. Either deity is unlimited, if not unconditioned, and granting the acceptance of the faith, which is a question mainly of the number of its votaries, temples may yet rise over Orissa, or farther, in which worship will be paid to Queen Victoria, and her figure will be hung with jewels and sacred flowers, and thousands will bow, and march, and dance in an ecstasy of adoration, and hundreds of thousands, as they pay or receive coin, will put it to their foreheads, because it bears the effigy of the new goddess. Little of all this will probably happen, because the tribe which has adopted this cult is small, because Orissa is traversed incessantly by men who have lived in Calcutta, where scepticism is in the air—there are, if we recollect rightly, 50,000 men from Orissa in Calcutta, who return home as faithfully as Scotchmen—and because the English officials, fearing ridicule, will stamp out the new faith, if they can. But there is absolutely no impossibility in its spread, and if it spread, the consequences would be incalculable. The adhesion of a single province of India to the Queen in any way which made disloyalty or disobedience impossible would change all the conditions of government there, and rest the Empire, now so insecure, on a basis of granite. It will not happen, though a thing much greater, the formal adoption of Christianity by the Khalsa, the Sikh “children of the sugar and the sword,” was within an ace of happening, would, as we believe, have happened, but for Lord Canning’s repugnance; but that there should be even a dim possibility of it is an incident in Indian history worth more than the Athenæum’s quiet reference, or our own poor effort to explain.

We suppose some official note of the occurrence will one day reach the Queen, and we wonder how she will feel. It must be a curious sensation to know that in one corner of the world you are actually worshipped by men and women you never saw, or possibly heard of,—held to be divine, to be something which, whether through the presence of a deity incarnate in you, or any other way, is unmistakably above humanity. There must be a strange humility generated by that. The Roman Emperors could have told us something of it, for though the cultus of the Emperor was not precisely worship, it approached it very closely, was held by loyal Christians to be entirely forbidden, as the worship of a false Deity, and must in a mind like that of Marcus Aurelius have developed some strange thoughts. Visible incense can hardly go up in a thousand cities before one’s own image without exciting thought, and Aurelius could have told us so clearly what his thoughts were. Nicholson’s thoughts we know. He was profoundly irritated at being made a deity, and, with his usual “unconstitutionality,” he ordered his worshippers severe whippings, which were inflicted, and which profoundly confirmed their faith. They would have made a faithful guard for him in that final charge into Delhi, and, perhaps, preserved his life; but the Orangeman could not away with the blasphemy, or the soldier bear the touch of ridicule involved. Perhaps Queen Victoria will be angry, too, though she will hardly order whippings for the poor Ooreyas; but still, even in a reign like hers, it may hereafter be recorded, as a most weird incident, that far down in a forgotten sea-coast province of India, where, also within her reign, millions of persons perished of hunger, a wild tribe, struck in some unknown way by the separateness of her personality, resolved that, of all they knew, she was the most probable depository of the breath of the Universal Spirit, and the fittest object for their worship. Some day, perhaps, even English electors, hearing of such things, will wake to a dim apprehension that all mankind is not alike, that humanity is not enclosed in a corner of the smallest continent, and that between them and the Indian there is still some kind of gulf.

STARTLING POETRY.

MR. BROWNING might have taken as a motto for his work as a poet one of Cardinal Newman’s striking verses:—

“Can Science bear us
To the hid springs
Of human things?
Why may not dream,
Or thought’s day-gleam,
Startle, yet cheer us?”

He never publishes a volume in which there is not some protest against the notion that Science can bear us to the hid springs of human things. He never publishes a volume without pressing and even urging on us that dreams and thought’s day-gleams may startle, yet cheer us. And almost all he does for us is done by the startling method. He loves to awaken the sleep of the intellect, the sleep of the affections, the sleep of the spirit, by some sudden shock to which we respond by a sort of jump. His very rhymes are often carefully designed to electrify, as we shall soon see; but his constructions are still more so,—indeed, he may be said to have anticipated Wagner in the use of discords, if that were really the secret in the art of the great musician who has lately left us,—a matter on which the present writer is profoundly incompetent to pass any judgment. Abruptness is Mr. Browning’s secret. Take the prefatory poem to his new volume of “Jocoseria,” just published by Smith and Elder, a poem which is the nearest thing to a lyric that the book contains, and nevertheless, though a lyric, is a succession of slight shocks:—

“Wanting is—what?
Summer redundant,
Blueness abundant,
—Where is the spot?
Beamy the world, yet a blank all the same,
—Framework which waits for a picture to frame:
What of the leafage, what of the flower?
Roses embowering with nought they embower!
Come then, complete incompleteness, O come,
Pant through the blueness, perfect the summer!
Breathe but one breath
Rose-beauty above,
And all that was death
Grows life, grows love, Grows love!”

How abruptly the opening interrogation breaks upon us. How enigmatic the reply;—we do not mean that its drift is not soon enough apprehended, but that on the first blush the reply seems to be explaining not the essence of the state of want, but the essence of those conditions which ought most to satisfy want. And then, how curiously elliptic is the question,—“Where is the spot?” Of course, what Mr. Browning means is something of this sort,—“Where is the spot where the redundant summer and the abundant blueness find their way into the soul so as to satisfy it?” But that is carrying ellipsis to the point of an electric shock, for it is startling merely to feel how much of the poet’s meaning we are expected to gather from his hints, and supply in part from our own resources. Then the adjective “beamy,” which is chosen to describe the world, is unquestionably an odd one for the purpose, and chosen, as we should say, for the jerk it administers to the imagination. Nothing, on the whole, could express the sense of a blank somewhere, which the poet wants to express, better than these sudden little tugs and jerks at the reader’s mind. But then, again, when he wants to indicate what would best fill in the blank, and give a rounded completion to the desolate framework, one is startled afresh to find that the new power which is to give us this, and which is “to complete incompleteness,” is expected to “pant through the blueness,” and so to “perfect the summer.” Could anything that “panted” really “complete incompleteness”? The phrase suggests a locomotive rather than a divine presence. That which breathes a breath of rose-beauty, surely ought not to pant. But Mr. Browning loves spasm, loves successive shocks of thought or feeling, and can hardly deny himself the satisfaction of thinking that even the spirit of perfect love and harmony is perpetually startling this dull world by galvanising it with vivid spasms of thought and feeling, such as he himself has the skill to administer.

So it is with almost every remarkable poem in Mr. Browning’s new volume. The rhythm, the rhyme, the thought, the feeling are all chosen to strike sparks out of the reader’s mind, as the steel strikes sparks out of a flint; and the result naturally is that the reader feels towards Mr. Browning somewhat as a bit of flint might feel which has served this purpose to a fragment of steel,—a little sore and a little fractured. “Donald,” for example, is a vivid and striking comment on the heartlessness which is sometimes bred by what is called “sport.” A Scotch sportsman, who meets a noble red-deer on the edge of a precipice, where there is not room for either to pass the other, lies down, and the stag, tamed by the sense of danger, instead of disputing the pass, steps daintily over him, so as not to hurt him. The sportsman, however, cannot bear to lose the chance, seizes the stag’s hind feet, and stabs him in the belly, whereupon the end of the story is told thus:—

“I shall dare to place myself by God
Who scanned—for He does—each feature
Of the face thrown up in appeal to Him
By the agonising creature.

Nay, I hear plain words : ' Thy gift brings this !'
 Up he sprang, back he staggered,
 Over he fell, and with him our friend
 —At following game no laggard.

Yet he was not dead when they picked next day
 From the gully's depth the wreck of him ;
 His fall had been stayed by the stag beneath,
 Who cushioned and saved the neck of him.

But the rest of his body—why, doctors said,
 Whatever could break was broken ;
 Legs, arms, ribs, all of him looked like a toast
 In a tumbler of port-wine soaked.

' That your life is left you, thank the stag !'
 Said they, when—the slow cure ended—
 They opened the hospital-door, and thence —Strapped, spliced, main fractures mended,

And minor damage left wisely alone—
 Like an old shoe clouted and cobbled,
 Out—what went in a Goliath well-nigh—
 Some half of a David hobbled.

' You must ask an alms from house to house :
 Sell the stag's head for a bracket,
 With its grand twelve tines—I'd buy it myself—
 And use the skin for a jacket !'

He was wiser, made both head and hide
 His win-penny : hands and knees on,
 Would manage to crawl—poor crab—by the roads
 In the misty stalking-season.

And if he discovered a bothy like this,
 Why, harvest was sure : folks listened.
 He told his tale to the lovers of Sport :
 Lips twitched, cheeks glowed, eyes glistened.

And when he had come to the close, and spread
 His spoils for the gazers' wonder,
 With ' Gentlemen, here's the skull of the stag
 I was over, thank God, not under !'—

The company broke out in applause ;
 ' By Jingo, a lucky cripple !
 Have a munch of grouse and a hunk of bread,
 And a tug, besides, at our tippie !'

And ' There's my pay for your pluck !' cried This,
 ' And mine for your jolly story !'
 Cried That, while ' Tother—but he was drunk—
 Hiccapped ' A tramp, a Tory !'

I hope I gave twice as much as the rest ;
 For, as Homer would say, ' within grate
 Though teeth kept tongue, ' my whole soul growled
 ' Rightly rewarded,—Ingrate !' "

There is a fine picture here, and a most effective succession of shocks given to the humaner feelings which lie deep beneath those of the mere sportsman,—indeed, these verses constitute a series of explosions of percussion-caps, rather than the sheet-lightning of a poem. How sharply the rhymes go popping off in your head, "wreck of him," "neck of him,"—"cobbled," "hobbled,"—"knees-on," "season,"—"cripple," "tippie,"—and sharpest click of all, "within grate" and "ingrate." How smartly Mr. Browning makes your limbs tingle with the sensations of the "spliced" and "cobbled" body, which maimed itself for life through the man's absolute incapacity to sympathise as truly with the situation of the stag, as the stag had sympathised with his situation. How vivaciously he paints the superficial admiration of the sporting party for Donald's cruel and dangerous feat. And how brightly his own denunciation of Donald's heartlessness flames out at the close, in contrast with the apparent generosity of his double alms. But, for all that, these verses are a succession of galvanic discharges, by which your attention is made to thrill and vibrate in vivid flickers, rather than to rise into sustained and harmonised imaginative vision. It is just the same with "Solomon and Balkis;" and you know it must be just the same the moment you see that Balkis (the name given to the Queen of Sheba) is made to rhyme first to "talk is," and then later on to "small kiss." The gist of the conversation between the Queen and Solomon, which at times certainly becomes obscure as well as abrupt, is that Solomon owns to caring much more for the praise of his visitors than for their wisdom; and that Balkis owns to caring much more for being made love to, than for having her difficult questions duly answered. But the series of surprises which are exploded on us by the conversation itself, by the language used, and by the rhymes which signalise this quaint poem, are hardly welded together into a general effect as striking as in the case of "Donald." One is hardly prepared for Solomon addressing his fair guest as "You cat, you!" even though she had startled him into owning the truth concerning his own vanity by springing upon him unexpectedly "the truth-compelling name;" and the retort by which he compels her to own to feelings not over modest, though it ends the poem in an epigrammatic fashion, leaves on the imagination both a more cynical and a more fragmentary effect than is usual even with Mr. Browning in his tartest mood.

The principal poem in the book, "Jochanan Hakkadosh," is a Rabbinical legend of a great Rabbi whose uncompleted life his admiring brethren eke out to a year beyond the natural hour of death, by a gift of a quarter of a year each out of their own terms of life, a gift proceeding from four separate disciples,—one given that he may gain fresh insight as a lover, one as a warrior, one as a poet, and one as a statesman. The hope is that the first quarter is to yield the Rabbi some grand lesson as to the true mode of loving; the second, some noble teaching as to the art of the warrior; the third, some gleam of insight as to the inspiration of the poet; and the last, some happy glimpse of the deepest secret of the statesman. Jochanan lives through his year and disappoints all his disciples, finding nothing but vanity and vexation of spirit in each separate sphere of life. But then, when his life ought to close, he lives on a preternatural or supernatural three months, during which he appears to have soared beyond the body altogether; and the fruit of this last Heaven-sent gift is that he finds the vision of perfect bliss at last, and learns that it is the life of earth which hides from man the true reconciliation of his faith and his doubt, the true harmony of man's spiritual aspirations with his disillusionising experience:—

"O eyes of mine,
 Freed now of imperfection, ye avail
 To see the whole sight, nor may uncombine
 Henceforth what, erst divided, caused you quail—
 So huge the chasm between the false and true,
 The dream and the reality! All hail,
 Day of my soul's deliverance—day the new,
 The never-ending! What though every shape
 Whereon I wreaked my yearning to pursue
 Even to success each semblance of escape
 From my own bounded self to some all-fair
 All-wise external fancy, proved a rape
 Like that old giant's, feigned of fools—on air,
 Not solid flesh? How otherwise? To love—
 That lesson was to learn not here—but there—
 On earth, not here! 'T is there we learn,—there prove
 Our parts upon the stuff we needs must spoil,
 Striving at mastery, there bend above
 The spoiled clay potters, many a year of toil
 Attests the potter tried his hand upon,
 Till sudden he arose, wiped free from soil
 His hand, cried 'So much for attempt—anon
 Performance! Taught to mould the living vase,
 What matter the cracked pitchers dead and gone?'
 Could I impart and could thy mind embrace
 The secret, Tsaddik! 'Secret none to me!'
 Quoth Tsaddik, as the glory on the face
 Of Jochanan was quenched. 'The truth I see
 Of what that excellence of Judah wrote, Doughty Halaphta. This a case must be
 Wherein, though the last breath have passed the throat,
 So that "The man is dead" we may pronounce,
 Yet is the Ruach—(thus do we denote
 The imparted Spirit)—in no haste to bounce
 From its entrusted Body,—some three days
 Lingers ere it relinquish to the pounce
 Of hawk-clawed Death his victim. Further says
 Halaphta, "Instances have been, and yet
 Again may be, when saints, whose earthly ways Tend to perfection, very nearly get
 To heaven while still on earth; and, as a fine
 Interval shows where waters pure have met
 Waves brackish, in a mixture, sweet with brine,
 That's neither sea nor river, but a taste
 Of both—so meet the earthly and divine.
 And each is either." Thus I hold him graced—
 Dying on earth, half inside and half out, Wholly in heaven, who knows? My mind embraced
 Thy secret, Jochanan, how dare I doubt?
 Follow thy Ruach, let earth, all it can,
 Keep of the leavings!' Thus was brought about
 The sepulture of Rabbi Jochanan.
 Thou hast him,—sinner-saint, live-dead, boy-man,— Schiphaz, on Bendimir, in Farzistan!"

Note the deliberate little roughnesses here, the jolts apparently intended to prevent the reader from subsiding into a state of dormancy from the close attention which the poet requires, the "uncombine" in the sense of dissolving a combination, the shorthand style of "caused you quail," for "caused you to quail" or "made you quail," and the suggestion that the spirit is in no such haste to "bounce" out of the body as "hawk-clawed Death" is to "pounce" upon it. The whole style is that of a great imaginative writer who thinks that by leaving more than half of his drift to the intellect of his audience, and sharpening their attention by the sparkles of what he does say, he shall get a greater result than he can get by doing more for them, and leaving them to do less for themselves. It is Mr. Browning's method to startle as often and as smartly as he can the imaginations he appeals to, and to indicate rather than state, the directions he wishes their minds to follow. It is this which makes Mr. Browning at his best and vividest the most awakening of writers, the one who most signally arrests the attention, and most successfully insists on his reader's lending him the whole force of his own mind. But for that very reason, his work is almost always defective as poetry. The part of it which he does for us is too incisive, too short, sharp, and sudden, for anything like harmony; and the part which he obliges us to do for him in order to enter into his drift, is too imperfectly done to succeed in connecting the isolated points which he has jotted down for us into the flowing curve of true beauty. Mr. Browning touches life, especially the life of the intellect and the spirit, at as many points as any poet who ever wrote; but he does not blend these touches into the true poetic vision. He awakens and educates the highest imaginative powers, but he does not attempt to satisfy their cravings.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE BLASPHEMY SENTENCE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It is with much diffidence that I express disagreement with some of the statements in your article on the Blasphemy sentence. You say, "It would not be even true to say that it addresses temptations of a dangerous kind to young and inexperienced minds," &c.; and again, "Violent blasphemy is not likely to tempt any one to read it, not even the young."

You are mistaken, and any argument you deduce from your mistake for a mild treatment of coarse and violent blasphemy breaks down. In my parish, the "Comic History of the Bible" and the "Comic History of the Life of Christ," the crambe repetita of French infidelity, are exposed for sale in the shop windows; scores of passers-by hourly look at the pictures which caricature Christ and the incidents of his life. Boys and girls especially delight in these pictures. They do not merely incidentally glance at them. I have seen boys and girls reading the Freethinker and "Fruits of Philosophy." Of the filth of "Fruits of Philosophy" I will say nothing. But let me ask you, what is likely to be the effect on the minds of boys and girls, who, unlike their elders, can have no settled convictions, who are influenced entirely by the opinions of others, of seeing coarse and ludicrous caricatures of Christ, such as Christ pulling up Peter out of the water by his big nose; or God as a fat, ugly man, with spectacles on, sitting on a cloud, cross-legged, sewing a pair of trousers; or of reading that the Holy Ghost ought to be treated as one who had had an illegitimate child (but it was put more coarsely than this), &c. You, Sir, as most others, do not know that such outrageous insults on the Christian faith are perpetrated in the name of "Free-thought," and therefore you think, as many others do, that it would have been better to have treated all this, as Luther recommends us to treat the Devil, with silent contempt. That is very good treatment of it, if by us and for ourselves; but these ignorant men and women, these boys and girls, these children, are they to have the foul stuff ready to their hand, exciting their curiosity, rousing their ridicule, startling and shocking the simple faith of childhood in a way incomprehensible to us, who, as we have grown older, have let our faith grow colder, and starting in them difficulties and doubts which to us men and women have long since become as stale and flat as they are unprofitable. Sir, I repeat it, that had you yourself read the vulgar, coarse, foul insults of the Freethinker, you would never have coupled it with the irreverent banter of refined and thoughtful assailants. I write to you under great disadvantage, as you have not read the Freethinker, and I cannot foul my pen and distress the feelings of your readers by retailing the worst parts of the "Comic History of Christ." Those that I have given you above are but mild specimens of Mr. Foote's attempt to befool the public with his claim to represent Free-thought. If you knew the teaching of the disciples of this Freethinker in my parish (one of them preaches close by in the street every Sunday), you would think very differently of their claim to be considered "Freethinkers." Freethinkers I have in numbers among my friends and acquaintances, rich and poor. I would no more put down Free-thought than I would destroy every copy of the Bible. But liberty to think, and to speak, and to write, is one thing, and licence to outrage the religious convictions of others, to preach that there is no God, and that therefore morality is only conventional, and that the Ten Commandments are only convenient regulations made by the rich to keep down the poor, is another. To preach, as one of the disciples of this Free-thought has frequently preached at the corner of a street close by, to hundreds of men and women and boys and girls, that community of goods is the new Gospel to the poor, is one thing; but to preach, as he has preached, at the same time to the same audience, that community of women is the Paradise of bliss for the poor working-man, is another. As in politics, so in religion. "Liberty without wisdom" has always been, and always will, "simple folly without restraint;" and the teachings of these Freethinkers listened to and read with hungry greediness among the "working-class" in the East End, is the licensed folly of men who would upset all that is meant by society.

I have lived nineteen years in Bethnal Green, and in the many efforts I have been permitted to make to improve the social welfare of my neighbours, nothing has so disheartened me as to see week after week this paper, which prostitutes the name of Freethinker by its foul trash, read eagerly by men and women, boys and girls. "Maxima pueris reverentia debetur" seems forgotten, in these days; and I rejoice, therefore, to find that the law has asserted that while thought and speech are free, reverence must be paid to the consciences and opinions of others, and that the convictions of Christians are not to be treated by the propagandists of Atheism with indecent and scoffing ridicule with impunity. Thus looking at the matter, I can have no fear that Mr. Justice North's application of the law will in anywise interfere with the free expression of honest criticism of the Bible or of the creed of Christendom.—I am, Sir, &c.,

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It may be quite true, as you say, that under the present law against blasphemy, writers like Mr. Matthew Arnold ought not logically to escape the punishment which has been inflicted on Mr. Foote. That is a good reason for altering the law, but I do not think that it is a good reason for granting immunity to such outrages on the Christian religion as some of the articles in the Freethinker. Are you correct in stating that "nobody can say that the Freethinker is obtruded cruelly on people who do not want to read it?" I cannot speak for others, but copies of it have been sent to me through the post from the office of the paper; and one of those copies was so full of filthy obscenity, that I believe it might have come under the terms of Lord Campbell's Act.

For myself, I have always wondered that a writer of Mr. Matthew Arnold's eminence and refinement should have permitted himself to wound Christian feeling by his simile of "the three Lord Shaftesburys." But surely there is a very great difference between Mr. Arnold's refined satire, and the coarse ribaldry of the Freethinker? The one evidently intended to insult and wound; the other, I am sure, did not. Such articles in the Freethinker as I have seen were not simply "coarse and vulgar,"—they were brutal and indecent. Mr. Holyoake is an outspoken Atheist, and he belongs to the social status of Mr. Foote rather than to that of Mr. Matthew Arnold. Yet I have never read any attack on Christianity from the pen of Mr. Holyoake which outraged my feelings or diminished my respect for Mr. Holyoake. So long as a man merely addresses himself to my reason, and does not wantonly insult my sacred convictions, I think there ought to be no law to silence him. It was by descending into the arena of open discussion that Christianity won its original triumphs, and a Christian surely ought to ask for nothing better than a fair field and no favour. It is not in the interest of Christianity that I would put down even indecent attacks upon it, but in the interest of good order and right feeling. I would protect the honest convictions of a sincere Atheist like Mr. Holyoake or of an Agnostic like Mr. Herbert Spencer as scrupulously as I would those of a Christian. The only serviceable weapon against attacks on Christianity from such quarters is fair and courteous argument. I should regard the imprisonment, even for a day, of men like Mr. Holyoake, or Mr. Herbert Spencer, or Mr. Huxley, for their opinions on religion, as a greater outrage on Christianity than anything that any of those gentlemen has ever written. More harm has been done to Christianity in all ages by its injudicious defenders than by its open foes.—I am, Sir, &c.,

MR. BRADLAUGH'S ATHEISM.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I should just like to say a few words in reply to your correspondent "J. K.," with regard to Mr. Bradlaugh's seeming inconsistency in the belief of a God. "J. K." shows great ignorance of either Mr. Bradlaugh's opinions or his writings or he would not have troubled you with his letter. I think the best plan will be to let Mr. Bradlaugh justify himself in his own words. Addressing a crowded audience in the Free Library at Norwich, on the subject of Christianity and Scepticism, on April 4th, 1871, he says:—

"I never read, except in tracts and sermons and religious essays, of any who say there is no God. Some persons talk about the fools who say there is no God, and Bishops preach against them; but an Atheist does not say there is no God. The Atheist says the term 'God' conveys no idea to his mind. I have never yet heard a definition of God from any living man, nor have I read a definition by dead or living man that was not self-contradictory. I do not deny the word 'God,' because I do not know anything about its meaning. Denial, like affirmation, must refer to some proposition that is understood. But the moment you tell me you mean the God of the Bible, or the God of the Koran, or the God of any particular Church, I am prepared to tell you that I deny that God. So long as the term means absence of knowledge as to particular phenomena and represents the undiscovered, I am not fool enough to say there is no God. . . . It is when you tell me of God distinct from the universe, creating the universe different from himself, and adding to his own existence, that I am compelled to deny that God."

I think the above a complete vindication of Mr. Bradlaugh, —I am, Sir, &c.,

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—May I be permitted to draw attention to two points which seem to arise out of your article on "The New Suffering of the Poor"?

Firstly, does not the drift of the argument give a new answer to those who are for doing away with the English system of out-door relief? In England, two steps separate the workman from starvation. They are out-door relief and the workhouse. In Ireland there is only one,—the workhouse. In France there is none. Cannot we trace somewhat of an inverse proportion between the number of steps and the amount of anarchical discontent? "Give me labour, or I die!" is, and must be, the cry of the Parisian artisan.

Secondly, in France, as you say, the only security of the poor lies in the possession of land, or in their savings, which usually are invested in Rentes. In England, our lower orders have little chance of getting land, but beside direct means of saving, such as Post-office banks and the like, the workmen have in many places tried on a large scale a remedy of their own. It is co-operation, where the capitalist is the labourer, and the labourer the capitalist. May we not recognise in this movement the best of safeguards against anarchy, on the one hand, and pauperism on the other; and also as the germ of a truly Conservative force, over the presence of which both Liberals and Conservatives may rejoice?—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE FUTURE OF ENGLISH LAND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Referring to the criticisms by Mr. Bullock-Hall on my statements respecting the agriculture of some Continental countries, may I correct his impression that dairy-farming in Denmark is conducted on the minute holdings which prevail in France and Belgium. The especial value of the Blue-book relating to Denmark consists in the fact that on large and small freehold farms alike during the last twenty years, and mainly in consequence of the active teaching by Government Schools, improved methods, especially of dairying, have been introduced, and have placed Denmark at the head of butter-making countries. The sizes of the farms vary from the 5,700 acres of the foremost Danish agriculturist, Mr. Tesdorpf, to the average of from 40 to 130 acres of the peasant-proprietor. The leading feature is the fact of the land being chiefly cultivated by the owners of it, and further, that although Denmark has been largely a country of pasturage, it is found that it pays best to make butter from arable land. Such is the case with the remarkable farm of which Mrs. Nielson is the leading spirit. It consists of 170 acres of land, all arable, and the property of her husband, and Mr. Bullock-Hall illustrates the truth of the words of the Assistant Royal Commissioner, who says respecting this farm and "arable-land dairying generally,"—"The system thus designated by me is pursued to an extent that is almost incredible to an Englishman, who is accustomed to associate dairying with permanent pasture, for there is not an acre of permanent grass on the whole farm." The particulars of another Danish peasant farm of eighty acres are also worth noting. Mr. Jenkins describes the farmer's house as displaying a "certain amount of luxury and elegance." There was a piano, and the daughter of the house understood English and German, in addition to her own tongue. Most striking of all, one of the sitting-rooms is set apart for the use of the farmer, and "the bookshelves in this room were better furnished with agricultural text-books than the library of most English farmers occupying many times the area." The gentlemen whose opinions were asked as to the condition of Danish agriculture almost invariably state that Denmark has suffered less than others from bad seasons and competition, and give as the reason that it "is chiefly because nearly all farmers possess their land." Some of the friends of the English farmer tell him this is chimerical, but at least it is a significant fact that we send to the Danes for information how to combat the very evils which they tell us the system on which their land is worked and divided has enabled them to feel but slightly. The Danish labourer also commonly possesses his house and a few acres of land, and is constantly, by thrift and industry, rising up into the class of peasant-farmers, which it will be a happy day for this country when it also possesses.

Has not the time gone by when it is needful, as Mr. Bullock-Hall proposes, to point out how our law of settlement and entail prevents the acquisition of small properties in land, and the consequent industry and prosperity of the man who farms his own? The "statesmen" of the North and the holding yeomen of Kent are the few reminders we still have left of the time when minute cultivation was not unknown in England, and if the laws which now prevent the sale and breaking-up of large estates, and encourage the forming of over-grown properties, are repealed, as they quickly will be, when the nation once awakes to the enormous waste and folly of the present English land system, we shall see, as I stated before, farms of all sizes, cultivated by a population at least five times as numerous as the badly-cultivated and deserted fields so many of our country districts now show.

As you wisely point out, it is clear that our land system is coming up for review and resettlement. In every village will soon be found men whose votes will influence the ultimate decision. With the proposals of those who would "nationalise" the land being discussed in all directions, and the ominous divorce from property in the land of the people who live upon it, the true policy of moderate men is to strive by every means to increase the number of landowners, and root out those calamitous and one-sided laws which stand in the way of this. As the Times significantly remarked, a few days ago,—"We may think ourselves fortunate, if an overgrown population, depending on foreign employment, does not find the divisible wealth all too small to satisfy the expectations it is now forming on a scale of increasing liberality."—I am, Sir, &c.,

CONTENT AND THE CHURCH CATECHISM.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Most certainly the Church Catechism teaches us to reverence our betters: that is the reason why it is so precious a document for all Radical Churchmen. Christians are taught to order themselves lowly and reverently, not to those who are more rich, or in higher rank, than they are, but to those who are more good than they are. The claims of aristocracy and plutocracy are set on one side, and the Tory squire, if he is a true Churchman, must often go cap-in-hand—if that is a sign of reverence—to the Radical workman.

But so far from teaching contentment, surely the Church Catechism compels us to be divinely discontented. It makes a special point of telling us that God's commandments are the commandments of a political and true Emancipator, who, through his great agitator Moses, struck the first great blow for freedom. It says that it is the duty of all, rich as well as poor, women as well as men, to "get their own living," to produce something in sufficient return for what they themselves consume. It so clearly recognises the fact that men are to keep rising up in life, that it tells them to do their duty, —not in that state of life into which it has pleased God to call them, but into which it shall please God to call them.

I could multiply proofs to show how the Catechism is entirely on the side of the people and of social and political reform, but I hesitate to trespass on your space. It is somewhat surprising to find the Spectator ignorant of what, at any rate, the boys and girls of Drury Lane, Bethnal Green, and St. Luke's know pretty well. May I, therefore, append Mr. Ruskin's advice, which, if I remember right, was that West-End ladies, instead of dancing during the week and teaching the poor their Catechism on Sundays, would do well to learn and practise the teaching of the Catechism themselves during the week, and teach the poor children to dance on Sundays?—I am, Sir, &c.,

STEWART D. HEADLAM.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I told a meeting of country parsons some months since that, in spite of their care in teaching the Catechism, working-men still believed that that document taught reverence to mere money distinctions, and content with the condition of life in which they were born. My audience, including one or two "squarsons," laughed at the idea of any English working-man holding such an antiquated notion. But I was justified. Only a few days afterwards, I stood in the midst of a crowd of operatives stopping, on their way home to dinner, outside the office of a Radical paper, to read the latest telegrams. In that crowd, the very words I had used were uttered by a working-man, and assented to by his fellows, the general opinion being that "parsons wants to keep the people down,"—a grim satire, in this instance, upon the educational work of a city in which some half-a-dozen parsons, for over twenty years, bore the reproach amongst their fellow-citizens of spending too much on educating the mob! But, Sir, this morning I open my Spectator, and have to wonder where I am. It must be that the newsmonger has made a mistake, or the printer's devil has been trying his hand at improving editorial "copy." Yet there is a verisimilitude about the foot-note forbidding even this refuge. Has my friend Stewart Headlam indeed prophesied in vain? Let the shade of Lindley Murray answer. If there is no difference between "has" and "shall," then your foot-note to Mr. Rendell is gospel; if the contrary, the Catechism is the Radical document we have all along claimed it to be. And who are my betters? I have long looked upon the editor of the Spectator as one of them, but the reverence will be endangered, if he so ignores the wonderful precision of the Catechism.—I am, Sir, &c.,

A. T. F.

[We have received quite a number of letters on this subject. All we can say is, that whatever the authors of the Catechism meant, the popular impression of their teaching is that content is a virtue. So it is.—ED. Spectator.]

CANON RAWLINSON ON THE ANTIQUITY OF MAN.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Canon Rawlinson says, on page 25 of his tract, "There is no evidence that the primeval savage ever existed." He makes this assertion, not of Babylonia or Egypt only, but of the whole world. Here, he seemed to me, and still seems, "to go beyond his brief." The weight of opinion among geologists goes to establish the fact that remains of savage man have been found in Europe and elsewhere, associated with natural formations of great antiquity. These discoveries must be considered "evidence," while the negative evidence that no such discoveries have been made in the regions which "tradition makes the cradle of the human race" may be allowed its weight on the other side.—I am, Sir, &c.,

SHELLEY AND THE GRAND STYLE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It was with great interest that I read the admirable article on "The Conditions of 'The Grand Style,'" in Saturday's

Spectator. With reference to Shelley, I was glad to see you quote "Ozymandias" as an example of "the grand style" in that poet, although I was a little surprised not to find the magnificent concluding lines in the "Prometheus Unbound" placed in that category. To me, they seem of true heroic mould, the "large utterance, of the early gods," and they move with a sustained and mighty purpose such as one does not often meet with in Shelley. The lines I mean are as follows:—

"To suffer woes which hope thinks infinite;
To forgive wrongs darker than death or night;
To defy power which seems omnipotent;
To love and bear; to hope till hope creates
From its own wreck the thing it contemplates;
Neither to change, nor falter, nor repent:
This, like thy glory, Titan, is to be Good, great, and joyous, beautiful and free;
This is alone Life, Joy, Empire, and Victory!"

WOLVES "THINK LONG."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—With reference to a quotation from Milton, in the article on "The Conditions of the Grand Style," in your paper for last week, the expression "to think long" is always used in Norfolk speech for "to long." "She'll be home in the morning [i.e., to-morrow]. I think long to see her again." "I think long to get out." Probably, in Milton's time it was good English, like so many other provincialisms.—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

TEAR AND SMILE.

"WHAT are you?" said a tear,
To a smile playing near.
"With a flickering shimmer,
You transiently glimmer
On the meaningless features of mirth;
But you nothing express
Of the anguish and stress
That make up man's portion on earth."

"You are rather severe,"
Said the smile to the tear.
"For as day, to shine bright,
Needs a background of night,
So grief must be bordered with gladness;
And the light of a smile,
More than once in a while,
Helps a tear to unbosom its sadness."

THE PARCHMENT TENNYSON.*

THE "Parchment Library" is very taking in form, though it has one defect, that the thick paper on which it is printed rebels against the parchment cover, and rebels so effectually, that the volumes, confined only at the back, open like a fan in front, and will not close again. The illustrations, too, do not add to their beauty. In this parchment copy of Tennyson's poems, we have, in the first volume, an illustration of "the Palace of Art," with the "golden gorge of dragons" spouting forth "a flood of fountain foam," rows of galleries, and a cloud of incense streaming out of the hidden portion of the palace; in the background, bits of formal landscape. We venture to say that, far from bringing out the meaning of Tennyson's "Palace of Art," this illustration is a mere parody. Indeed, no picture, however careful, could embody Tennyson's rich and elaborate detail, and still less a somewhat poor woodcut. The illustration in the second volume of St. Simeon Stylites is still more of a parody. There the confused vision of the dying ascetic is rendered as if it were palpable fact,—an exceedingly smug angel, with most artificially-evolved wings, and a band of vacant-faced, prettyish subordinates, also furnished with powers of flight, are standing behind the cross; while two winged sisters are offering the poor mortal his celestial crown. This is an exceedingly indifferent interpretation of the poem, for it is quite obvious that Tennyson means to present these visions as the offspring of poor St. Simeon's delirious and failing brain, and not as the very solid and conventional, though winged facts here presented to us.

But when we have made these little grumbles, we have exhausted our criticism on the form of these volumes. The paper and type are everything that we could wish. Speaking roughly, these volumes contain all that was contained in the original two volumes by which Mr. Tennyson first became known to the world, together with a few early poems and sonnets not then published, and not very important, and the magnificent poem "Tithonus" (which appeared first in the Cornhill magazine in 1860, and was republished with "Enoch Arden" in 1864). Also there is a little poem called "England and America in 1782," which we do not remember to have seen printed as yet in any collected edition of Mr. Tennyson's poems.

It is always a pleasure to get the opportunity of turning over afresh the poems of a great master. And in opening this but little modified form of the favourite of one's youth, the question occurs to one what is most Tennysonian in Tennyson,—what is it which seems to express best the personality of the Poet Laureate, and characterise him in a way that separates him from his predecessors and successors in the same field? This is not the same thing as asking what is really best in his poems; for a poet, when he touches his highest point, often seems to rise out of himself into something which we should hardly dream of characterising as essentially and signally expressive of his genius. Thus "Ulysses" and "Tithonus," splendid as they are,—probably, barring one or two lyrics, the finest poems in these two volumes,—and, of course, deeply impressed by the genius of Tennyson, seem to tell us of Tennyson in a semi-dramatic attitude; of Tennyson trying to grasp a mood of feeling and thought not peculiarly his own, but only one which had deeply fascinated his intellect. Those are just the conditions which sometimes bring the very best fruits out of a man of high genius. It is probable that Shakespeare, for instance, would never have known his own genius, had he not attempted to embody many characters with which personally it may be he had little sympathy, though imaginatively he felt the very deepest delight in conceiving and portraying them. So it is with Tennyson. In "Ulysses" and "Tithonus," in both the pieces on "The Northern Farmer," in "Rizpah," and probably in others of his poems, you find him painting what had powerfully fascinated his attention, but not what, so far as we can judge, had any very profound echo in his own personal sympathies. On the other hand, as we go over his poems, we instinctively say to ourselves, as we read some of them,—Here is Tennyson himself; no one could have originated that strain of thought and feeling but Tennyson himself; here he is not only the interpreter of what interested his feelings, but the singer of what sprang up in himself. We say that, for instance, at once in reading "Ænone," "The Palace of Art," "A Dream of Fair Women," "Locksley Hall," "The Day-dream," "Will Waterproof's Lyrical Monologue," "Break, break, break." All these seem born of Tennyson's own heart, as well as sung by Tennyson's own muse. And though in some of these the theme is antique, in all the mood of feeling, the mode of treatment, is essentially modern,—self-conscious and yet easy, light and yet elaborate, at once lavish and disdainful of ornament, both terse and luxuriant, the treatment of a poet who is always a conscious artist, who has always a manner of his own, and yet who never stiffens into anything like formula or poetical pretence and parade. What, for instance, can be more beautiful, and yet more modern and less Homeric than Tennyson's "Ænone;"—

"O Mother Ida, many-fountained Ida,
Dear Mother Ida, hearken, ere I die!
I waited underneath the dawning hills,
Aloft the mountain lawn was dewy-dark,
And dewy-dark aloft the mountain pine.
Beautiful Paris, evil-hearted Paris,
Leading a jet-black goat, white-horned, white-hooved, Came up from reedy Simois, all alone."

This recitative of continual entreaty to Mother Ida to hearken to Ænone ere she dies,—this wail in the minor key,—which constitutes the framework of the whole poem, is in a mood of sentiment as little Homeric as it is possible to conceive, especially when it is made the occasion for painting in an elaborate and rich background of landscape. The despondent wail, with the careful delineation of the local beauty and the rich associations in connection with that wail, is altogether unlike the genuine

Homer, essentially Tennysonian; but what is still more Tennysonian is the combined carefulness, richness, compression, and yet ease of the picture,—the pleasure Tennyson takes in conveying a rich growth of suggestions by a few pliant, carefully blended strokes,—the mingled grace and yet high finish of the work. It is just the same in "The Palace of Art:"—

"Full of great rooms and small the palace stood,
All various, each a perfect whole
From living Nature, fit for every mood
And change of my still soul.
For some were hung with arras green and blue,
Showing a gaudy summer morn,
Where with puffed cheek the belted hunter blew
His wreathed bugle horn.
One seemed all dark and red,—a tract of sand,
And some one pacing there alone,
Who paced for ever in a glimmering land,
Lit with a low, large moon.
One showed an iron coast and angry waves,
You seemed to hear them climb and fall,
And roar, rock-thwarted, under bellowing caves,
Beneath the windy wall.
And one a full-fed river, winding slow
By herds upon an endless plain,
The ragged rims of thunder brooding low,
With shadow streaks of rain."

Is it possible to conceive richer, more elaborate, and yet more compressed and terser art, in which single words suggest sentences, and yet, in spite of the high compression, there is a constant sense of ease, pliancy, and grace? It is just the same in the "Dream of Fair Women." Take the picture in which Cleopatra describes herself:—

"We drank the Libyan sun to sleep, and lit
Lamps which out-burned Canopus. O my life
In Egypt! O the dalliance and the wit,
The flattery and the strife,
And the wild kiss, when fresh from war's alarms,
My Hercules, my Roman Antony,
My mated Bacchus, leapt into my arms,
Contented there to die."

There you have the most elaborate, the most conscious, the most compressed art, but this is not the sole characteristic feature in Tennyson's poetry. It is in poems like "The Day-dream" and "Will Waterproof's Lyrical Monologue" that the modern flexibility comes out in Tennyson, the ease with which one kind of emotion glides into another,—in short, what the author of "John Inglesant" would call his humour, in other words, the refined but easy transitions from the sense of gladness to the senses of pathos, and vice versa:—

"O Lady Flora, let me speak:
A pleasant hour has passed away,
While, dreaming on your damask cheek,
The dewy sister eye-lids lay.
As by the lattice you reclined,
I went through many wayward moods
To see you dreaming,—and behind
A summer crisp with shining woods;
And I, too, dream'd, until at last
Across my fancy, brooding warm,
The reflex of a legend past
And loosely settled into form.
And would you have the thought I had,
And see the vision that I saw,
Then, take the broidery frame, and add
A crimson to the quaint Macaw."

How easily there the tenderness passes into a smile, and how polished, how highly cultivated, how refined, how gentle in its languid movement, the transition is! "Will Waterproof" is even a higher effort of the same kind:—

"No vain libation to the Muse;
But may she still be kind,
And whisper lovely words, and use
Her influence on the mind,
To make me write my random rhymes
Ere they be half forgotten;
Nor add and alter, many times,
Till all be ripe and rotten.
I pledge her, and she comes and dips
Her laurel in the wine,
And lays it thrice upon my lips,
These favoured lips of mine;
Until the charm have power to make
New life-blood warm the bosom,
And barren common-places break
In full and kindly blossom.
I pledge her silent at the board;
Her gradual fingers steal,
And touch upon the master-chord
Of all I felt and feel."

Old wishes, ghosts of broken plans,
And phantom hopes assemble;
And that child's heart within the man's
Begins to move and tremble.

Through many an hour of summer suns,
By many pleasant ways,
Against its fountain upward runs
The current of my days:
I kiss the lips I once have kissed;
The gaslight wavers dimmer;
And softly, through a vinous mist,
My college friendships glimmer."

That is a perfect example of humour in "John Inglesant's" sense,—not the only true humour, surely,—not the only genuine fruit of the magic transformations of one sort of feeling into another,—but one most characteristic of our modern life; one most significant of the innumerable and interlacing by-paths by which the most cultivated emotion of to-day is always passing from tears to laughter, and from laughter to tears. Certainly, no poet is so thoroughly modern as Tennyson in the effects of self-consciousness, in the effects of polish and finish, in the fine gradations by which he makes one mood pass into another, and in that bias towards complexity, rather than simplicity, which especially distinguishes modern from antique art.

AN AUSTRALIAN TRANSLATION OF JUVENAL.*

MESSRS. Strong and Leeper are Oxford men, but they hold office in the University of Melbourne, and distinctly claim as an advantage for their translation the fact of its having been executed while they were engaged in lecturing upon Juvenal to the students of that university. We feel justified, therefore, in calling their version an Australian version, but we are surprised to read that the result of the advantage referred to was "that some difficulties which seem to have been lightly passed over by most commentators have been pressed upon the attention" of Messrs. Strong and Leeper. What difficulty is there in Juvenal that had not been discussed and debated, again and again, by battalions of commentators, before the University of Melbourne was founded? And the translators, it will be observed, are very cautious in this part of their preface. These difficulties, which the commentators have neglected, have been pressed on Messrs. Strong and Leeper's attention; but there the matter seems to have ended. Beyond all doubt, the Australian interpretation, when correct, coincides with that of "most commentators." If, then, when it is incorrect, the fault is due to their pupils having served these lecturers as the Zulu catechumen served Bishop Colenso, the "advantage," which theoretically ought to be great, may have proved in this case to be a minus quantity. Be this as it may be, we are even more surprised to find that this version "is the fruit of much thought and labour." From internal evidence, we might otherwise infer that it had been hastily compiled for market purposes. And this inference would appear to be inevitable, when Messrs. Strong and Leeper tell us that they originally intended to publish their translation in conjunction with a commentary, but that, for reasons with which they need not trouble their readers, they have decided to issue at once the first instalment of their work. We are bound, of course, to accept Messrs. Strong and Leeper's apology, but it is obviously one which saves their honesty at the expense of their sagacity. It is true that they say that Professor Mayor's translation of the Tenth Satire is a masterpiece in itself, and that had he seen fit to translate the rest of the Satires their own version would have been superfluous. But are these Australian translators quite sure that Mr. J. D. Lewis, for instance, had not already made such a version as theirs worse than superfluous? Anyhow, we should like to hear the reasons which Messrs. Strong and Leeper have, though they are too considerate to trouble the readers with them, for rushing as they do into print with a version which, in spite of all the "thought and labour" that have been spent upon it, is, on the whole, both crude and inaccurate. Alas! and it was made, they tell us, "with a view of giving a rendering of Juvenal which should combine accuracy with some elegance of style." They are quite right, indeed, in using the word "accuracy" without any apologetic adjective, for the difficulties of Juvenal have been handled by such a cloud of commentators that no great amount of Latin scholarship is required in a translator of these Satires; provided always that he has some amount of common-sense, combined with that respect for "authority in matters of opinion" which in his case common-sense would enjoin, and also that he has a good working command over the resources and idioms of his native tongue. For, in the main, Juvenal is not a difficult author to translate. He writes in metre, but rhetoric is his forte, rather than poetry; and his terse, nervous, and epigrammatic Latin admits of being rendered into English which at least ought never to become flat, or flabby, or prolix. There is, however, a quality in Juvenal's style which presents insuperable difficulties to translators of far higher qualifications than Messrs. Strong and Leeper, or, in our opinion, than even Professor Mayor can claim to possess. We refer to the satirist's allusiveness; and whatever the ideal translator, the paragon,— may effect hereafter—for the present the most that we can ask for in a good working translation is that this allusiveness, when it passes the bounds of reproduction, should be met by a simple version, made intelligible both by words in brackets and in italics, and, wherever it is necessary, by a brief note on the same page as the translation. One thing is clear. There are numerous passages in this Australian translation which are utterly unintelligible. As such, they have no locus standi in this book, and deserve unconditional condemnation, whatever explanation may be found of them in the notes, which Messrs. Strong and Leeper may not be so anxious, perhaps, to compile for exportation, if their present fiasco meets with the reception which it merits, and will, we trust, for the honour of English scholarship, by no means fail to obtain.

We must now produce some evidence in support of the verdict which we have felt no hesitation in passing on this worthless piece of work; and if the reader finds that evidence insufficient, as want of space may easily make it seem to be, we must beg him to take our word for the fact that the passages which we select (almost at random) are typical, and might be multiplied, if not to any extent, to an extent at least which must compel a competent critic to condemn the translation en bloc and unconditionally. It is a grievance, we may remark, to begin with, that the indolence of these translators renders it extremely hard to find any given line or passage in their "accurate and elegant" version. For instead of numbering the lines, they have supinely given us nothing more than a supremely useless and, in their case, not even correct running heading,—"The Satires of Juvenal." This is really too bad, and throws some light upon what Messrs. Strong and Leeper's notions are about trouble.

In Satire i., 10, the words "Unde alius furtivae devehat aurem Pelliculae" are thus rendered by Strong and Leeper, "The spot whence another is carrying home the gold of the smuggled sheepskin." Now, we must beg the reader to look upon this as a typical passage of at least one hundred of a similar character, in this accurate and elegant version; and to notice that a fifth form boy's rendering would be, "The land from which that other fellow stole and carried away the golden fleece." Strong and Leeper are fond of capitals, and make what they seem to think a joke, by translating "fabrum volantem," i., 55, "the Flying Joiner." Daedalus was no more a "joiner" than he was a plumber and glazier, but what of that? Capitals are capitals in Melbourne University, and may be trusted for harder tasks than the above. Again, i., 92, "Simplexne furor sestertia centum Perdere,"—"One hundred sesterces," say Strong and Leeper, i.e., something less than a sovereign; but what Juvenal means is 100,000 sesterces, or roughly enough, £1,000. Again, i., 161, "Accusator erit qui verbum dixerit, Hic est"; Strong and Leeper translate this wrongly, but not more wrongly than nonsensically, "He'll be an informer who shall say but the word, 'That's he.'" "There will be an informer for the man who shall say," &c., is the correct interpretation, and given in the Delphin edition published in 1684. Now, we asseverate that it would be easy to cull from this first satire (171 lines in all) at least five times as many instances of inaccuracy and bad taste as those we have quoted. We pass to a better known satire, the tenth. After sketching with great vigour and animation the career of Hannibal, the satirist asks, "And what, then, was the end of all this? Alas for glory! He, too, was beaten," &c. But up to that question, Juvenal was not poking fun at Hannibal. "Pyrenaum transsilit" is wrongly translated by "he skips over the Pyrenees;" and we see no reason whatever for translating "quali digna tabella," in line 157, by, "Oh, what a subject for a caricature!" A Roman poet, even in Juvenal's time, was hardly likely to think of Hannibal on the eve of Trasimene as a subject for a caricature. A fair example of the "unintelligible," which we have referred to, will be found in lines 81-85 of this satire. We have no room for the Latin or for comment, but here is Strong and Leeper's text:—"I hear many will die. No doubt of it; there's a great furnace heated; my friend, Brutidius, met me at the altar of Mars, and he was rather pale. How anxious I am lest Ajax demand satisfaction for the defeat, for the weak defence." Again, take the lines, which are too well known to need quoting in the original,—

* Thirteen Satires of Juvenal. Translated into English, by H. A. Strong, M.A., and Alexander Leeper, M.A. London: Macmillan and Co.

"O happy Rome and fortunate Late born under my consulate."

"Let me rather write this grotesque doggrel than thee, O Heaven-inspired Philippic of surpassing fame—rolled next the first." The phrase "grotesque doggrel" exactly describes Strong and Leeper's version of Cicero's jingling hexameters, but certainly is no rendering whatever of "ridenda poemata"? Cicero's poetry was not much better than Carlyle's or Emerson's, but it was far indeed from being "grotesque doggrel." And is there any meaning in "rolled next the first"? The 21 lines which form the conclusion of this noble satire are as splendid, in their way, as any passage, not merely in Latin, but in Greek or English literature. Our Australians pull themselves together, and succeed in translating some parts of this passage with some approach to accuracy and elegance. But they break down terribly even here. They translate,— by "amours, and feasts, and Sardanapalus-couches." But Sardanapalus was the typical voluptuary, and not the typical sluggard of antiquity; and we have little doubt that it was his women and his banquettings, as well as his beds of down, that Juvenal was referring to. In any case, "Sardanapalus-couches" is not literary English. It reminds us of "Victoria lounges," and other flowers of advertising English, but is "tolerable, and not to be endured," in such a passage as this. Yet there is a worse blot even than this in Strong and Leeper's version of this passage. They have the heart to translate "Candiduli divina tomacula porci" (x., 355) by "a white porker's holy sausages."

And here we must take leave of Messrs. Strong and Leeper; and in doing so must repeat most emphatically that the specimens which we have selected of what appear to us to be flagrant violations of all the principles of true translation could easily be paralleled by hundreds of others as bad, or even worse. To put a finishing stroke to their absurdities, these Australian "traduttori" solemnly declare in their title-page that "the right of translation and reproduction is reserved." We will pass "right of reproduction," though we cannot imagine what it is; but the "right of translation"? What can that mean? It is scarcely less intelligible than some of the posers which they have set their imaginary translator; and to the reader who can explain this "right of translation" to his own satisfaction,—to him, and to him alone, can we recommend with any confidence this Australian version of that portion of Juvenal which the authorities of Oxford, in the plenitude of their indolence, have selected to be brought up for examination.

PROFESSOR NICHOL'S HISTORY OF AMERICAN LITERATURE.*

[FIRST NOTICE.]

THE first centenary of American national life was celebrated only a few years ago, and the first distinctive epoch of American literature is just drawing to a close, so we may say that it has taken a hundred years to originate, develop, and exhaust the first movement of a new literature. The writers by whom this movement is popularly represented form two groups, of which the first is merely imitative, although exhibiting great merit. Its chief names are Fenimore Cooper, Washington Irving, and Bryant, and it is evident that each of these belongs to a previously existent literary tendency, as, for instance, Cooper to that revived by Scott, Irving to that which began in Addison, and Bryant to that school of poetry of which Wordsworth is the greatest representative. The second group consists of Emerson, Hawthorne, Longfellow, Holmes, and Lowell, and furnishes the first true representatives of American literature, so far as it has reached in its first epoch. We have here new and distinctive work; it is no longer merely a change of local environment, it is a fresh intellectual departure. Whittier does not belong to this group, either by personal connection or by common intellectual endowment; he is merely contemporary. Of these literary co-workers and friends it seemed natural that the shy Hawthorne should be the first to take his leave; after a while, Longfellow left another "vacant chair" in the circle, and a few weeks later Emerson quitted a life which he had found "unnecessarily long;" Holmes sang the Iron Gate of his seventieth birthday four years ago; Mr. Lowell alone is still in his maturity. Without seeming, therefore, to hurry these two last from the scene which they have long adorned, we may say that the second group has come to an end, and with it the period which a future German historian will call the first Blüthezeit of American literature.

The manifest close of a literary epoch furnishes the historians and critics with their opportunity, and accordingly we find that the composition of works on American authors has commenced. We have already three biographies of Longfellow, with the authorised one to follow; four biographies of Emerson, and other works announced; biographies of Lowell and Whittier, and one of Holmes in the press; several volumes of a series of American Men of Letters, and a large number of essays in the periodicals. Mr. E. C. Stedman's conscientious and suggestive studies of Victorian Poets were undertaken, their author tells us, as preparatory training to fit him for a work upon the poetry of his own country; and it can hardly be long before Professor Moses Coit Tyler adds to his scholarly History of American Literature a third volume, dealing with the modern period. Almost all the above works, however,—with the special exception of the last-named—are unsatisfactory, and in several cases they are mere bookmakers' productions. We do not remember one of them by an American on an American, which is not spoiled in a greater or less degree by the writer's pride in his compatriot, a pleasant thing in itself, but one which may easily grow into obstructive proportions. These books are always interesting and useful records of fact, but as embodying the verdicts of dispassionate and qualified literary criticism, they are mostly of little value. As instances of this amiable weakness, take Mr. Warner's statement that since Gulliver, England has produced no piece of humour equal to Irving's Knickerbocker's History of New York, or Mr. Conway's attempt to show that Emerson anticipated Darwin. Up to the present time, however, we have had no serious history of the whole period of American literature. Indeed, it is not unusual to find English writers declaring that there is as yet no such thing as American literature, that all the works of American authors are imitative and European in spirit. The essentials of American life—these writers say—the vast physical features of the continent, and the unbounded aspirations of the people, have never received any adequate expression; no man can represent America who has not thrown off the trammels of European literary tradition. "We want a national literature," says the ambitious Mr. Hathaway, in Kavanagh, "commensurate with our mountains and rivers,—commensurate with Niagara, and the Alleghanies, and the Great Lakes. We want a national epic that shall correspond to the size of the country—that shall be to all other epics what Banvard's Panorama of the Mississippi is to all other paintings, the largest in the world!" It is a feeling like this which prompts the common saying that Walt Whitman is the first genuine representative of America, a statement about as reasonable as if we were to point to the bursting of a cannon as the culmination of the art of gunnery. Physical features have no connection with literature, except through the long process in which they form some of the conditions of that social life which, in its turn, produces the new order of mind that expresses itself partly in literature; a man is no more likely to be a great writer because he dwells by a great mountain, than to be a shallow thinker because a shallow stream runs past his door. A great voice was lifted in the wilderness of Craigenputtock, and what literature has Switzerland to show for her Alps? No one—if we may venture here upon an Americanism—thinks that a tall man naturally tells tall stories. "Nothing has hitherto been demanded of rivers and lakes in other parts of the world," wrote Mr. Lowell, characteristically, in a far back number of the North American Review, "except fish and mill privileges, or, at most, a fine waterfall or a pretty island. The received treatises upon mountainous obstetrics give no hint of any parturition to be expected, except of mice. Let us not be in any hurry to perform the Cæsarian operation." Many persons, too, who know nothing of Whitman, consider Fenimore Cooper the most representative American writer, because he tells chiefly of that Western life which, to their imagination, is the special feature of the New World. But nationality has little in common with locality; a literature is national only in so far as it is universal, paradoxical as the statement may seem. "Colonus, with a gleaming altar crowned," and "all-but-island, olive-silvery Sirmio," are only the backgrounds of voices speaking for every human heart. For the literature of America to be national—to quote Longfellow again—"it is not necessary that the war-whoop should ring in every line, and every page be rife with scalps, tomahawks, and wampum." In one sense, of course, the works which have been written in America since 1776 constitute an indisputable American literature, but there is a national literature in a sense much truer than this forced one, and one which Englishmen are just beginning to recognise. But, as we have said, up to the present time there has been no serious history of the whole period of it, and we are fortunate that the fact has escaped the notice of the bookmakers of our time. The volume before us has, therefore, the rare advantage of filling a gap in our libraries, and we welcome it on that account, as well as for its own great merits.

Professor Nichol has wisely chosen to write an historical sketch, rather than a complete history, and has thus been able to make his book extremely readable from beginning to end, which could hardly have been the case if he had compelled himself to furnish a detailed record. Almost every page bears marks of a scholarly acquaintance with many fields of knowledge, and a remarkably apt memory. The history and literature of several nations are drawn upon to furnish instructive parallels to the various movements of American thought, and when the author wishes to explain the comparative position of a writer or a work, he showers comparisons upon us in almost embarrassing abundance. This eclecticism results in a decided originality of view: it is at once clear to the reader that Professor Nichol has formed his opinions for himself upon the evidence; he is independent of any particular school, and even when he repeats a familiar verdict he supports it with new reasons of his own. His knowledge of American history is extensive and sympathetic, and—although we shall have occasion to point out numerous errors—he has evidently studied American letters long and conscientiously. He is singularly free from the ordinary prejudices of an English critic writing upon American matters, and we have been charmed by the sincerity with which he fills the delicate position of an impartial spectator. If at one moment we find him demolishing some preposterous American claim, at the next he is denouncing some piece of English ignorance or patronage; Oxford and Boston speak through him in turn. When we add that the book contains many brilliant passages and not a few caustic ones (we shall have something to say later on about the style), we shall have said enough to show that Professor Nichol's work possesses unusual interest and value.

The first chapter is devoted to a general survey of the conditions and characteristics of American literature. Under "Conditions," the author treats of the influences of geography, climate, history, and government; under "Characteristics," he discusses the spirit of hope and confidence in labour, the want of continuity in ideas which is produced by a want of continuity in life, the consequent impatience and instability, and the tendency to lawlessness, inaccuracy, and irreverence, in a country "where vehemence, vigour, and wit are common; good taste, profundity, and imagination rare,—a country whose untamed material imparts its tamelessness to the people, and diverts them from the task of civilisation to the desire of conquest." This chapter was originally delivered as a lecture, and is very pleasant reading, abounding in pertinent illustrations and quotations, Horace furnishing, perhaps, rather too many of the latter. Professor Nichol shows in an entertaining way the crude notions of English travellers and critics about America, and of Americans about England, a state of things the more to be regretted since it is travel which supplies the student of the literature of the present with that guide and basis of comparison which the reading of history furnishes to the student of the past. The only English work of genius on America is Dickens's caricature, and the books on England by Emerson and Hawthorne are the least satisfactory productions of their authors. Professor Nichol, however, does not hesitate to apportion the degree of blame, and the following remarks seem to us very just:—

"Untravelled Englishmen know much less of America as a whole—less of her geography, her history, her constitution, and of the lives of her great men—than Americans know of England. Of the mistakes on both sides—ludicrous and grave—we have the larger share. . . . The source of this greater ignorance lies not so much in greater indifference as in greater difficulty. England is one, compact and comparatively stable. The United States are many, vast, various, and in perpetual motion. An old country is a study, but a new country is a problem. It is hard to realise the past, but it is harder to read the present; to predict the future is impossible."

Professor Nichol writes with appreciation and sympathy of the vast problem which has to be solved by a country whose population contains large admixtures of Irish, Germans, Scandinavians, Chinese, French, and Spanish, and which has been sown with the germs of all politics and all religions.

"The State that is blent, and the literature that is constructed, out of these often jarring elements, must in the long-run be like no one ingredient; it must be an amalgam of all. Englishmen are too prone to forget that the partially kindred blood, which ought to promote friendship, cannot insure identity of aim. Safe in their island home, they smile at a turbulence largely due to the lawless spirits they have banished across the seas. The Old World is strong enough to overlook the petulance of the New, which in its turn is great enough to receive, and, it may be, in process of time to harmonise, the elements of discord in the Old."

The sketch of the literature of the Colonial Period, 1620-1765, which forms the second chapter, is the least interesting part of the book, but not the least valuable. The literary platitudes and theological rancours of this period have received final treatment in the two handsome volumes of Professor Tyler's history, but most English readers would be as little likely to follow his long, conscientious account as to seek out the original works, so that Professor Nichol's sketch, covering thirty pages, is a welcome relief. It is based almost entirely upon Tyler's work, a debt which is fully acknowledged by the author, and tells in a pleasant way all that the majority of English readers will care to know. When this dull period is once left behind, Professor Nichol's book rapidly increases in interest.

The next chapter, entitled "The Revolution Period" (why, by the way, does he not adopt the common American title of Revolutionary Period?), deals with the great names of Franklin, Hamilton, and Jefferson, the Declaration of Independence, the Federalists, and the effects of war and controversy on literature, and is a graphic and terse chronicle of this very important and interesting epoch. The same may be said of the succeeding chapter, on "American Politics and Oratory." It is a common statement that every American is a good speaker, but few Europeans are acquainted with the real oratory upon which this general compliment is based. In this chapter, besides a few instructive remarks about American political parties—a dark subject to most Englishmen—the author shows the aims and relative positions of such representative men as Calhoun, Clay, Webster, Everett, Channing, Parker, Garrison, Sumner, and Phillips. The specimens of their oratory are striking, and in most cases well chosen. The extract from Parker, however, who was certainly one of the most forcible speakers that America has produced, is utterly inadequate, and conveys no idea of his tremendous power. A passage should have been taken from one of his anti-slavery sermons preached in the Boston Music Hall. The twelve pages devoted to Daniel Webster give an interesting account of a man little known in England, an account which has, however, a most grave defect. Professor Nichol says:—"Webster stood resolutely on his ground against the extension of the area of slavery. He urged its abolition in the District of Columbia, but held that the Constitution gave no further powers. In this spirit is conceived his last considerable speech in the Senate, that of March 7th, 1850, entitled by himself, 'For the Constitution and the Union,' in which he accepts and defends the Compromise Bill." Now, a sketch of Webster's political life which omits all specific reference to his defence of the Fugitive Slave Bill is not only incomplete, but also seriously misleading, as is the above paragraph, for not one English reader in five hundred will understand all that is signified by the "Compromise Bill." (The "Compromise measures" would be more accurate. One of them was this Bill, permitting Southern slave-owners to seize their slaves in the free States, and capable of gross misuse,—no coloured person at the North being secure from seizure as a runaway slave.) How can the English reader—whose ignorance of American history has been pointed out by Professor Nichol himself, in a passage we have already quoted—be expected to know that these two harmless-looking words tell of an ineffaceable blot upon the memory of a man whom the author describes as "the grandest post-Revolution figure of the New World"? By way of killing two birds with one stone, we will try to remedy the two last-mentioned omissions in Professor Nichol's book, by quoting a passage which will show at the same time the character of Theodore Parker's eloquence, and the truth about Webster and the Fugitive Slave Bill. It is from Parker's speech before the Circuit Court of the United States, at Boston, in answer to the charge of misdemeanour for his speeches against the Bill.

"At that time, Massachusetts had in the Senate of the nation a disappointed politician,—a man of great understanding, of most mighty powers of speech, and what more than all else contributed to his success in life, the most magnificent and commanding personal appearance. At that time—his ambition nothing abated by the many years which make men venerable—he was a bankrupt in money, a bankrupt in reputation, and a bankrupt in morals—I speak only of his public morals, not his private—a bankrupt in political character, pensioned by the Money Power of the North. Thrice disappointed, he was at that time gaming for the Presidency. When the South laid down the Fugitive Slave Bill on the national Faro-table, Mr. Webster bet his all upon that card. He staked his mind, and it was one of vast compass; his eloquence, which could shake the continent; his position, the senatorial influence of Massachusetts; his wide reputation, which rang with many a noble word for justice and the rights of man; he staked his conscience and his life. Gentlemen, you know the rest,—the card won, the South took the trick, and Webster lost all he could lose,—his conscience, his position, his reputation; not his wide compassing mind, not his earth-shaking eloquence. Finally, he lost his life. Peace to his mighty shade! God be merciful to him that showed no mercy. The warning of his fall is worth more than the guidance of his success. Let us forgive; it were wicked to forget. For fifty years, no American has had such opportunity to serve his country in an hour of need. Never has an American so signally betrayed the trust,—not one, since Benedict Arnold turned a less ignoble traitor!"

We suggest to Professor Nichol to take the opportunity which the call for a second edition of his book will doubtless soon give him, to add this eloquent and terrible denunciation to his chapter on "American Politics and Oratory."

In a second notice, we shall speak of the literary verdicts of this volume, and point out a large number of inaccuracies.

LECTURES UPON ART.*

THE Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings may be excused for adding all possible attractions to a book published for the purpose of increasing their funds. Otherwise, among the lectures included in the volume, some derive more power from the lecturer's name than from what he says. The three first lectures are distinctly dull, and in a work professedly intended to appeal to the popular taste it would have been better if they had been omitted, or, at least, craftily inserted among those which are more interesting. Many people, if they find the first half of a book hard to read, do not trouble themselves to go any further, which in this case would mean to have left unread some very excellent plain-speaking on the subject of Art. In the three last lectures there is an entire absence of talk for talk's sake, and an easy handling of the subject dealt with, which show thorough knowledge of it.

Of the first three lectures, that by Mr. Poole is the most attractive. He has made a close study of Egyptian tombs, and as a plea for the preservation of these ancient monuments it is forcible, although the style in parts is not as clear as it might be, and the subject is treated on too large a scale for the limits of a lecture to do any justice to it. In praise of Mr. Richmond's lecture little can be said. Monumental painting is a subject that covers a very large region of Art, and almost anything could be brought under the definition, so that there was no excuse for making the lecture a dull one. As it is, Mr. Richmond has an unfortunately ambitious manner of saying what he does say, and it is not until he leaves the region of abstract theory for the more simple one of history that he says anything that is interesting. The rapid sketch he gives of Art between Giotto's early efforts and Michael Angelo's completed masterpieces is straightforward and unaffected. Mr. Poynter's contribution calls for no special notice. It suffers from not having the examples to which he often refers, and which were before his audience at South Kensington, and much of the lecture is necessarily conjectural, and, therefore, appeals less to unlearned readers than it might have done, if he had been dealing with Art at a later period.

With "English Parish Churches" begins the valuable part of the book. It is a subject which will come home to all who are the least interested in national architecture, and Mr.

Micklethwaite writes of it in a way which will be understood by all his readers. Mr. Micklethwaite traces the growth of parish churches in England back to their first root. "I claim," he says, "for our English parish churches that they are the most interesting relics of the past which remain in the land. . . . Parish churches are in a manner more interesting than the cathedral or abbey churches, because they are more specially the spontaneous product of the people, and not, as others often were, the work of powerful magnates or rich corporations." After sketching the growth of the parish church of Wakefield, by way of illustrating the various additions and alterations that it underwent at the hands of each generation who desired to leave their impress upon it, Mr. Micklethwaite passes on to the history of the furniture and fittings of churches, which is a side of their history more rarely touched upon, and his arguments are strong that those monuments of natural growth shall be allowed to stand as they are, unmolested by those who fancy they are especially enlightened upon the intentions of their early builders.

But what gives the real charm to the volume are the lectures by Mr. Morris on the "Lesser Arts." In Mr. Morris there is an evident power of growth, and as years pass by he becomes more mellow, while retaining all that directness of speech and opinion which fits him to be a teacher. These lectures throughout are distinguished by his sympathy with those oppressed workers who labour so grievously and continuously to produce ugliness, instead of beauty. Mr. Morris has the great merit of being human. He speaks as one man to another, not as the autocrat aiming at another form of oppression, and that, perhaps, the most enslaving of all. There is an aristocracy of sentiment and interest, as well as of birth or money, and all aristocracies are inclined to enforce authority upon those beneath, rather than to persuade them. Indeed, to persuade men is to recognise that they have the right to remain unpersuaded if they will, and this no aristocracy can afford to realise. Then it follows that those who have no real power to enforce, and who lack the grace to persuade, fall back upon exclusiveness, and shut the door of knowledge upon the masses outside who will not learn the lesson in the exact way their teachers conceive to be best. But if Art is to live, it must be by other means than this. Its teachers must cease to be exclusive, and have sympathy with those who are to be taught. They must have real simplicity of life, not self-consciousness that veils itself under a show of simplicity, and which reveals itself by eccentricities of speech and manner. If Art is to become national, it will not be by æsthetic picture-galleries and private views. Do the critics who now dwell at length upon the poetical merits of Mr. Rossetti and Mr. Whistler really desire or believe that the National Art of England should follow their guidance? Can we imagine the working-man and street-boy, who may often be seen at the National Gallery, studying to any good purpose the harmonies of Mr. Whistler, or the doleful countenances of Mr. Rossetti's women? The idea is an absurd one, and yet the pictures of Bellini and Titian and Veronese are not out of place in a gallery visited by the "common people" in their work-a-day clothes. Mr. Morris's frank statement that the common people of England are the mainstay of Art is very much needed. If the people of a nation do not care for Art, Art will languish, and no amount of large-eyed, sorrowful women and atmospheric effects in black and blue will make it live. Still further, if the common people do not themselves in their degree become artists, and share in the life of those who now can see little to love or sympathise with in the people, the work of the leaders of Art will itself become feebler and more attenuated, in efforts which appeal to no wider circle than their own immediate one. Fresh blood—and it may be, barbaric blood—is needed to cleanse and strengthen those who aspire to lead in that which belongs of right to the nation at large. Art, to be living, must be the free spirit of the people expressing itself in form. Anything short of this makes it artificial and unreal. There is a question we may all put to ourselves,—Shall our surroundings bear the mark of our own individuality, or shall they be the imitation of the imitation of our neighbours? Why are people so afraid to be free? What is it they fear? The comments of their neighbours. But after all, the judgment passed is by some one still more profoundly ignorant than themselves, some one who is more fearful, more bound, more stagnant than they are, but who would be the first to follow suit, if it became the fashion to be, what Mr. Morris demands of us, original and free, instead of fearful and enslaved. Unfortunately, it seldom comes home to people how much they are individually responsible for the dead-level of dreariness around them. If they are selfish, they say it is nothing to them how others live; and if they are religious and philanthropic, they often say that Art and Beauty do not count for much in the growth of good. And yet, who can assert that beauty is not an essential in the religious character? It is an attribute of God, and to divorce any one attribute is to weaken the unity of the whole. Perhaps religious-minded people will find that it is at their door that some of the effects of unwholesome Art must be laid. If they themselves will not care for Art, nor strive for beauty in their surroundings, it will tend to drive those whose natures cannot live without beauty and culture to seek it in other quarters, and from teachers who are cunning in the gratification of the senses. Take the poor of London. Will those who have their spiritual welfare at heart question for an instant that they would understand better what good is, if they could associate it more with beauty? Far removed from the enlarging influence of Nature, what is there to give them any idea of the beauty and grandeur of holiness? The spirit sinks to the level of what it sees, if the surroundings are ugly and full of dreariness, and there is nothing to give any suggestion of greater nobleness of life, we accept the life we see, and can aspire to no other. It is difficult to test the exact good that beauty of surrounding does for people. Probably, to some, it brings rest and tranquillity of nerve to a greater degree than to others, and rest and tranquillity is a long step towards a higher life. It is often the restlessness and jar of modern life that keeps people from rising, and this jar and turmoil can be lessened by having beauty about us. In older days, rich and religious people gave their money towards raising noble and beautiful churches in their towns. Not only did they wish to set forth their religion, but they desired to symbolise it with beauty of form and colour, with exquisite carving and mystery of light and shadow. Having built such houses for God, these same people felt that their own homes should be in harmony with them, and not only a tribute to the lower ambitions of men,—to display, to luxury, or even to excess of comfort. People desired to live themselves at no less perfect development than that which they thought fit for the direct service of God. Beauty and order belong as much to those who worship in the temple as to the temple itself. So they enriched their towns with the most perfect expression of national life,—with tall belfry towers and spacious judgment-halls. Then they reared their own palaces, and filled them with all that could best express the art of their time.

Such was the life of the past, and it is to prevent the destruction of this life that these lectures have been delivered, and now are published. If they help to make each individual member of the nation realise that he is in his degree responsible not only for the retention of beauty in the past, but for its growth in the future, the good they will have done is incalculable.

NEEDLEWORK, ANCIENT AND MODERN.*

It is undoubtedly advisable in these days, when everything is divided, and classified, and made popular, that an art so old and so dignified as that of Needlework should have a volume to itself, and we can congratulate the authors on having done their work extremely well. Not only is their production good as to paper, type, and illustrations, which are all-important in a book like this, but no details bearing upon their subject seem to have been omitted, and there is much curious and interesting information on many points. A dictionary of this kind has not the disadvantage attending others of the sort, that the student remains content with the knowledge conveyed in it, and seeks to go no further, for we should suppose that those who are privileged to understand the mysteries taught in it would take great interest in following out its instructions, while they would, at the same time, gain much enlightenment on many subjects. From its inevitable association with women, there is always a suggestion of home and domestic life about needlework that makes the mention of it particularly attractive in history, from the well-remembered web by which Penelope kept her very slow-witted suitors so long at bay, and the beautiful embroideries of Helen and Andromache, on to the Bayeux tapestry, to Katharine of Arragon's lonely hours of needlework, and the curiously-shown industry of Mary, wife of William III., concerning whom a contemporary poet records that she,—

an occupation which would rather amaze us in our present Royal Family. It is always a blow to be reminded, however, that there is no certain warranty of the Bayeux tapestry having been executed by or under the orders of the lady with whom it is usually connected, and there is even a tradition that it was worked and presented to William by three Bayeux men, but we would hope that this story is unfounded. Nevertheless, the connection of needlework with women is not an invariable one; there is reason to suppose that among the Egyptians, from whom the Jews learnt their skill in tapestry and other work, the men worked as well as the women; in China, both sexes are equally expert in such arts; and the Kings of Spain were at one time famous for their beautiful ecclesiastical work, though not, it must be admitted, until after their degeneracy had begun.

It is natural that a good deal of the Dictionary should be devoted to the subject of lace, both point and pillow, and it is one on which a great deal of information is to be procured from a rather curious source. When Colbert, the French Minister, established the Royal manufactory of lace at Alençon, he compelled all lace-makers to work in it; and this led to a revolt among them, which was ended by a compromise. Some years later, the extravagant expenditure on lace produced a sumptuary law limiting the use of it; then appeared a satirical poem, "La Révolte des Passemens," in which the laces are represented as revolting, like their makers, against this tyranny, but running away as soon as they are really opposed: every kind well known in that day is introduced into the poem, with some notice of its nature and worth; and thus, as often happens, a mere squib, written to amuse a gay circle, has become a valuable authority. It is impossible not to regret that some of the beautiful laces that once existed should have become extinct; but it must be admitted that when we read of the exquisite Brussels point made only of one kind of flax, which had to be spun in a dark, underground cellar, as neither air nor light could be admitted to it, and the worker could only touch, not see, the threads, we feel that even "The Song of the Shirt" hardly records greater cruelty to human beings, and our modern machine-made laces find more favour in our eyes. Many people are acquainted with old "caterpillar point," so called from the pattern having some faint resemblance to the bodies of those animals; but comparatively few have heard of the modern caterpillar lace, whereby an ingenious gentleman on the Continent has induced caterpillars to become unconscious lace-makers. For the particulars of this process, we refer our readers to the Dictionary. Considering the harmless purposes to which lace is usually applied, it seems hard that any human beings should ever have lost their lives for making it, and yet such was actually the case under the Reign of Terror in France, when the greater number of the Chantilly lacemakers were guillotined, apparently for no crime but that of having supplied a luxury to the hated aristocrats.

England never seems to have excelled in lace-making, but her embroidery was at one time renowned, till the Wars of the Roses disturbed the trade, and the Reformation, by giving the death-blow to ecclesiastical needle-work, at length almost extinguished it. An odd form of English embroidery lingered on, however, for some years, and is seen in the miniatures done with human hair; those of Charles I. were especially popular; locks of his hair were sold for the purpose, and portraits of him still exist done in this way by enthusiastic Royalist ladies. Later on, a kind of knitting made of hair was much valued, specially when it was grey, and there was a period during this century when hideous ornaments of hair were worn; but, excepting bracelets, all such have now passed away.

Most kinds of work, and even of materials, known in Great Britain seem to have been introduced from the Continent; the well-known Irish poplin is said to have been originally made in Avignon, where it was called "papeline," in compliment to the Pope, and the Spaniards claim the credit of having introduced knitting into the Shetland Isles at the time of the Armada; but the art was certainly known in England before then. It is curious that knitting, now such a universal accomplishment, and so long popular among the lower orders, should have been so slow in making its way into the higher circles in England; and we have always been inclined to suspect that the "tricoteuses" of the French Revolution created a prejudice against the work here, which it required German influence to overcome.

The Dictionary of Needlework has increased its value considerably by admitting into its columns the names of all materials that are or ever have been worked by the needle or the loom, and many curious stories are connected with these. For instance, one, that will be new to many, is the alleged origin of the many-coloured or "slashed" garb of the Swiss soldiers, still preserved in the Papal Guard at Rome, which is said to have originated at the battle of Nancy, in 1477. The Swiss, having fought against and routed the Duke of Burgundy, tore the gay silk hangings of his tents to pieces, and returned home in triumph, wearing caps, doublets, &c., all of different colours; and in memory of this brilliant and decisive victory, the soldiers adopted the "slashed" and parti-coloured dresses.

Superstition has always been particularly busy with wearing apparel of all kinds, as, for instance, in the well-known story of Charles I. of England having been crowned in white, instead of the proper regal purple, which was considered at the time very unlucky, and remembered with additional horror when he had been "buried in white," i.e., in a pall covered with snow. Gloves have been applied to many purposes, both of war and love, besides their immediate and obvious one; and they have a connection with death not known to every one, for, in parts of the north country, white-paper ones are still hung up in churches to the memory of deceased persons, in token of their having lived and died "with clean hands." Can the custom of giving gloves at funerals be in any way connected with this?

The word "haberdashery" is stated in this volume to be derived from the German "tauscher," "one who sells trifling wares," which may be correct; but a great authority on German literature forty years ago was wont pleasantly to declare that the name originated in the shop showing such a variety of objects, that people who wanted anything went in to inquire, "Haber das hier?" whence "haberdasher!" a derivation likely to be remembered by all who heard it, though possibly not admitted by modern philology.

The Dictionary is, as far as we have observed, marred by but few mistakes. A quotation from Shakespeare is referred to the wrong play, and in a list of ecclesiastical colours, the Sarum Use only is given, omitting the Roman, which is, on the whole, better known; also there are a few errors, which are noticed in a list of errata at the end. But the dedication to the Princess Louise is a guarantee for the work being well and carefully done, and we trust that our readers will, by personal study, confirm our high opinion of it.

THE task accomplished by Mr. Tuckerman was at one time projected by Mr. Anthony Trollope. That he would have written a highly entertaining volume is not open to doubt. It is of no slight advantage to have the judgment of an accomplished novelist on his predecessors in the art of fiction. He would treat of a subject especially interesting to him, and unconsciously, perhaps, would be led to contrast his own method of work with that of the writers whom he criticises. Mr. Trollope did this in his account of Thackeray, and Thackeray himself, by criticisms and parodies, has given us some very significant indications of his views about novel-writing. In spite of the three new novels published weekly in London, and of the six which appear within the same brief space in Paris, good fictions are comparatively rare, and a great work of the kind is as uncommon as a great poem. Mr. Tuckerman's History shows the truth of this statement. It is premature, if not impossible, to decide upon the ultimate position of living novelists, but it is evident that the greatest popularity during a novel-writer's life time or century does not secure him from ultimate neglect. Of this, Richardson's novels afford a striking illustration. His reputation, not only in his own country, but on the Continent, was of no ordinary kind. Statesmen, bishops, and moralists combined with all the ladies of England in praising Pamela, Clarissa Harlowe, and Sir Charles Grandison; and abroad, the old bookseller's stories were translated into German, French, and Dutch. Diderot raved over Clarissa Harlowe, and said that her creator would rest in the same class with Homer and Sophocles, "to be read alternately;" while Klopstock's wife called the book heavenly. Heavenly, too, was the story of the virtuous Pamela, which Sherlock recommended from the pulpit, and which, according to one critic, was likely to do more good than twenty volumes of sermons; while another declared that if all other books were to be burnt, Pamela and the Bible should be preserved. What Dr. Johnson said in favour of Richardson everybody knows, and admirers of the novelist are familiar also with the exclamation of Macaulay, "Not read Clarissa! If you have once thoroughly entered on Clarissa, and are infected by it, you can't leave it." Here is praise, coming from widely different quarters, of a novelist whose name is still familiar, but whose works are almost unheeded. Ladies in our day do not keep Pamela on their dressing-tables, they no longer, like Lady Bradshaigh, weep bitter tears in the daytime and wake up crying at night over the woes of Clarissa.

Of Richardson, we shall have more to say presently. At present, we will confine our attention to Mr. Tuckerman's History. The author's first chapter, the "Romance of Chivalry," is illustrated by an account of the Morte d'Arthur. In the following chapter, he discovers the special characteristics of the English novel as it is now written in the works of Chaucer, who is assuredly an incomparable story-teller in verse. More's Utopia, Sidney's Arcadia, Lyly's Euphues, Greene's Pandocto, the source of Shakespeare's Winter Tale, and his Philomela, the principal incident of which, as the writer might have observed, is to be found also in Cymbeline and other early romances, are criticised briefly and fairly. In this portion of the book, however, we find little to call for comment. It has neither novelty nor originality to recommend it, and the utmost to be said in favour of the earlier chapters is that they compress within a small compass what has been told again and again on a larger scale.

Mrs. Behn, the "female Wycherley," whose stories are among the grossest of a gross age, probably deserves the honour of originating the modern novel, for her Oroonoko, as Mr. Tuckerman points out, "is worthy of notice, as one of the earliest attempts on the part of an English novelist to deal with characters which had come under the writer's observation in actual life;" and he adds that it is still more important "on account of the presence within it of a didactic purpose, a characteristic which, for good or evil, has been a prominent feature of the novel in this country. While English narrative fiction was still in its first youth, Mrs. Behn protested against the evils of the slave-trade, through the medium of a story which may be considered a forerunner of Uncle Tom's Cabin. Another and even less reputable female novelist, Mrs. Manley, claimed for her father the authorship of the first volume of the Turkish Spy, and states in her Adventures of Rivella that a certain Dr. Midgley, a relative of the family, found the manuscript, and added to it seven volumes, "without ever having the justice to name the author of the first." According to another report, the addition was not the work of Midgley, but of a hack writer whom he employed. Hallam, who discusses this question carefully, gives no credit to Mrs. Manley, on the ground that the first volume was certainly written by Marana; but he has little doubt that the succeeding volumes were of English origin. The question is not without interest, but Mr. Tuckerman, strange to say, makes no allusion to it.

It is remarkable, as Hallam has pointed out, what a strange scarcity of original fiction existed in England up to the close of the seventeenth century. In the eighteenth, the novel took a conspicuous place in literature. Addison in his charming sketches, and Steele in a smaller measure, produced life-like characters, and gave the town a taste for fiction. In 1712, Addison records the death of Sir Roger de Coverley; in 1719, Robinson Crusoe appeared, and Defoe, having discovered thus late in life his craft as a novelist, wrote in rapid succession a number of tales, the coarseness of which forms a strange contrast to the purity and beauty of his first great fiction. At least nine works, either wholly or partially fictitious, were published by Defoe before 1726, in which year Gulliver's Travels appeared. From that date, we believe, no important novel was issued until the publication of Richardson's Pamela, in 1740. That there was a strong taste for fiction in the country is evident from the extraordinary success of Richardson, Fielding, Smollett, Goldsmith, and Fanny Burney, in the latter half of the century. In the earlier half, the fiction-loving public were but meagrely served.

The extreme coarseness of the age is exhibited with the utmost vividness in the novels of Richardson and Fielding, and with still more grossness in the Roderick Random and Peregrine Pickle of Smollett. Defoe is also so intolerable in this respect, that the very titles of some of his works cannot now be read aloud in the presence of ladies. Yet all these writers, and even their predecessor, Mrs. Behn, declare their purpose to be distinctly moral, and protest that they have written nothing that can offend the chastest ear. Fully to describe the plots of some of these stories, Moll Flanders and Roxana, for example, would be impossible in modern English; and both Richardson and Fielding act their parts as moralists by exhibiting highly-coloured pictures of vice. It is but just, however, to say that vice is never, as in our refined days, so confounded with virtue that the reader is led to consider the difference between them insignificant. The "hot, day-dreamy sentimentality" of Richardson, to quote the expression of Coleridge, and the licentious scenes of Joseph Andrews and Tom Jones, are probably far less evil in tendency than the works of some living writers mentioned by Mr. Tuckerman, "issued by respectable publishers, and often written by women," the subject being the unlawful gratification of the passions. "Bigamy, seduction, adultery," adds the writer, "are the incidents on which the story turns, and an effort is always made by the novelist to give to the sinners as attractive and interesting an aspect as possible, and to hold up any respectable people who may appear in the book to the contempt and derision of the reader." This is true with regard to some of the novels mentioned by the critic, and it is not true of the best characters invented by Richardson and Fielding. Clarissa, Harriet Byron, Clementina, that highly proper prig Sir Charles Grandison, Mr. Allworthy, Parson Adams, and Amelia excite feelings very different from those of contempt and derision. On the whole, the vicious suffer, and the virtuous are rewarded; and yet it cannot be denied that the amusement gained from these novelists is gained in a great degree either from the humorous description of doubtful situations, or from the minute portrayal of scenes unfitted for the public eye. Of such scenes, Richardson is fond, and he is fond also of moralising upon them; but it is possible, such is the perversity of human nature, that the picture may sometimes make a stronger impression than the moral.

Fielding is better known in our day than Richardson, and a splendid edition of his works, edited by Mr. Leslie Stephen, has recently been published. Mr. Tuckerman thinks that the coarseness of his novels "may unfit them for the perusal of very young people." But he defends him from the charge of immorality, and observes, with unnecessary iteration, that he describes life as he had seen it, and that if his novels "were more pure, they would be less valuable from an historical point of view, less true to nature, and therefore less artistic." To this assertion the moralist might reply that there is a truth to nature the faithful representation of which can do good to nobody, and that Fielding, while disgusting us with the hypocrisy of Blifil, does not disgust his readers, which, as a moralist, he professes to do, with the debaucheries of Tom Jones. On the contrary, we are made to hate the former and to condone the faults of the latter. It is but fair to point out, however, as Mr. Tuckerman does, that this great novelist's broad descriptions of vice did not offend the readers of his own age, neither were the elaborate representations of Richardson less acceptable. In the correspondence between Miss Carter and Miss Talbot, the latter writes how she once heard a lady wish with all her heart that her son were like Tom Jones. Miss Talbot's uncle was the Bishop of Oxford, and under his roof Clarissa Harlowe was read aloud to the family at set hours, much to the admiration of the young lady. She detests Tom Jones, which her friend does not, but allows, "there are in it things which must touch and please every good heart." Joseph Andrews is recommended to Miss Carter, who thanks Miss Talbot for the "perfectly agreeable entertainment." "It contains," she writes, "such a surprising variety of nature, wit, morality, and good-sense, as is scarcely to be met with in any one composition, and there is such a spirit of benevolence runs through the whole as I think renders it peculiarly charming."

Mr. Tuckerman enlarges on the merits of Fielding and Smollett, but for some later novelists his praise is confined within the narrowest limits. Some pages, indeed, are allotted to Mrs. Radcliffe, but Miss Austen is dismissed in a few lines. The latter part of the book is shallow, and indeed useless, for the impossible attempt is made to criticise Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, Lytton, George Eliot, and other well-known English and American novelists, in a single chapter. Every reader will find something to interest him in this History, and possibly something to annoy him, for although the book is published in London, its orthography is not English, but American.

It is, perhaps, a bold venture of Messrs. Sotheran and Co., to publish a fine library edition of Richardson's works. Mr. Leslie Stephen's critical introduction is a reprint, with additions and alterations, of his essay on the subject in the first series of Hours in a Library. It is an admirable criticism, but scarcely calculated to promote the sale of Pamela, the "gigantic tract," which, in his judgment, is beyond all comparison the worst of Richardson's works, and succeeds neither in being moral nor amusing. It describes, as all the world knows, the licentious pursuit of a servant-girl by her master, and might have possessed the virtues of a tract, had Pamela not only retained her virtue, but her freedom. In loving the man who had tried to ruin her, and in marrying the reformed rake at last, she sinks from the highest level of virtue. Her resistance is rewarded by wealth and reputation, and that kind of reward takes off, in our judgment, the fine edge of her purity.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Monte Rosa: the Epic of an Alp. By Starr H. Nicholls. (Houghton, Mifflin, and Co., Boston, U.S.)—There is too much of the tour de force about this poem. Mr. Nicholls has spent a vast amount of ingenuity on the history of geologic change, the description of Alpine scenery, and the analysis of a mountain-climber's feelings; but the ingenuity is too manifest. Too often we see not the genuine poetic fire, but the fireworks, so to speak, of a clever artificer. Sometimes we have true imagination, but at least as often an extravagant and ill-regulated fancy; a fine idea is too frequently succeeded by a strange or even ludicrous conceit. When the slope of a mountain becomes less abrupt, we are told that it

"Presently sublines its hurried rise,
As breathless with the pace."

Clouds on the mountain-side are "gypsy" clouds, "strolling adventurers from the teeming sea;" landscapes are "bare as scientific faiths;" the snow hinders the steps, "as feathery scruples clog ambition's way." When the travellers return from the ascent,—

"Gravitation, like a guardian nurse
Holding small hands, lets down their lengthened steps."

Notwithstanding all this, this Epic of an Alp contains some really noble passages, passages which make us hope that Mr. Nicholls, when he has disciplined his fancy, shaken off his affectations, and pruned the dangerous luxuriance of his diction, will do some really good work. Here is a fine summary of the earlier ages of the world's history:—

"And that unlettered time slipped on,
Saw tropic climes invade the polar rings,
Then polar cold lay waste the tropic marge;
Saw monster beasts emerge in ooze and air,
And run their race, and stow their bones in clay;
Saw the bright gold bedew the elder rocks,
And all the gems grow crystal in their caves;
Saw plant wax quick and stir to moving worm,
And worm more upward, reaching toward the brute:
Saw brute by habit fit himself with brain,
And startle earth with wondrous progeny;
Saw all of these, and still saw no true man.
For man was not, or still so lowly was,
That as a little child his thoughts were weak,—
Weak and forgetful, and of nothing worth;
And Nature stormed along her changeable ways,
Unheeded, undescribed, the while man slept
Infolded in his germ, or with fierce brutes,
Himself but brutal, waged a pigmy war,
Unclad as they, and with them housed in caves,
Nor knew that sea retired or mountain rose."

Here, again, is a fine vindication of Alpine climbing:—

"Yet blame no blame for daring rash to death!
For while brave men have sons will deeds be done
That show the perilous mettle of bold sires;
And still the fearless is the nobler race,
Apter for life and fitter for rude truth,
Prolific of such men as seek the Pole,
Or brave the savage in hot Africa's glades,
Give law at home, or colonise new lands,
And carry Europe to the farthest isles.
Of such a blood, the youth will pluck the beard
Of wolfish Death, within his dabbled lair,
To get their way, laughing his threats to scorn;
And some he quickly slays, who else had died
Obscure in later painful bodes at home.
But men are born enough to spare a waste
In heroes, whose far-shining names undimmed,
Bound on the withering forehead of the time,
Shall give it lustre to the latest age."

Some of these lines are musical and sonorous enough; others, that we find scattered about, quite defy our powers of scanning, e.g.:—

"Flames and glory through all the curtained vapors."
"Legions move on soundless, on retarding wing."
"Ourselves the priceless stake—'gainst nothing."

And there are far too many alexandrines, the use of which great metrists very seldom permit themselves.

Bristol, Past and Present. By J. F. Nicholls and John Taylor. Vol. III. (J. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol; Griffith and Farran, London.)—This third volume brings to a conclusion this interesting account of Bristol. The period of history which it includes begins with the Civil War, and is carried down to the present time. The city stood two sieges, and suffered not a little in the second, when Prince Rupert surrendered it to Fairfax. It accepted the Puritan rule with willingness, but was not backward in welcoming the King in 1660. Thenceforward its domestic history continues to be full of interest, culminating, perhaps, in the famous riots, which the obstinacy of Sir Thomas Wetherell excited, and the incredible supineness of the authorities, civil and military, suffered to grow to such a height. The Bristol mob has been at least as riotous as that of any other English city. We may say, perhaps, that this tendency is only the dark side of the very strongly marked character of the place. Few have had so many public-spirited citizens. When the authors reach 1830, they interpolate a chapter dealing with the streets, domestic architecture, and public institutions of the city. This is remarkably full of interest, and presents a very creditable picture of public spirit and enterprise. In the account of University College, Bristol, credit should have been given to the liberal support afforded to that institution by Balliol and New Colleges. The volume is, like its predecessors, adorned with an abundance of excellent illustrations.

THEOLOGY.—The Parabolic Teaching of Christ. By Alexander Balmain Bruce. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—This "systematic and critical study" is a book which all students of theology should welcome. Professor Bruce brings to his task the learning, the diligence, and the liberal and finely sympathetic spirit which are the best gifts of an expositor of Scripture. Here is an admirable comment on those mysterious words which seem to say that the purpose of the parable was to darken the minds of those who heard it:—"We must be careful not to misunderstand the temper in which such words might be spoken by Jesus, or by any true servant of God. No true prophet could utter such words in cold-blood as the expression of a deliberate purpose. All prophets desire to illumine, soften, and save, not to darken, harden, and destroy; and without entering into the mystery of Divine decrees, we may add, God sends his prophets for no other purpose, whatever the foreseen effects of their labour may be. But a prophet like Isaiah may, nevertheless, feel as if he were sent, and represent himself as sent, for the opposite purpose. And when he does so, it is not in the way of expressing direct aim or deliberate intention, but in irony and in the bitterness of despairing and frustrated love. Baffled love in bitter irony announces as its aim the very opposite of what it works for, and it does so in the hope of provoking its infatuated objects to jealousy, and so defeating its own prophecy." Professor Bruce divides the Parables into three classes: Theoretic Parables, Parables of Grace, and Parables of Judgment; and he supplements each book with a study of what he calls "parable-germs," short parable utterances, such as that about "the Wise and the Foolish Builders," and "the New Patch on the Old Garment." His treatment of his subject is vigorous and original, and, though he is evidently well read in the literature which belongs to it, he avoids the capital mistake of overlaying his exegesis with a mass of other men's views.—A Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles to the Corinthians. By Joseph Agar Beet. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—This is a very full and elaborate commentary, marked by all the diligence and erudition which Mr. Beet, by his similar work on the "Epistle to the Romans," had before shown himself to possess. The writer is well acquainted with the newest results of criticism, and deals with them in a candid and judicious spirit. Some of his conclusions we cannot accept (e.g., his interpretation of the "sowing" of the natural body, in I. Corinthians, xv., as referring to burial), but they are always well weighed and powerfully defended. Some very useful supplementary matter is added,—comparisons of the Epistles with that written to the Roman Church and with the "Acts of the Apostles," dissertations on the "Chronology of the Three Epistles" and on "Paul and the Church at Corinth," and an appendix descriptive of Clement's "Epistle to the Corinthians." We hope that in a new edition he will rearrange his matter into a more convenient form, and will add to his own translation (which, however valuable in point of scholarship, is so cumbersome and harsh as to be repulsive to an ordinary reader), the text of either the Authorised or the Revised Version.—The Polity of the Christian Church, by Alexius Aurelius Pellicia. Translated from the Latin by Rev. J. C. Bellett, M.A. (Masters and Co.)—This very elaborate book, the work of a Neapolitan theologian of the last century, deals with the ritual and discipline of the Church, early, mediæval, and modern. The writer is admirably candid. While thoroughly loyal to Rome, he never attempts to claim for any peculiarly Roman practice an antiquity which does not belong to it. He thinks, for instance, that the withholding of the cup from the laity was done for "very just reasons," but he does not pretend that it was done before the fifteenth century. He admits that in "old times the Liturgy was celebrated in the vernacular or vulgar tongue," though he attributes the Roman practice to "great zeal for the honour of the worship of God." The translator very rightly commends the work to his readers on this ground, and draws a conclusion which, to those who think with him, must have an irresistible force,—that it is well to know "whether this or that point of ritual, about which we, perhaps, individually feel strongly, is Catholic or not; whether, as being Catholic and primitive, its retention in our Prayer-book must be contended for at any cost, or whether, as being merely local or mediæval, it may well be abandoned, for the sake of peace." The vestments would disappear. During the first three centuries, clergy and laity wore the same garb, though differing in colour; and no colour but white was used till the ninth century. The chasuble was worn by the laity up to the sixth century. In its present form, it dates from the sixteenth. The biretta is equally modern.—The Jesuits: a Complete History of the Order. By Theodore Griesinger. Translated by A. J. Scott, M.D. 2 vols. (W. H. Allen and Co.)—This is a very fierce attack on the Society of Jesus. To examine it in detail would be to go far beyond our present limits, and we must be content with chronicling its first appearance in English. The book was originally published in 1866.—Faith Victorious: the Life and Labours of Dr. Johann Ebel, by J. L. Mombert, D.D. (Hodder and Stoughton), gives a curious picture of one side of religious life in Germany. Dr. Ebel was "Archdeacon of the old Town Church of Königsberg," and belonged, it seems, to what may be called the pietistic school. He was fiercely and, if his biographer is to be trusted, wholly unjustly attacked by the Liberals, among whom the commentator Olshausen is mentioned. A curious exhibition of their animosity (here, again, we depend on Dr. Mombert's authority) was to bring about the demolition of the ancient church in which he officiated.—At about the opposite pole of Christian biography, we find Lacordaire's Life of St. Dominic, translated by Mrs. Edward Hazeland (Burns and Oates), a work too well known to need criticism.—The Evidences of Natural Religion, by Charles McArthur (Hodder and Stoughton), is an argument of considerable ability, conducted, for the most part, on the familiar lines, but dealing in more detail than is usual with the scientific facts that bear on the question.—With this work we may mention Intimations of Immortality, by W. Garrett Horder. (Eliot Stock.) Mr. Horder has collected here a number of facts and expressions of belief bearing on the subject. One chapter he devotes to "Intimations from the Unseen Realm," not without good reason, we think. One well-established instance, say, of the appearance of the dying in some remote place, commonly called the "wraith," would be a tremendous blow to Materialism. It is a fact that the Materialists refuse to examine the evidence on this subject.—In Defence: the Earlier Scriptures, by H. Sinclair Patterson, M.D. (J. F. Shaw), is a contribution to Christian apologetics which will doubtless be satisfactory to those who occupy what may be called the right wing of orthodoxy.—The Millennium, by the late H. T. Adamson, B.D. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.), deals with speculations into which we cannot profess to follow the writer.—The Hope of the World, by Walter Lloyd (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.), states without any reserve the doctrine of Universalism. We cannot but think that the writer is far too dogmatic, and that he neglects to take into account much that is found in the teaching of Christ and the Apostles. Mr. Lloyd cannot get beyond the conclusion that the final judgment will bring the wicked to shame and repentance. This does not seem to account for all that we read in the New Testament, and we must say that a rational faith in the "Larger Hope" is anything but strengthened by such extremes.—We may commend to such as may be looking for such a book an excellent little volume of sermons for the young, under the title of St. George for England, and other Sermons to Children, by the Rev. T. Teignmouth Shore, M.A. (Cassell and Co.)

NOVELS.—Miss Elvestor's Girls. By the Author of "By-ways." 3 vols. (Tinsley Brothers.)—There is no lack of good work in this novel, but far too many "passages that lead to nothing." The tipsy man at the railway-station with his belongings is described with detail that makes us think him destined for a character in the story; but he disappears. The same way of writing is pursued throughout. The author would, we are sure, be surprised at the result, if she would take her pen and strike out whatever in these eight hundred pages does not assist in the development of the story. A really artistic novel loses nothing, or next to nothing, by such a process. Here the story is very slight. Miss Elvestor is the half-sister of three beautiful girls, who are suddenly reduced to poverty by the ruin of their father, a great man in Shetland. Of Shetland, the first chapter gives us a very lively sketch. The second takes the reader away, and to his great regret, he is never permitted to return. Thenceforward, we are occupied with the love-affairs of the two elder girls, and with the humours of the third, a child just about to enter on her teens, who is decidedly the most amusing of the three. These love-affairs are sufficiently well described, but have nothing striking or original about them. We cannot help thinking that Christian's behaviour, when she fancies that her husband had married her from a sense of duty, rather than from love, is somewhat absurd. Still, as it gives occasion for what are certainly the best scenes in the story, it is unreasonable to quarrel with it. If the author can only contrive to invent a real plot, she may well, with her power of description, of character-drawing, and of lively dialogue, write a really good novel.—A Passion Flower. 2 vols. (Macmillan.)—This might be described as a study of heredity. There are three "passion flowers," each more intense in colour than the last. First, there is Myrrha, half-Italian, half-gipsy, who becomes the incongruous wife of a Scotch minister; then Myrrha's daughter, who elopes with a young Frenchman, and contracts a marriage, which turns out to be no marriage, at Gretna Green; finally, Myrrha's daughter's daughter, the "passion-flower" par excellence, who also elopes, but without any form of marriage. These three heroines are not attractive or interesting, but there is more to be said in praise of some of the subordinate characters of the story. Some real ability has been thrown away, as we cannot but think, on an unpromising subject. If this is a first attempt, as we gather from the blank title-page, it is not without promise for the future.—Lemuel; or, the Romance of Politics. By the Author of "Cynthia." 2 vols. (Tinsley Brothers.)—This is a bold, not to say audacious, imitation of the novels of Lord Beaconsfield. Lemuel is a young Jew, who at twenty-one has come to believe in nothing, though he is still an enthusiastic admirer of his own race. An accident makes him acquainted with two great ladies. He is introduced to people of influence, becomes private secretary to a Cabinet Minister and inspires him with knowledge and eloquence, supplants him in his own borough, makes a maiden speech the opening of which is a ludicrous failure and the end a triumphant success, enters the Cabinet before he is thirty, abandons public life under the pressure of an overwhelming grief, and disappears from the scene as a Jesuit missionary among some anthropophagous savages. The story is often grotesquely improbable, but it is told with some cleverness; the master, if so faulty a writer can be called a master, has been imitated with success. Smart things are said which look as if they had been transplanted from the pages of "Coningsby," but are, doubtless, the author's own. On the whole, though Lemuel cannot be said to be a book of real merit, it is a pleasing change from the insipidity and common-place of the average novel. What, by the way, is the meaning of "fecunda marmora locas?" (ii., 164.)

The Justices' Note-Book. By W. Knox Wigram. Third edition. (Stevens and Sons.)—Justices' justice, however much it be despised, affects every one, and makes advances, like everything else. We are, therefore, very glad to see a third edition of this excellent book. Old articles in it have been recast, papers on fresh subjects have been added, and an excellent index has been provided. Even as improved, justice sometimes wears a comic look, as on p. 128, where we learn that, "No person may part with, or cherish, the Colorado beetle alive, in any stage of existence. Penalty for every offence of omission, or commission, £10; half to the informer."—After the statute of 1882, a new edition of Griffith's Married Women's Property Acts (Stevens and Haynes), was called for. Mr. S. Worthington Bromfield, of the Inner Temple, has made the necessary alterations in this, the fifth, edition.

Letts's Complete Popular Atlas. (Letts, Son, and Co., Limited.)—This is an unusually complete popular atlas, with many definite merits and a few patent defects. The maps, to begin with, are printed on faced linen, which will not tear,—an immense advantage, as all who use maps constantly well know. Then there are a great many of them, the object being to give minute as well as general maps of each country. Thus there are no less than twelve maps of India, in one of which the reader will find every State of Rajpootana, with its boundaries, and in another the counties of Eastern Bengal. Most of the maps are very clear, while the plans of the great cities, which are inserted as maps, are often exceptionally good. To each map, moreover, are added great quantities of statistical information as to areas, populations, and trading resources, the two former being especially valuable and well arranged. The reader, for instance, who wishes to study the map of the United States will find, in addition to all that is usually given, complete statistics of the area and population, electoral rights, and railway mileage of each State, and gain thus a much-wanted notion of its relative importance. How many who read about America are aware that Texas is nearly five times the size of England and Wales, or that New York is 15,000 square miles larger than Ireland, or that Massachusetts is only one and a half Yorkshires, or that most of the new Western States and Territories are double the size of England? The information is brought up to the latest date, is closely packed, and clearly printed, the only fault, if any, being that it is redundant. We do not care ourselves for statistics of imports and exports on a map, and when we want to know where esparto grass comes from should seek information elsewhere than in an atlas. Facts of that kind, moreover, fluctuate a little too rapidly, and one cannot always be buying new atlases. On the other hand, one or two of the maps are by no means clear, e.g., 114, the Statistical Map of the Dominion, in which it takes fine eyes to find anything; the counties in the United States have, after an American fashion, been made annoyingly prominent; and in Map 101, otherwise very clear and good, the statistics of exports have been put down in the middle of Eastern Arabia in the most confusing fashion, the effect being that the reader loses the whole geographical effect of the huge mass of Arabia. These are details, however, and Messrs. Letts's Atlas may be pronounced a durable and exhaustive one, full of maps, clearly drawn, clearly printed—e.g., Map 103—and very boldly coloured.

BOOKS RECEIVED:—Record of the University Boat-Race, 1829-80, &c. Compiled by G. G. T. Treherne and J. H. D. Goldie. (Bickers and Son.)—Longfellow's Poetical Works (Routledge and Sons), the author's complete copyright edition, containing seventy-eight poems which are the sole property of the publishers, and sixteen engravings by Sir J. Gilbert.—Street's Indian and Colonial Mercantile Directory (Street and Co., and Street Brothers), the ninth annual issue of a directory we should imagine to be as useful to merchants and shippers as is the London Directory to ordinary business men.—Burdett's Official Intelligence for 1883 (Effingham Wilson), the information given in which is published under the sanction of the Committee of the Stock Exchange.—The Official Year-book of the Church of England. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.)—The Medical Register for 1883, and the Dentists' Register. (Spottiswoode and Co.)—The Clergy List for 1883.—The Traveller's Practical Guide, by S. E. Welby. (Sonnenschein and Co.)—A seventh edition of Clocks and Watches, by Sir E. Beckett (Crosby Lockwood and Co.), being No. 67 in the technical section of "Weale's Series."—An Illustrated Shakespeare Birthday-book. (Routledge and Sons.)

MUSIC.—We have received:—Invocation to Harmony, composed by the late Prince Consort, words by H. Rose; and Dr. Stainer's Tutor for the American Organ. (Metzler and Co.)—Harold, a cantata for the harmonium, by A. E. Dyer. (Wood and Co.)

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

SIR GEORGE JESSEL, Master of the Rolls, and head of the Court of Appeal, died early on Wednesday morning, after a dangerous illness of some weeks, during only the last two days of which did he consent to remit any of his usual work. Sir George was by common consent the ablest Judge on the Bench, and the ablest probably in the annals of English history, if, at least, the rapid despatch of business be taken into account, as well as the soundness of the judgments and the breadth of the legal principles embodied in them. Less brilliant than many other Judges of his time in mere form, he far surpassed most, if not all, of them in the rapidity and efficiency of his judicial work. As a barrister, he had few equals, and we have heard, on what we believe to be good authority, that during the last twelve months of his Solicitor-Generalship,—a year of strain which no doubt permanently affected his constitution,—his fees amounted to the enormous total of £23,000. Moreover, Sir George Jessel's work was never superficially done, and during the latter years of his judicial work he undertook the duties of Vice-Chancellor of his own University, the University of London, which he discharged with extraordinary fidelity and ability. He died at the age of fifty-nine. The late Judge was absolutely faithful to his hereditary Jewish creed, and was buried yesterday in the Jewish cemetery at Willesden, among his own people.

On Monday the country was startled by hearing of a supposed Fenian outrage on Lady Florence Dixie, sister of the Marquis of Queensberry, and author of books showing that she is a courageous woman who is not afraid of danger. Walking near the grounds of the Fishery, the place of her husband, Sir Beaumont Dixie, two miles and a half from Windsor on the Maidenhead side, at about half-past four on Saturday last, she went through a gate into the grounds of their neighbour, Captain Brocklehurst, when she was followed by two very tall women, who at once pulled her down, one of them attempting to drive a long steel knife into her, which Lady Florence seized first with one hand and then with the other, so that it cut her gloves and her fingers. Two plunges of the knife were made, but each of them came on the whalebone of her stays, and neither wounded her, though her dress was cut. One of the women forced mould into her mouth to stop her cries. The St. Bernard dog, "Hubert," coming to the rescue, and the sound of wheels being heard, the men decamped; and Lady Florence, who had half fainted, recovered, and got back to the house in much disorder and terror. Sir Beaumont and the servants attest her exhausted condition, and the signs of dirt on her face and mouth; and Frederic Rowe, the butler of Colonel Harford, of Down Place, states that on passing the Fishery about four o'clock, he was startled to see two very tall women appear suddenly in the road, he could not tell from where, as he had seen no trace of them before, though he had been constantly looking back to see that some dogs with him did not fight. He thought that they must have come out of the stable-gate of the Willows,—Captain Brocklehurst's house, in the grounds of which Lady Florence was at the time of the alleged attack. This is as yet the only confirmation of the story from outside, the police having inquired in vain for any trace of the men disguised as women in the neighbourhood, though Saturday being market-day at Windsor, the road was much frequented. To one correspondent, Lady Florence described the white, set teeth, fierce eyes, and terrible demeanour of her assailant in very hysteric language, considering the infinitesimal amount of injury actually done. Of the blow on the head which Lady Florence felt, there is said to be now no trace.

The air is heavy with rumours of coming explosions, many of which are probably circulated in order to inspire alarm. Half the magazines and arsenals in the country are to be blown up, and the House of Commons is threatened by a new Guy Fawkes. Mr. St. Aubyn, Member for Helston, has received a letter, in a female handwriting, warning him not to attend Parliament for the first fortnight after Easter, because "the party" had resolved to blow up the House,—and, we suppose, the hundred Irish Members in it. They are to be blown to bits, for the good of Ireland. It is not probable that men who must be aware that Guy Fawkes's evil idea helped to rivet the chains of Catholics for two centuries, contemplate any such wickedness; but the Government thinks it right to guard every point of importance. Sentries and guards have been increased in number, 500 policemen have been added to the Metropolitan Force, never numerous enough for its daily enlarging duties, and Irish detectives have been brought over specially to watch the Secret Societies. We note also with strong disgust, but no surprise, that these alarms are creating great dislike to Irish workmen. Employers in Liverpool have begun to discharge them openly; the feeling in the North is rising high, and Mr. A. M. Sullivan, in the eloquent letter to the Irish Americans described below, says that already he has personal knowledge of hundreds of families rendered destitute. There is no justice and no policy in revenge of this sort, always directed, as it must be, against the wrong men; but the Irish leaders should note carefully the growing excitement.

Mr. A. M. Sullivan, writing to the American papers on February 24th,—i.e., three weeks before the explosion at the Local Government Office,—delivers a very sensible homily on the impolicy as well as the wickedness of the so-called "dynamite" outrages. He insists on the utter baseness of the plans of universal murder, and he also explains their frightful cruelty to the Irish residents in English cities. These Irish are, he says, already losing all their work and earnings, in consequence of the explosions at the Mansion House and in Salford, and of the comments of the "dynamite" Press in America on these explosions; so that these plots cost the Irish even more suffering than they cost the English. To these sensible and manly words, written last month, the attempt on the Local Government Office gives a completely new force, and we only trust that the Irish in America will profit by them, and instead of sending in more subscriptions to the weak and wicked men who advocate the use of dynamite, will take an early opportunity of marking their disgust at their counsels in some very emphatic and intelligible form. The dynamite that only injures English buildings, wrecks Irish hopes far and wide.

A reward of £1,000 has been offered to any person not a police agent who shall give such information as may lead to the detection of the author of the attempt made on Thursday week to explode the Local Government Office at Westminster, or the Times' office at Blackfriars. There was a rumour on Thursday that there had been in communication with the police a woman who remembered seeing the face of a person apparently trying to deposit something within the balustrades of the Local Government Office on Thursday week, and that this woman had such a clear look at him that she would know him again. If this be true, there may be a clue to the perpetrator of the outrage; but communications of this kind, made after the offer of very large rewards, must always be received with great reserve. Wrong guesses are not penal, and there is always some hope that, even if the full reward offered is not earned, there may be dribblets of advantage to be gained by a bold candidature for the greater prize.

Prince Bismarck has got rid of the last of the great group who have stood round his Emperor since 1870. General von Stosch, head of the German Admiralty, recently resigned, but the Emperor refused to receive his resignation. The "First Lord," however, found his position unbearable, and persisted till the Emperor let him go, firing after him, however, a General Order in which he not only praises General von Stosch for all his conduct, but specially thanks him "for the almost unhopèd-for way in which you have promoted the development of our young Navy." The truth is said to be that Prince Bismarck ordered General von Stosch to send four ironclads to Alexandria, so that German power might be appreciably felt, even by Great Britain. The General had not the ships ready, and said so; whereupon the Chancellor intimated, in the plainest German, an opinion that, if that were the case, the millions voted every year for the Fleet were wasted by General von Stosch. As Prince Bismarck is himself in favour of the counter-policy which has been pursued, of building smaller vessels first, and protecting German harbours and foreign trade, this is a little hard; but the Chancellor is irresistible, and the poor head of the Admiralty was compelled to go. If the Prince, in getting rid of these great officers, selected his own men, the result would secure, at all events, unity of administration; but this is not the case. The Emperor chooses everybody, and is by no means drawn towards his Chancellor's favourites.

Germany and Spain have declared a war of tariffs. The Commercial Treaty has expired, and Spain, pending a new one, has subjected German goods to the duties imposed on imports from all non-favoured nations. The German Federal Council, in revenge, has increased all duties on Spanish goods 50 per cent., and under a statute of July, 1879, this decree is law. The countries are therefore at war as to customs, with this delicious result:—Germany imports nothing from Spain which Spain cannot export through Genoa as Italian goods, except Havana and Manilla cigars. They cannot be disguised. Germany, therefore, stops nothing Spanish except cigars, and as they are the luxuries of the rich only, the extra duty will be paid, and Germany taxes only her own well-off classes. On the other hand, Spain imports nothing recognisable from Germany except some hocks, the extra duties on which will be paid with readiness. The total effect of the war, therefore, will be that commerce will be slightly embarrassed, that the St. Gothard Railway will gain a little, and that German and Spanish citizens will pay a little more to their own Treasuries than they did before. Each Power bites off a bit of its own nose, out of pure temper.

It is rumoured that M. de Lesseps will be able to carry out his plan of introducing the Mediterranean into the Sahara. The long line of "Chotts," or swampy salt lakes, stretching from Gabes eastward into Southern Tunis, are all some fifty feet below the sea, and are supposed to have once made part of a deep fiord. M. de Lesseps thinks he can let the water in again, and so create a lake ten times the size of the Lake of Geneva, alter the climate, and cleave a seaway into the back territory of Tunis. He only feared that below the sand covering the isthmus between the "Chotts" and the sea he might find rock. Personal investigation, with the help of his staff of engineers, has, however, convinced him that there is nothing but sand, and he now says success is certain. The practicability of the work seems prima facie probable, but the difficulty is to see any source of large permanent revenue. The force which heaped those sands must be heaping them still, the dredging work will be endless, and the commercial world is not burning to send goods to the Sahara. However, if M. de Lesseps announced his intention of bisecting Africa with a canal, which would be most desirable, money to commence the work would be found; so, we suppose, we shall see one more salt-water lake in the world. The British have a "Chott" of their own, the Chilka Lake, in Cuttack, which ought to provide the finest harbour on the Bay of Bengal; but there is no M. de Lesseps in India.

Sunday, the Communists' anniversary in Paris, passed off in perfect tranquillity. The Government contrived to convince the Anarchist leaders that, if necessary, they would act with energy, and that the troops had no sympathy with disorder. Any project of rioting which might have been entertained was, therefore, abandoned, the public places were deserted, and the meetings held were confined to private houses. It is said, however, that great numbers of respectable citizens quitted Paris; and the Government, while denying any general distress, admits its existence among carpenters and some branches of the building trade. They are to receive large orders from the State,—rather a weak policy, though pursued by every Government in turn. Its effect is to draw a crowd of picked workmen to Paris, where they find wages high and life amusing, and thus to stop the natural flux and reflux in the supply of labour. Nothing is more notable in the economic life of London than the rapidity with which the workmen in any decaying trade quit the capital for other cities. We were told, when the London shipbuilding trade suffered its last severe depression, that thirty thousand workmen glided away unnoticed in three months. In Paris, they would have demanded of M. de Mahé ships to build.

The office of Lord President of the Council, vacant by the resignation of Lord Spencer, who, however, does not quit the Cabinet, has been bestowed upon Lord Carlingford; and the Privy Seal will, it is generally believed, be taken by Lord Rosebery, whose keen intelligence and knowledge of the world will make him an addition to the Cabinet. Lord Carlingford, it is further announced, will perform all the duties of a Minister for Agriculture. If they are to be made serious, the next step ought to be the change of the Education Department into a responsible and separate Ministry of Education, with its chief not necessarily in the Cabinet, but not excluded from it, as he now is. Mr. Gladstone, however, when questioned on this subject on Tuesday, gave little hope of such a change being speedily made. He said he thought the subject too large to be dealt with just now, considering its complications, and the heavy calls upon the time of Government. No harm will arise from the postponement while the Department is in the hands of Mr. Mundella, who, we regret to see, is seriously ill; but there is always inconvenience in patronage lodging in one hand, while power resides in another; and a Minister is more responsible for expenditure than a Vice-President. The Education Office is rapidly taking rank as a great spending Department.

The Transvaal debate was continued on Friday in an able, vigorous, and occasionally very bitter speech from Mr. Forster, who considered that the Government had pledged itself to the Bechuanas, and ought to defend them, even if necessary, by war. If England once admitted that it was unable to protect allies, it would enter on a course of policy the logical conclusion of which was the surrender of India. He utterly denied the inability of the Transvaal Government to suppress outrages, and declared that "at least it was strong enough to defy her Majesty's Government, and to treat its representatives with contempt." Mr. Forster's speech called up Mr. Gladstone, who began by saying that "a man of peace had preached the doctrine of war." He specially doubted the power of the Transvaal Government to control its subjects, and maintained that in its essence the Bechuana grievances arose out of intertribal war, and could be remedied, if the chiefs would but unite to resist aggression from the Transvaal. (This has since been done.) His main contention, however, was that the Convention, while it certainly gave us the right to interfere, did not impose on us the obligation of interference. If it had done so, every native chief could, when hard pressed, summon British arms to his aid. The Government would do whatever was practicable, but it would not undertake a work which might carry annexation up to the Equator. The debate ended without a vote, and is to be resumed after Easter.

Mr. Smith, the Member for Westminster, has brought Sir W. Harcourt down on him. Mr. Smith, in a speech to his electors on March 19th, taunted the Liberal Government with having brought matters "to such a pass that they could hardly walk the streets of London or sleep in their beds without the most vigilant attention on the part of the police." Sir W. Harcourt, with all official information before him, declares that in December, 1867, Lord Beaconsfield took far more stringent precautions, among others, enrolling more than 100,000 special constables, in addition to the Police; and was so deeply impressed by the dangers around him, that "his frequent and graphic warnings on the subject of Secret Societies were founded on his experience of that epoch." That is, when we remember "Lothair" and its Sibylline utterances, a very curious bit of literary history. It was imagined at the time that Lord Beaconsfield based his argument upon the experience of Italy, where the Secret Societies undoubtedly compelled Napoleon to intervene. He had, however, nearer means of information. Sir W. Harcourt is evidently very angry with Mr. Smith, and talks of his "hardihood," but we hardly see much reason for his wrath. The necessity for so much precaution does indicate failure of some sort; and failure is always attributed by political speakers to the Government of the day. Lord Beaconsfield failed too, and a good many more governments will fail, before in Ireland, "the wicked, the Invincibles, cease from troubling, and the weary, the English, are at rest." Some day the Irish will become "weary" too, and then the "wicked" will learn how gentle English rule really was.

Mr. Bright addressed the students of Glasgow University on Thursday, as the Lord Rector of their choice, in an address marked by some magnificent passages of his familiar style of eloquence. His subject was the misery and cost of the useless wars of this century,—all wars being to his mind useless wars, and, of course, from some point of view really being so, since, if both the combatants were reasonable and just, they would think alike, and therefore never go to war. Mr. Bright, however, spoke as if it would have been enough to prevent all the wars in which we have been engaged, had we alone been reasonable and just, without regard to the reason and justice of our antagonists,—an assumption difficult to admit. Suppose, for instance, that the Northern States of America had been perfectly reasonable and perfectly just in 1861,—which Mr. Bright probably holds to be more or less true,—how could that have prevented the secession of the slave-holders, and, therefore, how could it have prevented the war?

Mr. Bright maintains that since the beginning of the century, £4,414,000,000 sterling have been spent by this country upon war; but we suppose that he includes in this all the expenditure which is more or less precautionary against attack, a huge slice of it. During the same time he estimates the civil expenditure of the country at little above £1,100,000,000, or less than a fourth of what he means by the war expenditure, but which has been to a very great extent expenditure on security against war. His speech, however, contained some grand sentences. "In fact, looking at the past is to me a melancholy retrospect. There is much of it which excites in me not astonishment only, but horror. The fact is, there passes before my eyes a vision of millions of families,—not individuals, but families,—fathers, mothers, children, passing, ghastly, sorrow-stricken, in never-ending procession, from their cradle to their grave." "To me, it appears that we have trodden for two centuries past in the footsteps of the Cæsars, and have accepted the barbarous policy of Pagan Rome; while at the same time, with a vast and unconscious hypocrisy, we have built thousands of temples, and have dedicated them to the Prince of Peace. And I say, and say with grief and shame, that they who have ministered at his altars have, for the most part, on these matters been absolutely dumb."

A memorial, signed by influential clergymen, of whom the Bishop of Dover, the Bishop of Newcastle, and the Bishop Designate of Truro (Canon Wilkinson) are apparently the most important, is to be presented to Mr. Gladstone against the Affirmation Bill, and will maintain, "That the deliberate removal of the name of the Supreme Being from the form of affirmation proposed in this Bill, for the purpose of admitting as a Member of the Legislature, by its retrospective action, an open and avowed Atheist, who has admitted that he has no religious scruples, is dishonouring to Almighty God, and contrary to the spirit of our laws and Constitution." If the same memorialists had written in the same spirit at the time of the Jewish Relief Bill, they would have said, we suppose, "That the deliberate removal of the reference to the true faith of a Christian from the form of the oath, proposed in this Bill, for the purpose of admitting, as a member of the Legislature, by its retrospective action, an open and avowed opponent of the Christian faith, is dishonouring to Christ, and contrary to the spirit of our laws and Constitution.' The memorialists try to make something of the fact that Mr. Bradlaugh is "without religious scruples" as to the taking of the oath, but as they will not permit him to take it, scruples or no scruples, that has no bearing on the matter. What, on their grounds, they are bound to impose on all Members of Parliament, is a deliberate test of personal Theism. Why do they not propose this, as the only honest way of preventing a course "dishonouring to Almighty God"?

There was a sharp debate on Tuesday as to the rules to be followed by the Grand Committee on Trade to which the Bankruptcy Bill is to be referred, Mr. Raikes especially desiring to know whether the Chairmen of these Grand Committees are to act like the Chairman of Committees of Ways and Means—that is, to order debate, but not take any part in it—or like the ordinary Chairmen of Select Committees who have "charge" of the Bill referred to them, and try to promote its success. The discussion showed that the House is not anxious to bind down at first these Grand Committees by too strict rules, but that the wish of the Committee of Selection is that the Chairmen of these Committees shall hold aloof from all advocacy, in order the better to command that kind of influence which the Chairman of Ways and Means holds. This seems to us wise. If the Grand Committees are to succeed at all, they must succeed by copying to some extent the methods of a Committee of the whole House, though they are to be on a more manageable scale, and are intended to proceed with less parade of rhetoric, and less tendency to party tactics.

The Catholic Bishops of the West of Ireland have been pressing the Government to discourage emigration and to mitigate the distress of the present unfavourable season, by making advances to tenants in the distressed districts of five times the yearly rent of the holding, to be secured on the holding, for the purposes of improvements; and also by making loans to groups of tenants in these districts, on the joint security of their combined holdings. Where these loans are impossible, the Catholic Bishops press the alternative of outdoor relief, and strongly deprecate emigration. Lord Spencer, after considering these suggestions of the Catholic Bishops, has replied that while in certain cases the Treasury is prepared to lend to individual tenants of sufficiently good holdings advances for improvement on the security of their holdings, he could not sanction advances to groups of tenants on their joint holdings, which could only result in involving them in new difficulties, as well as very complex mutual disputes. In short, the Government are not prepared to bolster up a radically unsound agricultural attempt to make very poor land appear to support a much larger population than it ever can support in comfort and prosperity. The Bishops appear to be exceedingly wroth at what they regard as Lord Spencer's attempt to force the people into emigration; but it is surely most misleading to talk of forcing the people into emigration, when they only mean by this that the Government refuse to burden artificially an already overburdened soil with fresh obligations which it can never redeem. What is wanted is more adequate Government help for emigration from the West of Ireland, but to make that help conditional on the careful removal of whole families to localities where they will be put in the way of learning how best to apply their labour.

The Government has appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into the condition of the "Crofters," or small tenants, in the Highlands and the Hebridean Islands, especially Harris, Skye, and Lewis. Something like famine is approaching there. The crofters, always too numerous for the poor soil, have gradually been deprived of their common pasturages, which fetch more rent when thrown into the sheep farms and sporting "forests;" they have suffered from bad crops, like their neighbours, and their income from work other than agriculture has been reduced in ways not quite understood. They are, therefore, in a most miserable condition. Mr. Cameron, on Tuesday, called the attention of Government to the facts, and recommended that the Board of Supervision should be authorised to grant out-door relief in excess of its legal powers. The Government promised watchfulness, and it would be easy to raise a great subscription for the Highlands, but the proprietors should help largely.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE GOVERNMENT AND ITS WORK.

WE do not at all like the tone in which the coming work of the Session is being discussed. The leading politicians are obviously arguing among themselves whether the Bill for reorganising London or the Bill for compensating agricultural tenants should be pressed forward first, and they all assume that the one which fails to obtain precedence will be relegated to a future Session. Surely there is weakness amounting to something very like dereliction of duty in that assumption. For ourselves, we are decidedly of opinion that the Compensation Bill should have precedence, on the definite ground that it concerns and interests all parts of Great Britain, while the London Bill only concerns and interests the Metropolis; but we repudiate the notion of abandoning either as a faint-hearted concession to the Obstructives, and an admission that Parliament has become too weak to deal with more than one considerable Bill in one Session. The Government have only these two controversial measures before the country, for although the Anti-Bribery Bill is important, and the Bankruptcy Bill greatly required, and the Ballot Bill urgently asked for, none of them are outside the class of measures which excite discussion rather than strong resistance. If, therefore, the Ministry yield to the apprehensions so freely expressed, and tacitly withdraw one of the two measures, they acknowledge that the Obstructives have succeeded, and that the powers of Parliament have been reduced to a point never before witnessed in this generation. It has happened, we acknowledge, even before the days of obstruction, that a Bill has aroused passions so deep and interests so powerful, that it has monopolised the whole spare time of a Session, or even of more than one. We should not expect, if a vast Redistribution Bill were on hand, involving a grand and perhaps final transference of power, to carry any other measure; nor do we anticipate, when a great Church is threatened with Disestablishment, to see the country concern itself simultaneously with other changes. But the two Bills before the House, though of the first order, are neither of them of the kind which monopolises attention, or so distracts the country that no other subject can be seriously considered by its side. The first Bill—if the Agricultural Bill is put first, as it ought to be—is already sanctioned in principle by both parties, and will be supported in the Commons not only by the unbroken strength of the majority, but by all those Tories who believe compensation to be just, or who dread lest, if compensation is refused, the next demand should be for fixity of tenure. The sincere fight over the Bill will be in the Lords, where the dread of any invasion of the principle of free contract is genuine and deep, and in the Lords there is time for anything. The second Bill, though it will cause more excitement, is not substantially a bill of details, and the real contest will rage round the clauses which submerge the Corporation of the City of London, and ought to be finished in a week's debate. In a healthy condition of Parliament, the two Bills together would be regarded as insufficient work for a Government with a heavy majority, and in postponing one of them the Ministry admit that the condition of Parliament is not healthy. In other words, they admit that the new Rules of Procedure, though only passed last Session, are of little practical value; that they cannot be improved into strong engines for clearing the road; and that the legislation of the country still lies at the mercy of a comparatively feeble minority. The Parnellites and the Tory guerrillas together do not count fifty votes,—less than a tenth of the House. Parliament is not absorbed by a Continental war, or occupied with foreign complications, or engrossed with necessary sectional legislation, and yet it cannot get on, can only hope by patience and close attention to get through with one not very severely contested change. Can it be necessary to make admissions so dangerous, not to this or that party, but to government through a deliberative assembly? Suppose the Government immediately after the Easter recess informs the House that it intends to press both Bills with all its energy, that it will, if necessary, insist that the New Rules shall be applied, and that it will consent to no prorogation before Christmas, unless both Bills are passed or rejected, does anyone doubt what the fate of both measures would be? It is weakness to talk of dictation. Lord Palmerston insisted on votes on much less important subjects, and it is the very business of Ministers to say that certain Bills are in their judgment required for the welfare of the country; that Parliament can reject them by delays if it pleases, but that if it does, it will no longer be possible for them to remain responsible for the conduct of affairs. Unreasonable delay shows want of confidence, as much as a hostile vote could do, and should be treated precisely in the same way, or even with more firmness, for the issue at stake is higher than the existence of any Ministry. It is the House of Commons as at present constituted which the nation is trying at its bar.

We dwell on this subject at the risk of wearying our readers, because we seriously believe that the paralysis of Parliament involves grave political danger. The temper of the people is, we are convinced, growing sour, and men's minds are ripening for changes which neither Tories nor Liberals would desire to see made out of a spirit of despair. Those changes may, of course, take the form only of a sweeping redistribution of power. We have a trick of studying local speeches, as giving often unexpected aperçus into the public mind, and were much struck a few days since by two which attracted no general attention. One was delivered by Mr. Smith, the new Member for Liverpool, and in many ways a representative man. Its drift was that his first three weeks in Parliament had utterly astounded him. He had never, while working in Liverpool, dreamed that obstruction could be so successful, that the national time could be so wasted, or that the House of Commons could be so completely prevented from fulfilling its pledges to the country. And his remedy was a Redistribution Bill which could be based only on a close approximation to equal electoral districts, a Bill, in fact, of a sweepingly democratic kind. The other speech was by one of the least-known Members of Parliament, Mr. Tillet, of Norwich, a representative man of another class, a hard-headed, keen-sighted solicitor and journalist, perhaps the last man in England to "scream," or to go beyond his constituents in any way. His expressions—and he was not speaking to a very radical audience—of shame and dismay at the paralysed condition of Parliament, were even stronger than Mr. Smith's, and his remedy, judging we admit from a bad report, was identically the same. We do not dread redistribution, though we should be sorry to see it based on what is called the "mathematical" plan; but we do dread any grand measure passed, not on its own merits, but out of an uncontrollable desire to be done with an apparently powerless machinery. Men actuated by that feeling really derive their force from an inner contempt, and are perfectly certain to break up things which, in cooler moments, they would carefully preserve. They act like housekeepers who, unable to bear a particular set of household troubles, move into the country, or a flat, and discover just too late that they have acted in a rage, and have given up things which made up part of the happiness of life. Nor, though we are quite aware that we shall have a thin audience for this part of our argument, are we satisfied that the people will stop at redistribution. There is an impatient disgust expressed at deliberation itself, which is a dangerous sign of the times. The community grows so irritated with purposeless talk, incessant and useless interpellation, and angry debate on dead subjects, that it asks whether silence would not be preferable, and talks over forms of repression, such as sittings without reporters, which would involve in practice an extinction of Parliamentary life. They will leave Mr. Gladstone alone, because they think his steam-engine energy can do anything; but they are just in the mood, if he retires, to insist that the whole machine shall be remodelled, until it can perform in one Session all the neglected tasks of half-a-dozen. We dread that mood, if Tories do not, and perceive the inability of many Liberals to understand it, or even to recognise its existence, with positive dismay. The people perceive quite clearly that the fault is not with the Liberals, but they do not perceive that it is not with the House of Commons. They are growing angry with that, not with the Ministry; and if the Government dislike that emotion, they must conciliate the people by compelling the House as a corporate entity to do more of its duty. The Ministry do not want to see it weakened, nor is it their business, by postponing necessary reforms, to admit that, after all the labour of two years, the organisation of the representatives is so bad that with a crushing majority nothing of the highest importance can get done. We ought to have had three Bills this year, the Compensation Bill, the London Bill, and the County Government Bill, and to have passed them all; and if we only get one, the country will declare that the House of Commons, with all its history, is getting past its work. That is the very first step towards the selection of a new depository of power.

SIR GEORGE JESSEL.

ONE of the greatest administrative forces in England has disappeared with Sir George Jessel. A more extraordinary intellectual engine than his brain has not been seen at work in our generation. Great as he was as a pure lawyer, he was still greater in the despatch of business; for the speed, and the marvellous accuracy on the whole with which he worked at so great a speed, were certainly neither rivalled nor approached by any contemporary of his own. People called him a very strong man, and so he was, but in his own line his swiftness was more marvellous than his strength, and, indeed, sometimes misled him, though it would hardly be just to say that the State would have gained by any subtraction from that speed, for his mistakes were rare and trivial in proportion to the efficiency of the industry which his great velocity of thought enabled him to achieve. He was what Carlyle would have called "a great captain of industry," only the industry in which he was a captain was a learned industry of a very high order of delicacy and skill, which it took a man of very singular attainments to superintend, and hasten, and arrest, and appreciate, with Sir George Jessel's rareness of discrimination. He had usually mastered the drift of an argument before it was half out of the Counsel's mouth, and had taken in the exact drift of a deed before any other man would have got at its general scope and tendency. The immense self-confidence with which he was obviously endowed was in his case not, as it so often is, the result of a misleading sanguineness and eagerness of temperament, which makes a man leap before he looks, but simply the self-confidence of a mind which had found its anticipations fully verified ten times or oftener for every case of failure. And the evidence of this was that Sir George Jessel never even wished to persevere in maintaining a false position, when once he had discovered it. He was always anxious to acknowledge and correct a mistake, for error was vexatious to him not because it was he who had been wrong, but simply because it was error. He had one of those vigorous minds which delight in orderly arrangement, and are almost more scandalised to find a fact classified wrongly, if it is their own mistake, than they are if it be the mistake of another. Imperious as he was in guiding the deliberations or arguments of others, it was the imperiousness of a true genius for despatch of business, not the imperiousness of self-will. We should like to have seen him tried as Speaker of the House of Commons, though opinion is as yet hardly ripe for so strong a curb-rein as his over the unbridled loquacity of some Members of the House of Commons. Still, those who could force him to consider any point which he had really overlooked, were always rewarded by finding that he did not make light of its bearing simply because he had happened to overlook it. His impatience was the impatience of a keen, swift mind, scandalised by any needless waste of labour, not of an excitable mind irritated by opposition. Indeed, no opposition that was firm and lucid ever ruffled him in the least. In this respect, he had the true judicial temper. He would always insist on recognising the strong points of the view he rejected, as distinctly as he recognised the strong points of the view he adopted. We may, perhaps, rightly call a mind of this kind imperious, if it rides roughshod over weaker and slower intellects, and to this extent Sir George Jessel was imperious. But it was, strictly speaking, the imperiousness of high faculty measuring itself against what usually proved to be weaker faculty, not the imperiousness of prestige, audacity, or caprice. Indeed, of caprice there was not a trace in the Master of the Rolls, and of the sense of his own prestige, and of audacity, only so much as must accompany more or less the consciousness of singularly high powers.

Of course, these powers were limited in number, though they were, speaking comparatively, almost unlimited in degree. Sir George Jessel had not, like the great Jewish contemporary who achieved a still higher fame in politics, any unique insight into other men. He was not skilful in the use of social weapons. He had no great stores of banter or wit at his command. His speeches in Parliament were not of the first order, even for the speeches of a Solicitor-General. He was not as persuasive as Sir Henry James, nor anything like as lucid in the exposition of political issues as Sir Farrer Herschell. Marvellous as his powers were, they were probably never shown to less advantage than during his short Parliamentary career. For in the forms of things he was not a master. He was deficient in tact, in the art of literary and popular exposition; and appeals to feelings he either despised or could not understand. Even as a lawyer, he had not that command of caustic and ironic dialectic which gave to some of his earlier contemporaries, like Lord Westbury and Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce, so unique a fame. Sir George Jessel's intellect went straight to the subject-matter of legal issues, and never wasted time with the apparel in which they were dressed up. He was a Titan in his way, but part of his force consisted in his inability to deal with the mere superficial forms of argument, and the necessity he felt himself under of going straight to the true issue. That is why we ventured to call him a captain of industry; for he always sought to economise industry to the utmost, and probably it would be difficult to find any two of his contemporaries, however eminent, who, taken together, got through so much sound work in the same time as he did, without ever knowing apparently what overwork meant. His appetite for work was something vast. Nothing pleased him better, when he came to the end of one heavy task, than at once to undertake another which he might easily have declined. The spectacle of his last struggle with a mortal disease was something more than impressive. For many weeks he discharged every duty, not only in his Court, but in relation to volunteer offices for omitting which he could well have pleaded illness, and this when he was so dangerously ill that to take a step upstairs without assistance was impossible, and when at times it was an effort to him to speak at all. When urged by his doctors to keep quiet, he pleaded that he was more equal to work than he was to idleness, and that he should be better if he shrank from none of his usual duties. And for a time, —though he recovered much of his old energy towards the end, —he went through all his judicial and administrative and academical duties, —he was Vice-Chancellor of his own University, the University of London, —with punctual precision, though looking like the ghost of himself, labouring under the oppression of more than one organic disease, and threatened by that failure of the heart of which in the end he died. To see that wonderful engine in his brain working at half, or less than half, its usual pressure of steam, as the life in him flickered low during the struggle of his powerful frame with the last enemy, was a strange, a painful, but in some sense an inspiring sight for commoner and weaker mortals. There was something of the Hercules in Sir George Jessel.

Sir George Jessel was a curiously accomplished man, at College both a first-rate mathematician and a good classic, —that he was a considerable Hebrew scholar was, perhaps, not remarkable, considering his race and faith, —otherwise also a good linguist, and at one time he had a good and scientific knowledge of botany, as well, we believe, as of others of the classificatory sciences. Indeed, part of his grasp of law was due not only to the immense keenness and swiftness of his general intellect, but to his marked capacity for sound classification. His ability was, however, all in the region of what is called positive knowledge. He had little taste and little special capacity for philosophy or literature, though he was so strong a man that there was no subject on which he had informed himself at all on which his judgment was without value. However, it was for his swift and accurate discharge of the highest judicial work that he will be best and most justly remembered. In our time, there has been no administrative engine so marvellous in its achievements, so strong, and yet so accurate, as the judicial power of Sir George Jessel.

LORD DUFFERIN'S DESPATCH.

THERE are two conceptions current in Europe of the system which Lord Dufferin is establishing in Egypt, and they are both wrong. One, the Continental one, is that he is organising Egypt like a Protected Indian State; and the other, the English one, is that he is setting up a strictly native Egyptian Government. He is doing neither. No politician, and especially no politician familiar with Indian methods, can read through the exhaustive despatch just presented to Parliament — a despatch which is a perfect monument of labour and energy, though deformed here and there by an oratorical sentence — without seeing that Lord Dufferin is proposing a great experiment, hitherto untried in the East, and based upon a single dominant idea, that European comradeship in office is the only hope, under the circumstances, for the regeneration of the Egyptian officials. Lord Dufferin is convinced that in Egypt the native character, whether Arab or Turkish, either is or has become so essentially defective, so wanting in uprightness, independence, and honesty, that true self-government, or rather—to coin a word indispensable for the moment—true “self-administration,” is absolutely impossible. No department of the State, no section of the people, no class of public servants, can be trusted to walk alone, without a European crutch. It is not till the reader has gone through the whole despatch that the universality of the condemnation is thoroughly perceived. There is a good word for the Khedive, as conscientiously desiring the welfare of his people and not eager for despotic power, but it is for him alone. As to the Army, “the officers have always been the weak element in Egyptian armies,” and they require to be toned by European supervision and European example. As to finances, it would be madness to remove the Europeans from the Financial Department, and the whole Government must have a European Financial Adviser. As to the Public Works Department, which controls irrigation, the very life of Egypt, it is so mismanaged by the corrupt officials, that the Desert is encroaching on the cultivated land, that “the crops of sugar and cotton are becoming lighter every season,” that the terrible “corvée,” which gives the Department an industrial army of 100,000 slaves, is almost wasted; and that “if large tracts of country are to be prevented from falling back into sterility,” from the silting-up of the canals, the Irrigation service must be “thoroughly reformed,” and “strong measures” immediately adopted. The work, in fact, must be entrusted to an Anglo-Indian Engineer and his staff. The Topographical Survey is not begun, and “no one in the Egyptian service is competent to such a work;” and that, too, must have a European head. The Judges, most of whom are Fellahs, true Egyptians, are so hopelessly bad that “at this moment there is no real justice in the country, what passes under that name is a mockery.” There are no laws, the Judges are untrained and often corrupt, and two dozen European Judges are indispensable:—“It seems to be universally acknowledged, both by the Government itself, and by native public opinion, that no measure short of this will ever definitely establish a spirit of purity and independence amongst the native magistracy. Servility and corruption are so intertwined with their habits and traditions that the automatic cleansing of their Courts is out of the question. But it is hoped that when once they have been rendered robust and pure by the presence of a few high-minded Europeans, it may become possible to preserve indefinitely the standard of righteousness which shall have been thus established.” The village authorities are worse than the Judges:—“In the first place, there are half-a-dozen Sheikhs, or sometimes many more, in every village, each of them connected with varying-sized sections of the community; and, in the next, they are either hereditary dignitaries or the direct or indirect nominees of the authorities, or have been chosen by the head men of the adjoining districts. They may for the most part be looked upon as the most inveterate oppressors of those placed under their authority. It is they who best know what individuals in the village can be most profitably squeezed, and whose itching palms are greased by the wealthier peasant anxious to avoid the ‘corvée,’ or greedy for a disproportionate share of the fertilising stream.” And finally, the people themselves are submissive and ignorant to such a point that if they were permitted to elect a true representative body, it would “simply prove an uninstructed and unmanageable mob, with a very low level both of character and intelligence, incapable of discussing public business or of understanding finance, and to which it would be dangerous to accord any but the most restricted privileges.”

The remedy for this state of affairs, it is quite clear, would in Lord Dufferin’s mind be a Protectorate:—“Had I been commissioned to place affairs in Egypt on the footing of an Indian subject State, the outlook would have been different. The masterful hand of a Resident would have quickly bent everything to his will, and in the space of five years we should have greatly added to the material wealth and well-being of the country, by the extension of its cultivated area and the consequent expansion of its revenue; by the partial, if not the total, abolition of the ‘corvée’ and slavery; the establishment of justice; and other beneficent reforms.” That solution is, however, forbidden, both by circumstances and by English opinion; and Lord Dufferin falls back upon his alternative, the introduction of Europeans everywhere to work alongside of the Native officials, and so teach them better ways. They are not, except in the Army, to command them, and are in all Departments to obey Native Ministers, but they are to enjoy some kind of formal or informal preference and leadership. That may succeed, and it must be acknowledged that it has much authority in its favour. There is not an “experienced” European in Turkey, or Tunis, or, indeed, any part of Asia except India, who does not approve that scheme, as on the whole the most hopeful of all schemes which do not terminate altogether native authority. It is not difficult for the Central Government, if willing, to give the European a certain preponderance; and, indeed, with his superior energy and freedom from the control of the people round him, he usually secures it for himself. He ought therefore primæ facie to be able to lead his colleagues, and if the European pressure at Head-quarters is continued steadily for years, he may by degrees acquire the necessary influence. At the same time, it must be recognised that the scheme is a novel one, and exposed to very strong a priori objections. It has never been tried on the same scale anywhere. Lord Dufferin appears to think it exists in the Protected Indian States, but that is by no means the case. The Government of those States is, as a rule, controlled through the Ruler or the Premier, the administration remaining purely native. In the majority of such States there are no Europeans, every post being held either by a Mussulman or a Hindoo; while in a few others the Europeans are either military officers, or engineers, or doctors in native service. The Indian theory, indeed, is the reverse of Lord Dufferin’s, and an administration by both Europeans and Natives under a Native Government is believed to unite the evils of both systems, those of government by will and those of government by rigid law. The system to be tried in Egypt is not one of self-government, while, as Lord Dufferin admits, it will not allow of the rapid improvement which would have followed a direct protectorate. The second object has been, perhaps wisely given up, but about the first we have many and grave doubts. Lord Dufferin is on the spot, and is most anxious to give Egyptians every chance, and it would be arrogant to reject his mature conclusions; but still, we cannot but remember that Egypt has been governed without Englishmen for a good many years without going to pieces, and cannot but doubt whether the education of the people would not be quicker if their best men were selected, and they were trusted with power at once. Native Judges can hardly be made good by supersession by foreigners, on the express ground that they (the natives) are rascally ignoramuses. They will hardly acquire independence, which is their great want, under a pupillage so patent; while their dislike of the foreigner is not likely to be soothed by seeing him lording it in every Department, setting his colleagues aside, as he is sure to do, and drawing three times the pay for doing precisely the same work. We should fear that the native colleague, instead of being educated to better things, would either become a subtle intrigant, or, sinking back into apathy, leave to the European all the work and the responsibility, as he will possess all the power.

Still, the experiment must be tried, and two facts in the Report inspire us with decided hope. One is Lord Dufferin’s distinct declaration that the English tutelage of Egypt must be made to succeed, and must be interrupted neither by foreign attack nor internal insurrection. That indicates a determination on the part of the British Government to remain some time in possession of the right of supervision; and if they retain that, all mistakes can gradually and silently be corrected, and European administrators either withdrawn, or made solely authoritative and responsible. The other is that the village system—the key to all Asiatic life—is left truly automatic. There is, at all events, to be no European Mayor. Lord Dufferin condemns the Sheikhs en masse, no doubt justly; but he does not remove them, and he does place by their side an elected headman of the commune, who, as he says, will be at least the mouth-piece of the people. He will be that, and he may very readily become much more. The people will support him, however faintly; the Sheikhs will be anxious to conciliate him, the Judges will attend to his representations, and the Government may, if it pleases, gradually increase his status and jurisdiction. There is the beginning of a fine policy in that reform, and one thoroughly in accord with ancient tradition and the feeling of the people. For the rest, we must all wait and see, but the experiment is not one in which we have much hope. A European administration guarantees prosperity. A Native administration is approved by the people. A hybrid administration may have both advantages, but it also may have neither, and this is to be in all departments a hybrid administration.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S BANKRUPTCY BILL.

WE can heartily support Mr. Chamberlain's proposal for a new Bankruptcy Law, as explained in his wonderfully careful and lucid speech of Monday. There may be details in plenty to be amended, and the Bill is pre-eminently one for a Grand Committee, but the principle on which it rests is the one for which we have contended in all discussions on the subject, and is, we maintain, entirely sound. The right of managing an insolvent's estate belongs primarily to his creditors, whose property in the fullest moral sense the estate has become, and should only be taken away on grounds of convenience, or on suspicion that they are cheating one another; but the right and duty of adjudicating on the bankrupt's conduct belongs to the State, and cannot honourably be transferred to the creditors, who are never impartial, and seldom competent. That bankruptcy is not in se and of necessity a crime may be readily conceded, but it may be one; and it is indispensable, if a high standard of commercial honour is to be kept up, that the State should inquire, in each case, whether there has been direct criminality, or criminal negligence, or criminal recklessness, or not. A fraudulent bankruptcy is a theft on a huge scale, and should be treated like one; while every bankruptcy may involve either dishonest dealing, or conduct so reckless as to deserve, if not criminal penalties, at least disgrace. The man who, knowing that he is insolvent and can pay only ten shillings in the pound, goes on trading till he can only pay two, is neither more nor less than a "welsheer,"—a man who bets without the intention of paying, with this aggravation, that he constantly prevents the honest trader from succeeding. Smith, who intends to pay his debts, can never contend with Brown, who does not so intend; and constantly finds himself shut out of the markets by a rival who, morally at all events, is dealing with stolen goods. The risk hampers commerce at every turn, and directly injures the community, which has to pay on every article a needless excess of price, levied in order to cover the risk of making hopelessly bad debts. Every case of bankruptcy should, therefore, be examined by an impartial tribunal before relief is granted, and the creditors neither will be nor can be competent to do this. They care nothing for the punishment of the offender, or the good order of society, or the general interests of trade. They are anxious only to obtain as much dividend as they can without taking personal trouble, and to have done with the affair, without further loss either of time or money. To secure those ends, they find the willing help of the insolvent most essential, and therefore hush up anything, and either submit to a compromise which forbids investigation, or leave everything to the professional liquidator, who regards the estate first of all as a meal for himself, and has no interest whatever in doing unprofitable justice. Mr. Chamberlain's Bill deals directly with this main evil. He leaves the creditors to manage their property under supervision, but appoints sixty Receivers, scattered all through England, one of whom, as the first preliminary of all, will examine the bankrupt, report upon his conduct to the Court of Bankruptcy, and, if he see occasion, prosecute him. If he sees no blame in the bankrupt, he will supervise and control any composition the creditors may accept; but if he sees blame, he will prevent the arrangement, and the insolvent, driven directly into the Court, will either be punished or disgraced. Bankruptcy will cease to be the easy method of shuffling off debts which it is now, and the intending bankrupt will be forced to remember that before his debts are cleared off he will inevitably, and without his creditors' permission, be compelled to pass under a searching examination, in which every fraud, and extravagance, and act of reckless trading he may have committed will be revealed.

This is, we are convinced, the first necessity of a wise Bankruptcy Law, in presence of which all other questions, even the great one of "priorities," are matters of mere detail, and it is with unmixed surprise that we see the Tories join battle upon this issue. They cannot want to shelter fraudulent or reckless bankrupts, yet their spokesman, Mr. E. Stanhope, objects to the "officialism" of the Bill. There are, he says, in tones of horror, to be sixty Official Receivers, with duties of the most complicated kind. "Would the House approve of that enormous amount of patronage being given to any Government Department? Would it not be the first step towards the Americanisation of our Civil Service," and therefore deserve the strongest resistance? Why the service is to be Americanised by the appointment of Receivers, who will, of course, be permanent officials, any more than by the appointment of County-Court Judges, or Stamp Distributors, or Inland-Revenue Collectors, we are at a loss to conceive. Is it because they are to be paid by fees? That, if a reasonable objection, which we rather think it is, as the Receiver ought to pay special attention to small bankruptcies, is a matter of detail, to be discussed, and accepted, or rejected, in committee. Is it because the Receivers must be mercantile men, rather than lawyers? That is not indispensable, and if it were, sixty not very inviting appointments to be distributed among trained accountants can hardly demoralise the State. Is it because the Receivers are to be appointed by a department of the Government? That is the plain sense of Mr. Stanhope's motion, but what does he suggest as the alternative? Simply that the Receivers should be appointed by "individuals"—meaning, we suppose, the creditors—a monstrous proposal, which would logically justify the election of County-court Judges by the tradesmen of their districts. These Receivers are to be Judges in all but dignity, with power to decide, in the form of a report, upon the character, conduct, and future status of every bankrupt in the country, to guide all trustees in bankruptcy, and to quash or sanction all compositions. It is impossible to entrust their selection to irresponsible bodies of any kind, and the only alternatives are the Court of Bankruptcy, which cannot be made responsible for its patronage, and a Cabinet Minister, who can. Precedent at least is in favour of the latter selection, and so, we should have thought, was Tory principle. If Tories have a sound, fixed idea, it is that an elective judiciary is bad, and a Receiver appointed by any one except a Minister of State must of necessity be an elected Judge. As to the number of Receivers, it may seem large, but their duties will be most onerous, it is of the first importance that they should act quickly, and the business they are to attack is nothing less than gigantic. "Since 1869," said Mr. Dixon-Hartland, the well-known banker, "there had been 109,000 bankruptcies, involving a total sum of £245,000,000 and the interests of 5,000,000 of their fellow-countrymen, a population as large as that of Ireland." That is equal to one hundred and thirty bankruptcies a year to be investigated by each Receiver, who must examine all accounts, hear all creditors, and cross-examine the bankrupt with full knowledge not only of his affairs as shown in his books, but of the very affairs he is most carefully concealing. Twenty-four working hours per case is certainly not a large allowance for such an investigation, and for ourselves, we doubt whether Mr. Chamberlain will find sixty Receivers enough. The result of the whole experiment will rest upon them, upon their shrewdness, their honesty, and their application; and if they are overloaded till their duties are only perfunctorily performed, the Bill will be as inoperative to check fraud as those which have preceded it, and we shall perhaps be driven to try Lord Sherbrooke's advice—endorsed, we are surprised to see, by Mr. Dixon-Hartland—and abolish relief in bankruptcy altogether. The key of the plans is the Receiver, as any man of business can perceive, if he will only imagine what kind of a law it would be if Receivers could be conciliated, coerced, or bribed.

We are rather surprised that Mr. Chamberlain, who is sincerely anxious to pass his Bill, should have inserted in it such debatable matter as the clauses which practically abolish imprisonment for debt, and those which sweep away all "priorities," except the claim of workmen to their wages. Both are in our judgment reforms, but the first involves the excessively difficult question of the credit of the poor, which is now exceptionally good, and the second will perplex and perhaps alarm every landlord in the kingdom. It is the landlords, as Mr. Stanhope at once perceived, not ordinary creditors, who are interested. Both reforms could be dealt with in separate Bills, and we think,—though we fully acknowledge the hardship involved in the present practice as to imprisonment,—should be so dealt with, the grand point to be carried now being that bankruptcy shall be made a presumable offence, deserving inquiry by an impartial State official, and not to be dealt with at the sole discretion of interested creditors. That is the provision the absence of which has multiplied bankruptcies till they have ceased to be discreditable, till all honest traders are competing with rogues, and till, as Lord Cairns declared, bankruptcy costs the country some £20,000,000 a year, a direct fine levied on its commerce, while it is competing with countries, such as France, where bankruptcy is still considered socially a crime. The internal commerce of France is at this moment facilitated beyond belief by a system of minute discounts, which, but for the almost extravagant horror felt of bankruptcy, must be at once abandoned.

MR. CHILDERS AND THE CONNAUGHT EMIGRATION.

THE Connaught Bishops have hardly illustrated that interested desire to promote the permanent welfare of their people for which we give them credit, by their correspondence with the Irish Government on the subject of the distress in Connaught. They are wise indeed on one point,—the objection which they take to the attempt to relieve the distress by public works undertaken solely for that purpose—but this is the only point on which, we think, they have shown as much good-sense as they doubtless intended to show good-feeling. However, their chief blunder,—the blunder which is more likely to weaken their public influence than any other,—is their vehement opposition to the assisted emigration of the poorest of the cottiers, who starve rather than live on land far too poor and too limited in quantity to maintain them. On this subject the prejudices of the Connaught Bishops against any diminution of the importance of Connaught, and consequently of the ecclesiastical weight of Connaught in the Irish State, and the prejudices of the priests against the prospect of dwindling flocks, have overcome the good-sense and patriotism which the Irish Bishops usually display. The truth is, that suspicious as the Connaught cottiers undoubtedly are of any official offers on the part of the British Government, it is more and more evident that the information which reaches them from their relatives in Canada and the United States is rapidly overcoming their suspicions, and making them as eager for a free passage to the land of plenty as their Bishops appear eager to prevent them from accepting it. And this process of conversion will go on with increasing rapidity, as the beneficent labours of Mr. Tuke's Committee multiply. Already, the applications for help to emigrate have been about seven times as numerous as it was possible for the Committee to grant. And even if, as we hope, the annual scale of these operations be considerably increased, we can hardly expect that the number sent out will be always increased in the same proportion. For we must remember that the whole cost depends largely on the cost of getting the families assisted in good condition to the emigrant ship, and that this element increases rapidly as you begin to tap the remoter villages many miles from any coast which ships can reach, and many miles from a convenient railway station. So that we fully expect to see a cry arising in Connaught for help to emigrate, which cannot be satisfied within any short period at nearly the same cost per family as has been hitherto found adequate by Mr. Tuke and his volunteers. The demand for emigration, then, will soon exceed even more than it does at present the resources of the benevolent volunteers for satisfying it, and it is probable that they will find the cost per family grow, as they attempt to deal with starving villages far removed from the railway and the coast.

But, then, we must remember, what has attracted as yet strangely little attention, that Mr. Childers, in the interesting speech which he delivered in the House of Commons on the last day of February, announced what, coming from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, can hardly be regarded as much less than official willingness to go considerably beyond the emigration funds at present disposed of by the Government, so long as the scheme adopted should be one really calculated to relieve permanently the congested condition of Connaught and Donegal, and not merely to afford temporary relief. Mr. Childers laid down the conditions which would make such a scheme satisfactory, and these were, in general, the removal of families instead of individuals from holdings insufficient to support them, the removal of them in comfort, and the careful superintendence of their reception in Canada or the United States under conditions calculated to promote their moral welfare there. Further, he required that there should be a reasonable prospect of the holdings abandoned, as inadequate to the support of a family, not being again let for the same purpose, but either allowed to go out of cultivation, or absorbed into larger holdings not inadequate for the comfortable support of a family.

Now, we sincerely believe that if, as Mr. Childers indicated, the Government are determined to probe to the bottom the best means of putting an end to the over-population of the West Coast of Ireland, and of preventing it from recurring, they have the clearest evidence in the experience of Mr. Tuke's Committee that that policy will soon become very popular with the people of Connaught and Donegal, and that it will not be at all difficult to secure the conditions on which Mr. Childers so wisely insisted. We do not say that the offer which has, we understand, been made by one of the great Transatlantic railway contractors to provide 50,000 Irish with suitable holdings on the railway, should be accepted, for not only would there be great difficulty in sending out that number of suitable emigrants at once, but many of the Irish sent would be certainly likely to disappoint the contractor by disappearing very soon from the railway lots with which they were provided. Mr. Tuke has quite recently declared that one of the chief difficulties in the recent settlement superintended by Father Nugent was this,—that the Irish, accustomed to small cottier plots of ground, were frightened by the number of acres which they were expected to till, and had disappeared, to hire themselves out at St. Paul's as labourers for others. That may show that any arrangement on a grand scale to send the Connaught cottiers to railway lots in the Far West might not be very successful, because it might not answer the expectations of the contractors, who hope in this way to make the new railway extensions pay. But none the less, the emigration superintended by Father Nugent appears to have answered all Mr. Childers's conditions, so far as a vast improvement,—physical and moral,—in the life of the families sent out is concerned; indeed, there is no ground at all for saying that any of the emigrants sent out in recent years have not changed their condition absolutely for the better, and sometimes to a perfectly marvellous extent. Indeed, this is not wonderful, to any one who had read Lord Dufferin's striking evidence on this subject before the Duke of Richmond's Land Commission. Speaking of the small scale of the agriculture to which the Irish have been accustomed in Ireland, and the much larger scale they would have to undertake in Canada, Lord Dufferin said, "I visited an Icelandic colony [in Canada], and the Icelanders are people who have never seen a road, a plough, or a cornfield; consequently, you cannot imagine people less adapted to transference to an agricultural district. Yet these Icelanders, though they were not so prosperous as the others, were undoubtedly far more prosperous than they would have been in the country they have left. They have been driven forth by similar forces to those which are now acting upon the people in the West of Ireland, and they were so content with their lot, that they have christened their new home 'Heaven.'" It seems to us that no one who really desires to see Connaught and Donegal permanently relieved of its starving peasants can doubt that Mr. Childers's semi-proposal,—perhaps we should call it his half-invitation to the well-wishers of Ireland to press him for help,—ought to be closed with as soon as possible, and translated "from thought into action."

It would not be difficult to comply with all his conditions in the only sense in which he really expects compliance. Let Mr. Tuke's Committee ask to be transformed into a Royal Commission for dealing with the subject, of which Mr. Tuke should be the head, and Mr. Sydney Buxton, with the other volunteers who have helped him so loyally and efficiently, should be members; and let it be increased by some of the leading Irishmen, for example, Mr. O'Connor Power, Mr. Mitchell Henry, and any others who are not so timid as to fear identifying themselves with a purely beneficent emigration scheme for ridding the West Coast of Ireland of its chronic state of bankruptcy. Let the Government increase its grant for each individual sent out from £5 to £7, which is what is, on an average, barely enough to cover clothes and proper provision for the emigrant on the other side. Let the Commission at once put themselves in communication not only with the Government of Canada, but with the Government of any of the Western States of America desiring more labour, and so secure for the Irish sent positions suitable to their habits and powers, in places where there would be religious teachers anxious to keep them faithful to their convictions. And then let it be provided by arrangement with the landlords and their agents, that the minute holdings relinquished should be either merged in larger and more profitable holdings, or thrown out of cultivation altogether. At the present time, at all events, this would not involve any further cost, since it is the bankrupt peasantry whom the Government are anxious to relieve, and both landlords and agents must be eager to prevent these bankrupt cottiers from multiplying again on their land. It is, of course, true that in any season of unexampled prosperity, when it becomes possible for very poor tenants to offer unreasonably high rents for minute holdings, the temptation might again become great for landlords, or agents anxious to raise every penny they can for their landlords, to readmit cottiers of the same type, whom the very next bad season would ruin. But we do not see how any conceivable precaution could be effective against such a danger as this. The hope,—and the reasonable hope,—is that if we continue for one generation to improve the standard of living in the West of Ireland,—to get the peasantry to dread these very poor and small holdings, as nothing but securities for future penury, there would be no more danger of the return to such habits of life than there is now in Cumberland or Essex. We cannot provide against all possible contingencies. But we can provide a reasonable security for permanent improvement, such as Mr. Childers pointed out. It seems to us almost incredible that after such a speech as Mr. Childers's, those who see that the emigration of at least some 100,000 souls from the West of Ireland to richer soils is the true remedy for the distress of Connaught, should not at once avail themselves of that statesmanlike suggestion, and take steps to bind the Government to the course indicated in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's remarkable, though tentative speech.

THE INCREASE OF THE LONDON POLICE.

IN a state of high civilisation, security of person and property might be supposed to be the most valued of blessings. What men take great pains to gain they ordinarily dislike losing; consequently, they must be willing to pay highly for its safe keeping. Comfort becomes dearer to them, in proportion as the means of obtaining it become more numerous and more accessible; consequently, bodily pain, which is absolutely fatal to comfort, is naturally viewed with greater and greater dislike. So long as either form of annoyance, loss or pain, is likely to happen to them, they are kept in constant anxiety, and anxiety is in itself as wearing as loss and pain put together. There are reasons enough to prove a position which might seem not to need proof, and yet all these reasons are of very little worth by the side of the singular fact that Londoners, the inhabitants of the richest and most luxurious city in the world, are content to go without an advantage which can be bought, and in comparison with much else that they have to pay for can be bought very cheaply. London might be made so secure, that attacks on property, and attacks upon persons when they are in the nature of attacks upon property, might be almost unknown. Under any circumstances, this last limitation would have to be made, because assaults prompted by anger cannot so easily be foreseen, and, therefore, cannot so easily be prevented. The man who commits robbery with violence is a member of a known class, and the desire to escape detection is always present with him. There is no such thing as a passion of theft which makes the thief indifferent whether he escapes with his booty, or is captured as soon as he has got possession of it. But there is a passion of cruelty, a passion of revenge, a passion of sudden rage, and any one of these may make the man whom it animates altogether careless of consequences. There are men who would beat their wives, or kick a comrade who had offended or injured them, inside a ring of policemen.

But the well-to-do Londoner is not concerned with criminals of this type. The assaults that he has cause to fear have for their motive his watch or his purse, and this kind of emotion is kept in perfect check by the presence of a constable. Yet this kind of security so easily, and, considering the numbers and the means of those who would have to pay for it, so cheaply to be had, is enjoyed in a very imperfect way by Londoners,—how imperfectly, perhaps they hardly realise themselves. The show parts of London are usually well guarded. The Thames Embankment is an exception, but then the Thames Embankment is only a show part of London by day. There is no need to pass along it at night, and the view of the police authorities seems to be that if you choose to go that way to see the moonlight on the river, or to admire the long line of quivering lights, or to enjoy the freshness of the air or the absence of noise, you are fair game for any one you may happen to find there. Coventry Street, again, and the Haymarket and Waterloo Place are not well looked after by the police. But then the kind of disturbance which goes on there at certain hours of the night is, so to speak, part of the show. It is that which ordinarily takes people to these particular streets at these particular times. Otherwise, the police are constantly within reach in the really busy parts of fashionable London, and at any point or time when there is any special need for them, they are usually present in some strength. They are always to be found marshalling the carriages at a great reception, and directing the street traffic at crowded crossings, and considering the terror that reckless hansoms and equally reckless railway vans are calculated to inspire, there is none of their functions that calls down so many blessings on their heads. But as we go out towards the suburbs, a sad falling-off becomes visible. When the foot-passenger leaves his fellows behind, the sense of danger which was dormant in the crowd, wakes to life, and he feels keenly how much his safety hangs on the neighbourhood, if not the presence of a policeman. But the presence is vouchsafed to him at intervals so remote, that do what he will, he cannot persuade himself of the neighbourhood. He looks up one long, dimly-lighted road and down another, and even listens for the distant tread of those heavily-booted feet. But however still the night air may be, it rarely bears such music to his ear; and when, at last, he reaches home in safety, he feels that it is chance, not the constable, that has stood his friend. Once there, however, he is inclined to wish that the constable had neglected him more completely. A policeman has called, it seems, in the course of the evening to tell the household that there are burglars about, and has frightened the servants out of their wits by stories of their superhuman cunning and ruthless cruelty. That is his only appearance during the night, and if the inmates happen to hear him trying the doors or moving about in the garden, they are too frightened to distinguish the footstep of the protector from that of the assailant against whom they have been warned. Yet the outlay needed to make the suburbs as secure as the more central parts of London is very small, in comparison with the comfort the inhabitants would derive from the sense that they were so. The reason, probably, why the Metropolitan Police is so much too weak for the work it has to do, is the disproportionate value of property in certain districts. Any increase in the rate would fall most heavily on those who are sufficiently protected already. Really, this is no argument against the increase, because the unprotected state of the suburbs is, in part, due to the feeling of the police authorities that those who pay most ought to get most in return. This theory is subversive, however, of the whole principle of rating, which is that the administrative unit being once determined, all within it pay in proportion, not to their wants, but to their means. The absence of policemen is a grievance that weighs very heavily on the London suburbs, and it would be well if the inhabitants would combine to bring some pressure to bear on the Home Secretary in regard to it. They could do so with great effect, if they chose. Sir William Harcourt would not long withstand the representations of a deputation from the Vestries of the suburbs, headed by the Members for the boroughs or counties in which these suburbs are situated.

Within the last few days, indeed, the order has been given to make a little addition to the London Police. The reinforcement has been a long time coming, and now that it has come, no one can complain that it is too large. Five hundred recruits are something, but they are not much, and they will probably be used, at all events in the first instance, simply to replace trained men whose services are needed elsewhere. Thus, for the moment, the effect of making the Force stronger may be to make it, as regards the suburbs, less serviceable. The motive which has led Sir William Harcourt to concede even this addition has probably nothing to do with the state of the suburbs. The Home Secretary's business lies with the more central parts, and it is in those that he, no doubt, thinks that more men are wanted. In this respect he is perfectly right. The Fenian alarms have made the duties of the police in connection alike with public men and public buildings a great deal heavier than they used to be, and an addition of five hundred men to the total strength of the force is no more than is wanted to meet these new demands. But the needs of the suburbs are permanent, and the more the attention of the police is concentrated upon dynamite in Westminster, the more free the housebreaker and the footpad will be to work their will in Blackheath or Wimbledon. These are the kind of districts whose cause seems to want an advocate, and though the Home Secretary has done rightly in caring for Whitehall and Palace Yard, he should not be suffered to forget that the Metropolitan Police has the whole Metropolitan District in charge, and that it ought to be strong enough to give a proportionate sense of security to every part of it. The local High Street does not need as many constables as Regent Street or Bond Street; but equally with Regent Street or Bond Street, it should have as many constables as it does need.

SOCIALISM AND ANARCHISM AT GENEVA.

THOUGH among the thirty thousand foreigners who have chosen Geneva as their temporary dwelling-place there is a considerable proportion of Russian Nihilists, French Anarchists, and German Social Democrats, the authorities are never in fear of dynamite, and the slender police force keeps order without difficulty. This arises from the fact that, except for religious enthusiasts, the Genevan Government is one of the most tolerant in Europe. Revolutionary refugees enjoy privileges there which they can command nowhere else on the Continent, and they are careful not to risk expulsion by proceedings of a nature to imperil the public peace or embroil the Confederation with Foreign Powers. Sometimes, as in the case of Prince Krapotkine (who was expelled for publishing, under his signature, a too violent protestation against the execution of Sophia Petrowska, and parading the town at the head of an Anarchist procession), they overstep the line which divides liberty from licence; but as a rule, they take their measures so well, that the police have rarely to interfere. For instance, if the Révolte, which preaches the gospel of dynamite and the duty of murder with a ferocity that is positively appalling, were openly conducted by foreigners, they would certainly be expelled and the paper suppressed, a fate that, a few years ago, befell the Anarchist Avant Garde, of Chaux de Fonds; but the nominal editor and publisher being Swiss, they cannot be touched, albeit, as is well known, the contributors are Russian refugees and French Socialists.

The avowed Anarchists at Geneva are probably under a hundred. Even on so important an occasion as the recent manifestation in memory of the Paris Commune, they could not muster more than 150, of whom at least one-half were outsiders. Social Democrats who seek to reorganise society rather by a revolution of the State than its utter destruction are more numerous, and include in their ranks a score or two of Genevan artisans and a few workmen from German Switzerland. On Sunday last they, too, celebrated by a meeting the anniversary of the Commune. The meeting was held in the Tonhalle, the assembly-room of a café brassier, and except that the chairman was armed with a bell, which he frequently used, and the audience smoked hugely and consumed much beer, the proceedings did not differ materially from those of an English meeting. Touching oratorical effect, however, the speeches were decidedly superior to the speeches generally delivered at political gatherings in England. Dullness the audience would by no means tolerate. If an orator became a little tedious, he was warned by cries of "À l'eau!" and "Plus haut!" either to speak better and louder, or sit down. The former of these expressions did not, as may be supposed, signify that he was in danger of being thrown into the Lake, but that recourse to the decanter of water that stood before him might, perchance, enliven his waning eloquence. On the other hand, the speeches were marked by an entire absence of argument. The style of these was that of "Bollo's address to the Peruvians," dear to our childhood, and of Bruce's address to his soldiers before the battle of Bannockburn. They abounded in such phrases as "Down with the aristocrats!" "Crush the bourgeoisie!" "Restore to the disinherited the fruits of their labour;" and wealth and tyranny, poverty and virtue, were treated as convertible terms. The Government of Switzerland received no better measure than that of neighbouring monarchies. One speaker, who described himself as a Swiss workman, adduced as proof of the inefficiency of the present Republican institutions that in Geneva,—relatively to its size one of the richest of European cities,—there are people who lack bread, and that multitudes of Swiss citizens are every year compelled to seek abroad the work they cannot find at home. The panacea for these evils is, of course, the establishment of the Social Republic; in other words, of Socialism organised by the State. How this is to improve matters, or how any conceivable scheme can protect men from the consequences of their own folly, idleness, and improvidence, nobody condescended to explain. The new Republic, moreover, as described by some of its advocates, would, if it could be established, be one of the most grinding tyrannies the world has ever seen. It is the conception of this truth that has constrained men like Krapotkine and Reclus to the adoption of Anarchism; and between Anarchists and State Socialists there reigns a feud as bitter as ever reigned between orthodox Mahomedans and their Shiite brethren. At Geneva, they could not so far sink their differences as to celebrate in common the anniversary of the "epoch-making" Commune.

The words faim, misère, prolétaire were often in the mouths of the speakers at this meeting, yet it was abundantly evident that none of them was either poor or hungry, and it may be doubted if they had any right whatever to represent the Prolétariat whose cause they professed to plead. Workmen some of them may have been, at any rate they said so; but almost all were of the well-fed sort, dressed in broad-cloth, and in no respect save by their red badges distinguishable from the bourgeoisie whom they are never tired of reviling. Shortly before the termination of the proceedings, a remarkable incident occurred. While an impassioned and elegantly attired Socialist was denouncing traders and employers in the accepted fashion, a sturdy, brown-faced fellow, one of the very few genuine, hard-fisted sons of toil in the room, asked the speaker to "show his hands." This demand was warmly supported and as warmly opposed, whereupon a disturbance ensued, and the manifestation ended in a free-fight and a general skedaddle.

This incident goes to prove, what those who have studied the question already know, that the Prolétariat has not yet become Socialist, and that real poverty is least among the causes of Socialism. Its causes are rather to be sought in the spread of knowledge, and the decay of faith. Education is sharpening men's faculties, giving them new desires, making them more apprehensive as to the future and more envious of the rich, at the very time that the increase of scepticism, by depriving them of the hope of immortality and destroying the idea of duty, renders them more resolute to enjoy the present. There are observers who think that the Communistic movement is only in its infancy, and in this opinion the present writer is reluctantly constrained to concur.

THE DYNAMITE DANGER.

IN the Spectator of October 19th, 1878, the present writer called attention to the very slight evidence producible for the fixed impression in the European mind that Science would always be found friendly to the happiness of the human race. That impression is exactly contrary to the idea current in the middle ages, when men supposed that science was akin to magic, and if not inevitably diabolic, at least deserving of the suspicion of the wise. There were doubts even about medicine, while a mechanician, and still more a chemist, of any unusual attainments was held to be a kind of sorcerer, whom the Church would do well to hand over to the secular arm. After the invention of printing, this feeling gradually died away, till, from the first ascent of the Montgolfiers in their perfectly useless balloon to the discovery of the electric light, every scientific discovery was hailed with a sort of rapture of popular applause. Anybody who applied scientific knowledge to the work of life was regarded as a benefactor; and if he died a millionaire, as Arkwright did and Bessemer will, was quoted in books like Mr. Smiles' as an instance of the success achieved by industry and brain. The time, however, has arrived when we may be on the edge of a reversion to the ancient feeling. The contingency to which we pointed in 1878 as probable has occurred. Science, which had armed civilisation, has now armed savagery. The bad and the mad have obtained from science command of a strong weapon of destruction, which they can carry about, can conceal, and can use without committing suicide, and the whole world is the worse for "a triumph of the intellect." The dangerous classes have learned from the savants that nitric acid mixed in a certain proportion with any combustible, cotton, or glycerine, or the like, will make an explosive of great force, and that by using very simple means they can keep and fire the mixture without executing themselves. Some chemist, or firework-maker, or experimental artillerist has told them that, though the best nitro-explosives are highly dangerous to keep or use, poor explosives of the kind can be kept or fired safely, if only made active by a little fulminate of mercury. A minute metal capsule of that substance explodes with such energy that, to use common words, it fires all the atoms in the mass of an indifferent preparation of nitrified cotton or glycerine, or other combustible, in the same indivisible point of time, and makes the preparation as effective in shattering power as if it were of the highest, and, therefore, most dangerous quality. A slow fuse, which is in principle only improved touchwood, fires the fulminate, the fulminate fires the "dynamite"—nitrified cotton—and there is a bombshell as destructive as any artillerist can throw. Anybody, good or bad, can, in fact, with the help of a chemical student, firework-maker, or assistant in a gun foundry, place himself in possession of a battery of artillery which is not, as batteries go, very powerful, and cannot be used from a distance, but still can for purposes of pure destruction be made highly efficient. Anybody careless of life, with a pound of dynamite and a pinch of the fulminate of mercury, can make himself as dangerous as if he could direct an eighty-ton gun. Science has, in fact, armed men without distinction of character with a strong weapon, and we are witnessing the beginning of the result. It is only the beginning, for the callous races have not yet learned the facts, or the kind of advantage which the new agent will give, say, to the Chinese, who do not mind expending themselves, and who might conquer Asia with explosives without drawing a sword; but even the beginning is not pleasant. Everywhere, except, as yet, in America, the enemies of society, whether good or bad—for it is bad analysis to lump them all together—are excited by possession of the new power, are using it, and, still more, are threatening to use it, with results which positively intoxicate them till their consciences are paralysed as by a strong drug. That effect of power of any sort has been noted for ages, and we are writing gravely when we state our belief that on some natures this power of using dynamite has a directly demoralising effect, like that of despotic authority on some others. The disparity between the means and the result tempts them, till the injury to mankind dies away out of the thoughts of men who, if only compelled to witness the suffering they cause, would feel like the wretched man found dying this week in St. Petersburg. He had pledged himself to kill the Czar, and at a Guards' dinner in the disguise of a waiter actually reached the Sovereign's person. He was, however, too close; he realised the horror of his own deed, and rather than perform it, stepped out and killed himself. It was not fear,—he could have killed himself just as easily a moment after the assassination; it was conscience, to which suicide appeared either a less crime than murder, or—for we must allow for the Continental opinion on the subject—no crime at all. The new power is therefore frequently used, how frequently the world scarcely perceives. The big explosions drown in the general memory the little explosions, but they are so frequent that we believe it no exaggeration to say that no week passes without some act of wilful destruction in which a nitrous compound has been employed. In Russia, in Austria, in France, in Spain, in England, in Belgium, “an explosion,” now directed against a church, again against a bank, often against a counting-house, and anon against a public building, is always happening.

It is natural enough under such circumstances that there should be first panic and then keen inquiry into methods of prevention, and the panic is not diminished by the conclusion to which we believe Governments and savants have as yet alike been driven, that very little more can be done in the way of precaution, and that society must be protected by the old device of incessant watchfulness. The manufacture of the nitricised compounds cannot be effectually forbidden. The best way to restrict it, no doubt, as Truth has suggested, is to regulate the making of nitric acid; but experience shows that the most dangerous of all anarchists are the lower men of science and the workmen trained in laboratories, who feel with a half-lunatic bitterness the difference between their intellectual acquirements and their position,—and under the advice of such men, nitric acid can be made almost as easily as illicit potheen. It is, after all, only a product of nitrate of potash and oil of vitriol properly heated up, and neither substance can be made inaccessible to chemists. As to suppressing the application of the acid, when obtained, to combustibles, we might as well try to suppress lucifer-matches. “Dynamite”—the acid once granted—can be made in a barn, or a forest, or a room in a great city, and its manufacture can no more be prevented than illicit distillation. Terror will not do it, for the illicit manufacturers can trust one another so far; and if we go too far in terror, the tribunals will not convict. Moreover, Governments and miners both want the explosives, and it is from official stores and mining stores that the regular Anarchists have usually procured it. The reports are constant, especially in Russia, of large thefts from the arsenals and from manufactories such as the one which is recently reported to have despatched fifty tons in a single ship. A crusade against dynamite would require the consent of all Governments, those of Asia included, and of all men with chemical knowledge; and such a consensus is not, in the present state of the world, to be procured. To arrange that the possession of a nitricised combustible without a special licence, only to be issued from Ministries of the Interior, should be a highly penal offence, would, no doubt, facilitate the action of the police, but then it would also facilitate malignant denunciations to an almost unbearable degree. No one would be safe against the possible finding of dynamite on his premises, and chemists especially would lead miserable lives. As to punishing its use, the law is already severe enough. To blow up a human being is a capital offence, and to try to blow up a building is punishable with fourteen years' penal servitude, and if we made the latter offence capital, we should only increase the readiness to take life, and perhaps demoralise juries.

There is very little to be done, except watch, and, so far as possible, avoid panic. The reasons for the latter are patent, but still, fear tends to exaggeration. The precise force of dynamite varies under conditions not yet fully known, but the experts think ten times the force of gunpowder a fair description, and ten times two or three pounds of powder will not destroy a town. Even larger quantities can only wreck the spaces they can reach, and their effects can no more go through a curvature of the earth than the effects of gunpowder can. It is more than doubtful, for example, if the means exist of destroying the House of Commons, as has been threatened in the anonymous letter to the Member for Helston, unless the criminal could not only enter the Palace of Westminster, but would consent to his own nearly inevitable destruction. As for the “far stronger means than dynamite” talked of in American meetings, they either do not exist, or they require for their manufacture and use that supreme self-devotion which is so rarely found in the enemies of society when required to do work involving their own lives. Those who would risk being blown up to kill an emperor will not risk being blown up to manufacture the needful detonator. The “fulminates” so often talked of have an objection to be called into existence, and resent the processes with an energy against which science has hitherto struggled in vain; while the asphyxiating agents are probably not very destructive. The evidence is very imperfect, because even men of science cannot make experiments in massacre; but Members of the House may be fairly sure that they cannot be all choked at once. The vapour of prussic acid, to describe unscientifically the most deadly of known asphyxiators, would give them time to get away, though the hindmost might have fainting fits. Of course, agents far stronger than any known may yet be discovered, and human society may have a difficult battle to fight, but after all, human nature does not change its characteristics. There never has been a time in history when a discontented sailor could not fire his ship, or a discontented reaper destroy the ricks, or a discontented criminal kill anybody he chose, if he would give his own life in exchange. The people of Moscow knew no science when they fired their city, and the Communists of Paris did more harm with their cans of earth-oil than the “Dynamiteurs” have ever done since. Man has always been able to destroy if he pleased, and the new power of knocking great holes in houses, though terrible to individuals, is against States less formidable than it appears. The rage against society has been intensified of late, and the rage against particular Governments; but after all, the old impulses were quite as formidable. We think the Fenians horrid, but the thatchers of Calcutta, quite ordinary and skilful workmen, used, when work was slack, to make the adjutant birds carry fireballs (gools, made of rice and powdered coal) to the roofs, burn down a few acres of thickly inhabited houses, and then go to work for a few months to rethatch the new buildings. Malice is nearly as dangerous as fanaticism, greed as dreaminess, the hatred that comes of want as the hatred that springs from brooding over the miseries of Ireland. The Armada was at least as formidable as “Mr. Crowe, of Peoria,” if there is such a person, yet,—“Afflavit Deus, et dissipati sunt.”

CONTENT.

THE question which has lately been raised in these columns as to the spiritual character of Content deserves some consideration. It seems a bold thing to say, but we will nevertheless say it, that properly understood, there is no more ambitious and aspiring virtue than Content in the Christian sense,—none fuller of true passion in the highest meaning of that great, but much abused word. In this sense, Content is, indeed, something far higher than the virtue which Dekker apostrophised in the beautiful lines,—“Art thou poor, yet hast thou golden slumbers, O sweet Content?” In the Christian sense, Content has often no golden slumbers; it is not only not apathy, not sluggishness, not passiveness of mind, but in St. Paul's sense it is radically inconsistent with any dwindling tendencies,—with shrinkings and contractings of the mind within the physical limits assigned to it. The ideal of Content set before us by St. Paul is not passive acquiescence in anything, but rather a state of mind such as the Stoics cultivated, minus its haughtiness and its affectation of self-sufficiency. It is not an elastic contractibility enabling us to move without friction within the external conditions in which we find ourselves, but an expansive force which regards these external conditions,—change as they may,—as the appointed meat and drink of the higher spiritual qualities, the qualities by virtue of which we are bound either so to mould the circumstances which need moulding, or so to mould ourselves, as to derive from these circumstances, or from our own action upon them, the very stimulus or nourishment which we most need. Take the passage in which St. Paul describes to the Church at Philippi what he means by Content, and notice in what curious and absolute contrast it is to anything like supineness or passivity. He expresses his joy that the Church there had revived its intention of sending him help, and goes on, "Not that I speak in respect of want, for I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content." But nothing can be plainer than that he does not mean to recommend passive acquiescence in an unsatisfactory state of the external conditions of existence when it is possible to change them for the better, for the whole passage is a frank admission that he was anxious for the display of generosity by the Church at Philippi, extremely thankful that they had exerted themselves once and again on his behalf, and very grateful personally to those who had been the chief movers in the matter. What he insists on is that if the external conditions of one's lot suggest active exertion in order that they may be altered for the better, the active exertion shall be forthcoming; while if they suggest active exertion not for the purpose of altering them, but of altering oneself so as to make a better use of them, then that that active exertion also shall be forthcoming. But in all and every case, the virtue of Content does not consist in shrinking within the limits set you, but in going out of yourself, so to transform and transmute the conditions in which you find yourself as to make them feed some of the highest passions of the soul,—gratitude, if the particular conditions specially call for gratitude; patience and forbearance and fortitude, if they call for patience, forbearance, and fortitude; inextinguishable zeal, persuasiveness, and sympathy, if the external circumstances seem to cry out for the exercise of a strong moulding and transforming power to recast and renovate them. Want, says St. Paul, is as great an opportunity for this alchemy of the soul as wealth. He has learned "how to be in want" and "how to abound," "how to be hungry" and "how to be filled," and yet whether wanting or abounding, whether hungry or filled, in either case alike how to be equally well satisfied with the opportunity afforded by the moment for responding in the right way, whether to the want, or to its satisfaction, or to the call for active exertion. There is no passage in any spiritual writer which depicts a more active, a more expansive, a more positively exalted attitude of mind than St. Paul describes in this passage as the virtue of Content. Content is the condition of mind in which nothing can foil the energy of the spirit. It is the quality, which, having evoked generosity in others, flows forth in gratitude for that generosity; which, having failed to evoke generosity, manifests itself in submission to disappointment and patient trust in the future germination of the seed sown; which, having neither succeeded nor failed, but only perceived that more needs to be done before the work is finished, shows itself in loyal and unremitting endeavour to stir to generous effort those who are as yet supine. This is what the true Content means,—that hearty willingness alike for calamity, or joy, or weighty responsibility, which is inspired by the magic secret that in each condition alike there is some divine spring of help, some opportunity of so dealing that the actual conditions, however apparently calamitous, shall be better, there and then, than any alternative, however bright. This is certainly the sense in which St. Paul regarded Content,—as resourcefulness of the highest kind, involving a spiritual elasticity of the highest kind, a power to transform what often seemed like mere wounds and pangs and fetters into new strength and life and freedom. Surely nothing less like a merely passive virtue can be imagined than the virtue of Content as described by St. Paul.

But, doubtless, there is a sense in which the world is right in supposing that Content,—even true Christian Content,—encourages what the world wrongly regards as supineness, apathy, pliancy to circumstance. The superstition,—for superstition it is,—that human energy should be strung to its highest pitch to people the earth, to multiply material wealth, and to increase the physical resources of civilisation, is one with which the exercise of the virtue of Christian Content can never be reconciled. If you are to regard want or demand only and solely as providing the opportunity for an increased supply, and not also as an opportunity for teaching you how best to bear, and learn the lesson of, want, you certainly do not regard it from the Christian point of view. We do not doubt for a moment that in the Gospel of what we may call the Teutonic races, the first duty of man is to overcome physical difficulties wherever they are not insuperable, and to engage his whole soul in the conflict with the natural obstacles to human desires; but this is not a Christian and not a true Gospel. It is, as Carlyle would say, a Berserkir Gospel, the Gospel of the Sea-kings, the Gospel of men who had derived their religion more from the worship of Thor than from the worship of Christ; but it is not a Gospel that regards the perfection of the inward nature,—and especially the power at any higher call to forbear seeking what you most desire,—as of infinitely more importance than the satisfaction of the natural desires. In this matter we do not hesitate to say that the Protestant peoples have never yet recovered the higher stand-point of the Roman Catholic Church before the Renaissance,—the stand-point from which it matters comparatively little whether man achieves wonders or not in the conquest of the physical world, so long as he can achieve those greater wonders which consist in learning to extract gladness of the heart from persecution and misfortune, and true humility from wealth, prosperity, and praise. Even Matthew Arnold,—who, with all his scepticism, thoroughly understands one of the great key-notes of Christianity,—teaches England a great and needful lesson, when he reminds us how scornfully the more spiritual East regarded the physical irresistibility of Rome:—

"The East bowed low before the blast
In patient, deep disdain;
She let the Legions thunder past,
And plunged in thought again."

The "Secret of Jesus," as even Matthew Arnold teaches us, is the secret that the satisfaction of desire is often a very poor thing, as compared with the deliberate waiving of our own desire, of our own self-will,—a waiving of self-will which expresses an inward and higher form of the spiritual will itself. But which of the Teutonic nations at least, has learned this secret? Not the English, who will cloud heaven and disfigure earth to get over a slight difficulty in moving a few tons of slate; not the Yankees, who sweep Red Indians out of their path much as they sweep rattlesnakes, with a total disregard of the opportunity offered them for chastising their own desires; not the Germans, who lavish blood and iron for rebuilding their empire, when they might have rebuilt it, probably even more solidly, by a less liberal expenditure of sweetness and light. Nor, indeed, so far as we can see, has any great modern people learned the secret. The view that the renunciation of a certain class of natural desires is often essential to the satisfaction of wants of an infinitely higher and purer order, is, we should say, almost confined now-a-days to a few spiritual Christians,—mostly Catholics, Anglicans, or Quakers,—and a few spiritual Buddhists, amongst whom we might, perhaps, include Mr. Arnold, and all the other believers in "the Secret of Jesus," who, nevertheless, professedly at least, worship only "a stream of tendency not ourselves which makes for righteousness." Protestantism, properly so called, though in many respects a noble and spiritual, and in every respect a most manful creed, is in essence a fighting creed, and a creed which can hardly understand the overcoming of evil by any power but that of fighting, a creed whose devotees have never seriously considered or entered into the significance of our Lord's hint that there is much evil which will never be overcome by fighting it, and which may be overcome by ceasing to resist it,—by suddenly conceding to its aggressive injustice even more of that which you have a right to concede, than evil itself demands. But then Protestantism is not the religion of Content; it is the religion of Discontent, of noble discontent, of grand discontent, of laborious discontent, but of discontent all the same, discontent with the physical obstacles to progress, discontent with the moral obstacles to progress, and discontent, most of all, with the moral failures and collapses within. In Carlyle's life and writings you see this discontent written out large,—unassuaged by any gleam of revelation,—and reduced to the naked rage of its primeval genius. So far as we know Protestantism, Content has never been one of its favourite virtues. It has always preached the crusade against external difficulties rather than that magic “secret of Jesus,”—the surrender of the self-will which loves to wrestle with these difficulties. It has preached the gospel of Progress, and not the gospel of Content. But surely there is a limit to the truth of this gospel of progress, and surely most of us have long ago passed that limit. The English people at least have, we believe, much more to learn in the direction of the surrender of their self-will and their darling desires, than they have in the direction of the maxim, “It’s dogged as does it.” It is by no means always “dogged as does it.” Or rather, if it be “dogged as does it,” the thing which “dogged” does, is often not nearly so well worth doing as the thing which renunciation does, if renunciation be animated by a truly spiritual motive. The creation of the Christian character is a product partly of Christian effort, but partly of the consequence of renouncing effort where the object of the effort is desired, as it so often is, chiefly out of indomitable self-will. The self-will of Englishmen is apt to be indomitable; but, in spite of the apparent paradox, the victories of the spirit which is content often to welcome defeat, are much greater than the victories of the spirit which revels in the reputation of indomitability, and holds on to self-will even with its dying clutch.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

CONTENTMENT AND THE CHURCH CATECHISM.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE “SPECTATOR.”]

SIR,—Does not the question altogether turn on what is meant by contentment? To be contented is, of course, quite compatible with the being eager to rise above the station in which one is born. It is not the suppression of aspiration or acquiescence in a stunted, limited, undeveloped, down-trodden condition of life. A contented man may be always striving to remove the obstacles, social and other, that ought not to be before him; and to destroy privilege, and everything that artificially favours one against another. The word for contented in the New Testament is αὐτάρκης, “self-sufficient.” And so to be contented means to be able to bear up oneself, at whatever stage of one’s progress one may be; to be self-possessed, not fretful, not out of sorts, æquanimis, not inclined to murmur against God, not malevolent towards one’s fellow-men, not envious, or jealous, or bitter against one’s fellow-men, but cheerful and gracious. And to be contented also includes the being not addicted, or a slave, to the love of money, according to the words Ἀφιλάργυρος ὁ τρόπος of Hebrews xiii., 5. And so, “the state of life unto which it shall please God to call me” (not to speak of the words being addressed to children, who have all their lives before them), is not a fixed, unchangeable state, until I have done my best, and reached the last and highest position that I can reach. I would just add that, much as some might wish it to do so, the word better evidently and historically does not mean those who are more good than one is oneself, but those who are over one in the Lord. And it is most important to insist, especially in these days, for the maintenance of political and social life, that there are those who are rightfully clothed with authority, placed over us, ordained, by God.—I am, Sir, &c.,

St. John’s, Westminster.

HENRY D. THOMAS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE “SPECTATOR.”]

SIR,—Mr. S. Headlam denies that the words “my betters” mean “those of higher rank than myself.” Shakespeare, however, uses the phrase in a convincing way. I quote a few out of many instances:—

Tempest, i., 2: That I am more better than Prospero, master of a full, poor cell, and thy no greater father.

Twelfth Night, i., 3: As [good as] any man in Illyria. . . . under the degree of my betters.

As You Like It, i., 1: The courtesy of nations allows you my better, in that you are the first-born.

King John, i., 1: Our country manners give our betters way.

Henry V., iv., 1: What are you? Pistol. As good a gentleman as the Emperor. K. H. Then you are a better than the King.

I. Henry VI., v., 5: Her father is no better than an earl. . . . Yes, my lord, her father is a King.

II. Henry VI., v., 1: YORK. I am far better born than is the King. . . . The sons of York, thy betters in their birth.

III. Henry VI., ii., 5: Methinks it were a happy life, to be no better than a homely swain. Ibid., v., 5: I am your better, traitors as ye are.

Lear, i., 4: Your disordered rabble make servants of their betters.

Hamlet, iii., 4: I took thee for thy better.

Did Hamlet esteem his uncle “more good”—so Mr. Headlam glosses the phrase—than Polonius? Once at least in the Authorised Version (Hebrews i., 4) this sense appears,—“Better than the angels.”

The Catechism certainly teaches, with Romans xiii., 7, “Custom to whom custom, fear to whom fear, honour to whom honour.”—I am, Sir, &c.,

“WANTING IS—WHAT?”

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE “SPECTATOR.”]

SIR,—I would suggest two other interpretations of the words, “Where is the spot?” in Mr. Browning’s enigmatical poem, “Wanting is—what?” besides that which is given in your article on “Startling Poetry.”—(1.) “Where is the blemish which mars the beauty of the scene?” (2.) “In what part of the picture is the want felt?” It seems to me impossible in this case to fix with certainty Mr. Browning’s meaning. In my limited study of his poetry, I have very frequently come across similar vagueness. The context of a passage often proves no guide in the selection of one out of many equally eligible meanings. This, though undoubtedly a source of infinite delight to Browning Societies, is irritating to most readers, and, perhaps, more than anything else has prevented the poet from finding that large audience which, on account of the matters of which he loves to treat, and the penetrating insight to which he subjects them, it is to be regretted he has failed to influence.—I am, Sir, &c.,

A. E. T.

SIR,—In your interesting notice of Mr. Browning’s new volume, you give a paraphrase of the fourth line of his introductory lyric which seems to me hardly correct. The line is,—“Where is the spot?” which you expand thus:—“Where is the spot where the redundant summer and the abundant blueness find their way into the soul so as to satisfy it?”

Would it not be simpler to suppose that Mr. Browning meant,—“In spite of the summer and the blueness, there is a spot somewhere?” This idea is suggested in his first line, “Wanting is—what?” and also in the fifth. Indeed, it seems to be the motif of the poem. Taking the words in this more natural sense, you escape the abrupt ellipsis which, as you say, has the nature of an electric shock.—I am, Sir, &c., R. F. D.

[Most likely our correspondents are right, but it is a very unusual thing to use “spot” as “blemish,” without a context that at once suggests it.—Ed. Spectator.]

“TO THINK LONG.”

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE “SPECTATOR.”]

SIR,—The phrase “To think long,” in the sense of “feel weariness,” could probably be paralleled from other English writers besides Milton. It is certainly good Scotch, as may be seen from the quotation given by Jamieson from Ross’s “Helenore,” to which may be added the following well-known stanza of Burns:—

“The Muse, nae Poet ever fand her,
Till by himsel’ he learn’d to wander,
Adown some trottin’ burn’s meander,
An’ no think lang;
O sweet, to stray and pensive ponder
A heart-felt sang!”

POETRY.

BRAITHWAITE AND BUTTERMERE RAILWAY.

A CRY FROM LANCASHIRE TO THE PEERS.

You ask high thought, pure poetry, and prate
Of England’s wealth and happiness secure,
Then, whirled at ease on Continental tour,
Forget the rush of Town, the hot Debate,
The Factory stench, the steamy sounds that grate

On fevered brains. Our Poets are but poor!—
Who toil in Hells need Heavens at their door!
The student has small time to recreate!

My Lords, since Commerce, with her clarions rude,
Has scared our birds, and quite disflowered our homes,
Unleaved our trees, fouled every Northern stream,
Spare us one little mountain solitude,
Where still in quiet beauty Summer comes,
And men may find the England of their dream.

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF CARLYLE AND EMERSON.*

THIS correspondence is less interesting as a correspondence, than it is as affording traits of the two correspondents. On the whole, we have seldom read any correspondence between men of the same rank in which there is less real answering of one mind to the other. We do not mean, of course, that either Carlyle or Emerson is wanting in interest for the other. Quite the reverse. Each is supremely interesting to the other. But they live in such different planes that neither really helps the other at all with the thoughts with which he is struggling, so that the letters appear to be written rather in the hope of affording each a glimpse into the world in which the other is living,—a glimpse which each knows that the other will value,—than with any hope of contributing what shall help the other in his thoughts, or what will elicit from the other what shall help the writer. Considering that Carlyle is always telling Emerson that no other person on this planet appears to understand him so well as Emerson,—a compliment, by the way, which Emerson never reciprocates,—it is a great evidence of the supreme loneliness of which Carlyle so constantly complains, that he never once appeals to Emerson to help him in any train of thought, and that it never seems to occur to either that any such help would be possible on either side. This correspondence is not so much a correspondence in any true intellectual sense as a deliberate exchange of monologues (so far as it is not an elaborate series of beneficent business arrangements for Carlyle's benefit promoted by the disinterested and generous care of Emerson). Each is content to exhibit his own state of mind to the other, well convinced of the interest with which the exhibition of that state of mind will be received, but apparently without any expectation or wish that his friend will be able to offer any effectual aid. In part, this is due to the fact,—which Emerson had apparently more or less clearly grasped,—that Carlyle is not so much a thinker as an imaginer,—one who fills in the detail and colour of all such physical and spiritual scenery as is suited to his genius, but who deliberately refuses to apply his mind at all to any kind of scenery—physical or spiritual—which it does not suit his genius to take into account. For instance, one would have supposed that one who in theory had so much respect for the dumb inarticulate side of man, as Carlyle, would not have counted it the great sin of the universe that there was so little of articulate speech in it, and so much speech that missed its true mark altogether. Yet, as a matter of fact, this charge against the universe that it hardly even dimly guesses its own wants, and at all events cannot articulately state them, is a sort of parrot-cry with Carlyle that is repeated in nine-tenths of his letters with more or less vehemence, and reiterated in many of them till we are quite sick of it. "In Carlyle, as in Byron," wrote Emerson, "one is more struck with the rhetoric than the matter. He has manly superiority rather than intellectuality, and so makes good hard hits all the time. There is more character than intellect in every sentence, herein strongly resembling Samuel Johnson." That is perfectly true, but there is also more imagining power,—within a specific and rather limited area,—than even character. Hence Carlyle's letters, like his books, are not so much embodied thoughts as efforts at insight and at picturesque delineation of what he saw. Emerson, on the contrary, though not, in the opinion of the present writer, a great philosophic thinker, was a very admirable critic. He could not only see lucidly,—more widely, though with less wealth of imaginative vivacity than Carlyle; but he could try a man by his own standard, and by the standard of his peers, and see where he fell short either of himself or of them. Emerson's criticisms are charming in their nicety and shrewd culture. Carlyle truly charges him with being at bottom an aristocrat, and an aristocrat of refined culture he certainly was; while Carlyle is at bottom a sans-culotte, with a huge contempt for refined culture, and for everything almost except masculine energy and fire. What could be a finer criticism on Carlyle than the very first here given,—"Be pleased," writes Emerson, "to skip those excursive involved glees, and give us the simple air, without the volley of variations. At least, in some of your prefaces you should give us the theory of your rhetoric. I comprehend not why you should lavish, in that spendthrift style of yours, celestial truths." Carlyle might have answered that Emerson was much more competent to give the world the theory of his (Carlyle's) rhetoric than Carlyle himself was, that, indeed, though his genius was the proper subject for a true speculative theory, there was hardly a man alive so little likely to come at it as himself, or so competent to come at it as Emerson.

Take these two volumes as a whole, and we should say that they are a little disappointing. We find in them a few very graphic portraits by Carlyle, a few very shrewd and sometimes humorous literary criticisms by Emerson, but of the spiritual and moral exchange of deep convictions between the two which we had vaguely looked for, hardly anything at all. Here is a specimen of the kind of insight in which Carlyle's letters most abound, in this sketch of O'Connell's tail:—

"We are a singular people, in a singular condition. Not many nights ago, in one of those phenomenal assemblages named routs, whither we had gone to see the countenance of O'Connell and Company (the Tail was a peacock's tail, with blonde-muslin women and heroic Parliamentary men), one of the company, a 'distinguished female' (as we call them), informed my Wife 'O'Connell was the master-spirit of this age.' If so, then for what we have received let us be thankful,—and enjoy it without criticism."

"Milnes is a Tory Member of Parliament; think of that! For the rest, he describes his religion in these terms: 'I profess to be a Crypto-Catholic.' Conceive the man! A most bland-smiling, semi-quizzical, affectionate, high-bred, Italianised little man, who has long, olive-blond hair, a dimple, next to no chin, and flings his arm round your neck when he addresses you in public society! Let us hear now what he will say of the American Vates. . . . You have doubtless seen Milnes's review of you. I know not that you will find it to strike direct upon the secret of Emerson, to hit the nail on the head, anywhere at all; I rather think not. But it is gently, not unlovingly done;—and lays the first plank of a kind of pulpit for you here and throughout all Saxondom: a thing rather to be thankful for. It on the whole surpassed my expectations. Milnes tells me he is sending you a copy and a Note, by Sumner. He is really a pretty little robin-redbreast of a man. . . . Richard Milnes had a letter from you, one morning lately, when I met him at old Rogers's. He is brisk as ever; his kindly Dilettantism looking sometimes as if it would grow a sort of Earnest by and by. He has a new volume of Poems out: I advised him to try Prose; he admitted that Poetry would not be generally read again in these ages,—but pleaded, 'It was so convenient for veiling commonplace!' The honest little heart!"

In 1843, Monckton Milnes, grown in worldly wisdom, has learnt an irony of his own:—

"I said to Richard Milnes, 'Now in honesty what is the use of putting your accusative before the verb, and otherwise entangling the syntax; if there really is an image of any object, thought, or thing within you, for God's sake let me have it the shortest way, and I will so cheerfully excuse the omission of the jingle at the end: cannot I do without that?' Milnes answered, 'Ah, my dear fellow, it is because we have no thought, or almost none; a little thought goes a great way when you put it into rhyme!'"

Here is Monckton Milnes in 1847:—

"This morning Richard Milnes writes to me for your address; which I have sent. He is just returned out of Spain; home swiftly to 'vote for the Jew Bill'; is doing hospitalities at Woburn Abbey; and I suppose will be in Yorkshire (home, near Pontefract) before long. See him if you have opportunity: a man very easy to see and get into flowing talk with; a man of much sharpness of faculty, well tempered by several inches of 'Christian fat' he has upon his ribs for covering. One of the idlest, cheeriest, most gifted of fat little men."

Or, take Heraud and Landor:—

"You ask me about Landor and Heraud. Before my paper entirely vanish, let me put down a word about them. Heraud is a loquacious scribbacious little man, of middle age, of parboiled greasy aspect, whom Leigh Hunt describes as 'wavering in the most astonishing manner between being Something and Nothing.' To me he is chiefly remarkable as being still,—with his entirely enormous vanity and very small stock of faculty—out of Bedlam. He picked up a notion or two from Coleridge many years ago; and has ever since been rattling them in his head, like peas in an empty bladder, and calling on the world to 'List the Music of the spheres.' He escapes assassination, as I calculate, chiefly by being the cheerfulest best-natured little creature extant.—You cannot kill him he laughs so softly, even when he is like killing you. John Mill said, 'I forgive him freely for interpreting the Universe, now when I find he cannot pronounce the h's!' Really this is no caricature; you have not seen the match of Heraud in your days. I mentioned to him once that Novalis had said, 'The highest problem of Authorship is the writing of a Bible.'—'That is precisely what I am doing!' answered the aspiring, unaspiring.—Of Lander I have not got much benefit either. We met first, some four years ago, on Cheyne Walk here: a tall, broad, burly man, with gray hair, and large, fierce-rolling eyes; of the most restless, impetuous vivacity, not to be held in by the most perfect breeding,—expressing itself in high-colored superlatives, indeed in reckless exaggeration, now and then in a dry sharp laugh not of sport but of mockery; a wild man, whom no extent of culture had been able to tame! His intellectual faculty seemed to me to be weak in proportion to his violence of temper: the judgment he gives about anything is more apt to be wrong than right,—as the inward whirlwind shows him this side or the other of the object; and sides of an object are all that he sees. He is not an original man; in most cases one but sighs over the spectacle of common-place torn to rags. I find him painful as a writer; like a soul ever promising to take wing into the Æther, yet never doing it, ever splashing web-footed in the terrene mud, and only splashing the worse the more he strives! Two new tragedies of his that I read lately are the fatest stuff I have seen for long: not an ingot; ah no, a distracted coil of wire-drawings salable in no market. Poor Lander has left his Wife (who is said to be a fool) in Italy, with his children, who would not quit her; but it seems he has honestly surrendered all his money to her, except a bare annuity for furnished lodgings; and now lives at Bath, a solitary sexagenarian, in that manner. He visits London in May; but says always it would kill him soon: alas, I can well believe that! They say he has a kind heart; nor does it seem unlikely: a perfectly honest heart, free and fearless, dwelling amid such hallucinations, excitations, tempestuous confusions, I can see he has. Enough of him! Me he likes well enough, more thanks to him; but two hours of such speech as his leave me giddy and undone."

Emerson's reply about Lander shows much more of the critic than Carlyle, though much less of the painter:—

"Samner has since brought me a gay letter from yourself, concerning, in part, Lander and Heraud; in which as I know justice is not done to the one, I suppose it is not done to the other. But Heraud I give up freely to your tender mercies; I have no wish to save him. Lander can be shorn of all that is false and foolish, and yet leave a great deal for me to admire. Many years ago I have read a hundred fine memorable things in the Imaginary Conversations, though I know well the faults of that book, and the Pericles and Aspasia within two years has given me delight. I was introduced to the man Lander when I was in Florence, and he was very kind to me in answering a multitude of questions. His speech, I remember, was below his writing. I love the rich variety of his mind, his proud taste, his penetrating glances, and the poetic loftiness of his sentiment, which rises now and then to the meridian, though with the flight, I own, rather of a rocket than an orb, and terminated sometimes by a sudden tumble. I suspect you of very short and dashing reading in his books; and yet I should think you would like him,—both of you such glorious haters of cant. Forgive me, I have put you two together twenty times in my thought as the only writers who have the old briskness and vivacity. But you must leave me to my bad-taste and my perverse and whimsical combinations."

Finally, as a specimen of Carlyle's description, take this admirable portrait of Webster, the American statesman, whom Carlyle saw on Webster's visit to London:—

"Not many days ago I saw at breakfast the notablest of all your Notabilities, Daniel Webster. He is a magnificent specimen; you might say to all the world, This is your Yankee Englishman, such Limbs we make in Yankee-land! As a Logic-fencer, Advocate, or Parliamentary Hercules, one would incline to back him at first sight against all the extant world. The tanned complexion, that amorphous crag-like face; the dull black eyes under their precipice of brows, like dull anthracite furnaces, needing only to be blown; the mastiff-mouth, accurately closed:—I have not traced as much of silent Berserkir-rage, that I remember of, in any other man. 'I guess I should not like to be your nigger!'—Webster is not loquacious, but he is pertinent, conclusive; a dignified perfectly bred man, though not English in breeding: a man worthy of the best reception from us; and meeting such, I understand. He did not speak much with me that morning, but seemed not at all to dislike me: I meditate whether it is fit or not fit that I should seek out his residence, and leave my card too, before I go? Probably not; for the man is political, seemingly altogether; has been at the Queen's levée, &c., &c.: it is simply as a mastiff-mouthed man that he is interesting to me, and not otherwise at all."

To find Emerson at his best, one must look not for pure description, but for what we may call speculative description,—description penetrated by reflective comment. The following is written at New York:—

"I always seem to suffer some loss of faith on entering cities. They are great conspiracies; the parties are all maskers, who have taken mutual oaths of silence not to betray each other's secret, and each to keep the other's madness in countenance. You can scarce drive any craft here that does not seem a subornation of the treason."

And this is a comment on Carlyle's essay called "The Diamond Necklace":—

"I thought as I read this piece that your strange genius was the instant fruit of your London. It is the aroma of Babylon. Such as the great metropolis, such is this style: so vast, enormous, related to all the world, and so endless in details. I think you see as pictures every street, church, parliament-house, barrack, baker's shop, mutton-stall, forge, wharf, and ship, and whatever stands, creeps, rolls, or swims thereabouts, and make all your own. Hence your encyclopediacal allusion to all knowables, and the virtues and vices of your panoramic pages."

Emerson's reflections when visiting the seat of Congress at Washington are very striking:—

"Between my two speeches at Baltimore, I went to Washington, thirty-seven miles, and spent four days. The two poles of an enormous political battery, galvanic coil on coil, self-increased by series on series of plates from Mexico to Canada, and from the sea westward to the Rocky Mountains, here meet and play, and make the air electric and violent. Yet one feels how little, more than how much, man is represented there. I think, in the higher societies of the Universe, it will turn out that the angels are molecules, as the devils were always Titans, since the dulness of the world needs such mountainous demonstration, and the virtue is so modest and concentrating."

One rises from this correspondence with a sense that these men, who believed themselves possessed of some of the most vital truths of the day, dwelt singularly little upon them in their correspondence. The nearest thing to a great truth which Carlyle anywhere expresses is the conviction that the value of literature is determined not after all by what is written, though that is essential to it, but by what is not written,—by the personal life which gives its depth and intensity to the conviction expressed. This is a real and great truth, and was deeply cherished by Carlyle. But in all these letters we have come on none other anywhere near so valuable, while of mere Carlylese jargon and formula of the following kind there is enough, and to spare:—

"Man, all men seem radically dumb; jabbering mere jargons and noises from the teeth outwards; the inner meaning of them,—of them and of me, poor devils,—remaining shut, buried forever. If almost all Books were burnt (my own laid next the coal), I sometimes in my spleen feel as if it really would be better with us!"

Surely, for men who were so willing to "put off their Jewdom" as Carlyle and also Emerson, there is visible in this correspondence a wonderfully small residuum of vital truth by which to live and die. And it is very melancholy to find the two old men, with all their boasted transcendental faith, confiding to each other towards the last, the one that some euthanasia for old age, which should prevent its expiring in undignified imbecility, is desirable, the other that he is quite indifferent to the survival of his personal life beyond the grave. Obviously, the universal Mind which they worshipped was not the object of much individual trust or love. Emerson's nature, on the whole, comes out of this correspondence the more disinterested, saner, and wiser, though not the stronger and grander of the two.

EVERY-DAY ART.*

This is by no means a common-place book. Not that the author can be said to have propounded anything distinctly original with respect to his subject, but he discourses ably on the views which are current among those who have sound and cultivated views. We think it will not only be useful, as teaching good lessons on its own subject, Every-day Art, but by suggesting thoughts which might lead the mind to wider interests. The author gives his own subject a sound, useful, common-sense basis, by linking the consideration of it to thoughts which, though far from irrelevant, tend to a more comprehensive interest than we might expect from a work with so modest a title. Such sentences as the following are examples of what we mean:—

"Æsthetic culture is not the high-road to all the virtues, and, indeed, certain of the vices have been known to infest it. Neither, on the other hand, is there any special grace in ugliness. Art is only utterance. It must express something; and the vital question is,—What does it express? The daily association with honest, manly, real work, with graceful fancy, individual character, and refined art, must exert on us an influence less demoralising than the continual contact with falsity, pretence, and affectation. The fact that we may be wholly unconscious of the influence about us does not destroy its effect. The fresh air is tonic, whether we feel it to be so or not, and the germs of disease that emanate from a foul atmosphere are none the less fatal, though our nostrils be not sufficiently delicate to make us aware of the poison we breathe. . . . To-day's interest in decorative art may be only a fashion. It is more encouraging to believe that yesterday's apathy was but an episode."

And again:—

* Every-day Art: Short Essays on the Arts that are not Fine. By Lewis Foreman Day. London: B. T. Batsford.

"It is curious to observe how little correspondence there is between the progress of civilisation and of taste. Each appears to have gone its own way, quite independently of the other."

We ourselves believe that the great difficulty in all Art matters in this modern life of ours is to maintain originality in Art expression, which is only another word for a natural, spontaneous expression for an unfeigned delight in beauty, and, in maintaining such originality, not to transgress against a standard which the ordinary education of cultivated people obtains from a more or less superficial acquaintance with the Art of the past. Great power and genius are required in order that an artist should, so to speak, find himself among all the various influences which legacies from the past have left him. Such influences should be as useful servants to his native gifts, and not act the rôle of masters. Unqualified devotion should be to Nature, and Nature alone. Though the standard works of geniuses of the past ought undoubtedly to enrich, we see that they more often stifle the spontaneity of genuine artistic powers. Like parasites on a tree, they more often injure the healthy growth and spoil its natural beauty than add to its effect. It is probably the complicated conditions of modern culture which sap the earnestness out of many fundamental truths in the right feeling with regard to taste, as well as the grace out of the forms of so much of our social intercourse. We believe that the root of the evil, superficiality, lies in the fact of artists restraining the real impulse towards creation and expression of genuine feelings, lest the bugbear of the artist's craft, the critic, should find weak points. It is fatal to real taste, when the truth is forgotten that such a thing as real taste in human work does not exist till it is stamped by human individuality and preference. But we have only to remember the early pre-Raphaelite work, to realise how many weak points are at once offered to the critic, if such individuality and preference are made the first law of the artist's craft. Notwithstanding such weak points, there is a flavour about such efforts which, when compared to the work hedged in on every side by the countenance of Academic precedents, is like the early growth of plants when they push in juicy knobs out of the earth in spring, a growth of which artificial flowers never even remind us.

The chapter on taste headed, "I Know What I Like," is suggestive of many good ideas, though the argument is not, to our way of thinking, always conclusive. For instance, to the conclusion suggested by the following sentence we demur:—"After all," says the popular fallacy, 'it is a matter of taste!' But taste is not a personal matter. It is no more mere preference than judgment is mere opinion. It is as rare as it is supposed to be common. It implies not only artistic feeling and critical power, but their cultivation too." A really true feeling as to what is beautiful arises, we believe, far more from an instinct, from a genius in perceiving and enjoying beauty, than from any result of the critical faculty or any education of the eye. These are essential, when it is a matter of judging whether the art under consideration is right according to the conclusions of certain Academies which have made standards of right and wrong, based on the works of the geniuses of the past. But such standards are not likely to be exhaustive as guides to genius of the present day. At present, the conditions of life seem peculiarly unfavourable for the multiplication of this genius of perceiving and enjoying true beauty. Moreover, the artist has often to transplant himself into another atmosphere of taste to that which is fashionable in many respects, before he can develop anything like high art. For instance, in the case of the human form, the eye which has studied and enjoyed the beauty which Nature gave it finds nothing but deformity in the woman's pinched waist and in the man in his modern dress. The aspect of a people is unquestionably the strongest influence on the eye of the artist, for human beings must be the strongest interest in the life of any healthy-minded man; and when we fill our world with deformities of the human species, as far as the aspect of the human race goes, how can we expect any radical or genuine improvement in matters of taste? This awryness in such a principal matter is the cause, we believe, why the improvement which has undoubtedly taken place during the last twenty years in decoration, and in the every-day art of which Mr. Day's book is a very worthy and interesting exponent, is still simmering, as it were, on the surface of life, not really becoming ingrained into our national feeling. If beauty were a necessity to us, how could we stand the hideous fashions always present in men's costume, and always recurring in women's dress? If a pretty fashion happens to be adopted for a few months, it is a mere chance that it is pretty, and is quickly changed by the despotism of milliners to one as irrational and ugly as it is possible to imagine. If we stand with perfect quiescence such ugliness, beauty is distinctly not a necessity to us. As Mr. Day says:—"How astonishingly crude is the criticism of persons who are, except in Art, cultivated! They do not even know what an artist means, when he talks of vulgarity in his craft. Coarse language and loud tones, mincing affectation and pretence, offend them; but they would be startled to be told that the brutal workmanship, the crude colours, the mechanical affectation of finish, and the pretentiousness of cheap show, which are to be found broadcast in their drawing-rooms, are simply vulgar." We believe that anything like a universal awakening to a sense of fitness and reality is quite impossible, while we allow our eyes to be accustomed to such ugliness and unfitness of form as modern fashion converts the human form into, associated as it is with people whom of necessity we must care for so much more than we do for our walls, our furniture, or our houses. We think Mr. Day lays too strong a stress on the value of culture in taste. Without an encouragement of those conditions which inspire an original individual native instinct for beauty, culture will only lie like an idle accomplishment on the outside of our nature. It must always remain like a language we learn only through a book, and not through the ear; never a language we should think in or dream in. Still, to end our consideration on the chapter on taste as we began, we believe the reader will find it full of suggestiveness; and as our strongest feeling in Art matters, whether the art under consideration be high art or every-day art, is that originality and individuality should be the prominent features, any writing which suggests thoughts on the subject to be carried farther by the reader's own mind is, we think, essentially useful and interesting.

In the chapter "House and Home," there is a satisfactory stress laid on the truth that the aspect of a home should translate the individual taste of its owner; that not only trouble must be taken, if the aspect of a home is to add to the cultivating influences of life, but that that trouble should be taken more or less by the inhabitant himself, not merely delegated to others whose business it ought to be to carry out individual tastes according to knowledge. Mr. Day goes on to say, if the owner is too busy or idle to do this, he should, at all events, take the trouble to find out the decorator whose taste seems best to agree with his own. Mr. Day, throughout his book, wisely lays a great stress on the absolute necessity of reticence and modesty in decoration, if it is to play its true part in the beautifying and refining influences of our surroundings. Decorative art must never try to struggle forward into the prominent, isolated place which is that which a work worthy of being called high art ought to take. Decoration should be like the accompaniment to a melody,—never overpowering or obtrusive, but having a very real, legitimate place, as a harmonising and completing influence. It is interesting to reflect on the influences which the presence or absence of high art has on the quality of the decorative work of a time. Decoration is apt to become obtrusive in its character, and purely imitative in its quality when high art ceases to be a spontaneous utterance, and ceases to understand its mission—rather, it may be more truly said, when high art ceases to be created. When the art which is elaborate, and which is not intended to ornament architectural design or domestic surroundings—in other words, framed pictures and pedestalled statues—lowers its character from the ideal or dramatic to merely decorative or realistic effects, then we shall nearly always find the decorative feeling forgetting its own special rôle, and assuming an imitative character. The times which produce the finest high art will also produce the best decorative art. The wave of Art feeling which passes over certain periods in the civilisation of nations naturally touches various phases of Art expression, the decorative no less than the poetic and the illustrative. Hence, in our own times we have artists who are great as poet-painters, Watts, Rossetti, and Burne Jones; and we have a corresponding greatness in decorative genius, such as is shown in the work of the poet William Morris, in furniture, silks, stuffs, and stained glass; again, by Walter Crane, in pictorial dramatic decoration; and again, by William de Morgan, in pottery. The exact aptness shown in the beauty of the work of all these artists to the true aims of their own special lines of art, is the true sign of the touch of inspiration in their genius.

From Mr. Day's book, we should say that his place is that of a perfectly practical mediator between the genius of the actual inventor and those who are in the position of making use of his inventions. His book is a valuable and common-sense exposition on the actual fitting together of things necessary in the house of any one wishing his home to be one which shall not only express his own taste, after he has taken the trouble to put thought into the matter, and find out what are his real preferences, but also a home which by its aspect may lead to the cultivation of gentler, purer tastes and more gracious manners. There are numerous illustrations, showing that Mr. Day is an able draughtsman. There is a graceful delicacy in some of the designs for panels which is admirable,—for instance, on p. 29, "Treatment of Medlar;" p. 52, "Clematis Panel;" p. 81, "Magnolia Panel;" and p. 183, "Strawberry Panel." In conclusion, we recommend Every-day Art to our readers, as a book which raises its subject out of the common-place, by the honest and genuine taste which the writer displays for all the beauty that is appropriate to the secondary and modest rôle suitable to house decoration, and by the cultivation and mastery of the teachable qualities of his art which he displays.

[SECOND NOTICE.]

THE limits which were imposed upon Professor Nichol by the extent and variety of his subject compelled him to compress into a single chapter of forty pages—that on History, Romance, and Criticism, 1800-1850—his account of a period which contains, among others, Bancroft, Prescott, and Motley, Irving, Cooper, and Poe. Under such conditions, it is the hard fate of an historian that the greater the interest of the brief sketches he can give, the louder is the complaint of the reader that they are not more extensive. If, therefore, we are inclined to find fault with a long history of American literature in which Prescott and Motley together occupy only eight pages, Washington Irving only five, and Fenimore Cooper only three, our complaint must be attributed in part to the success of the author in making his brief sketches so interesting. Professor Nichol endeavours to make up in point what he loses in extent, and with considerable success, as, for instance, in his epigrammatic verdict upon Prescott:—"Boys read his Mexico and Peru as they read the Arabian Nights. Critics can point to few flaws in the accuracy of his judgment." Poe receives more adequate treatment, eight pages being devoted to his prose alone, of which an excellent analysis is given. Professor Nichol throws much light upon a perplexing subject by a suggestive classification of Poe's tales, showing that significance and instruction exist where we are apt to see only horror and the workings of a diseased imagination. The treatment of Poe's poetry is too short to be satisfactory. It contains, however, a brilliant simile. Speaking of the purity of Poe's verses in contrast with the disorder of his life, the author says:—"They are like nuns in the convent of a riotous city."

Professor Nichol finds that Bryant "stands on a high level," but that he exhibits the one-sided spirit of exclusive nature-worship. The author's arguments, however, in support of this claim for a high rank for Bryant seem to us inadequate. The "nature-worship" of the latter is too often a mere inventory of scenery, the natural procedure of a man whose life was passed "amid the jostling crowd" of the office of a daily newspaper. There stand the purple hills, above them the blue and arching sky, the rippling brooks beneath; the air is filled with the sweet melody of birds,—and so on; picturesque and wholesome, but not poetry of high rank. Or, lest we are accused of misrepresentation, here it is in his own words:—

"The thick roof
Of green and stirring branches is alive
And musical with birds, that sing and sport
In wantonness of spirit; while below,
The squirrel, with raised paws and form erect,
Chirps merrily. Throngs of insects in the shade
Try their thin wings and dance in the warm beam
That waked them into life. Even the green trees
Partake the deep contentment; as they bend
To the soft winds, the sun from the blue sky
Looks in and sheds a blessing on the scene.
..... The mossy rocks themselves,
And the old and ponderous trunks of prostrate trees
That lead from knoll to knoll a causeway rude
Or bridge the sunken brook, and their dark roots,

With all their earth upon them, twisting high,
Breathe fixed tranquillity. The rivulet"

—but we spare our readers the rivulet. Bryant's nature-worship does not reach to the insight which gives us in a word the key to the union of mind and scene. He transfers Nature accurately enough; he never transmutes it. We are surprised that Professor Nichol does not mention Bryant's translations of the Iliad and Odyssey; he makes a singular mistake, too, in quoting as "the concluding lines of the poem that William Wordsworth had learnt by heart," the passage ending with the words "yet the dead are there," which in the original are followed by a colon, and are some thirty lines from the end.

Longfellow is clearly the author's favourite, and he writes of him with affection and delicate insight, as in the following passages:—

"In the New World, but not wholly of it, he dwells with almost wearisome fondness on the World 'Old.' Volumes of old days, old associations that we cannot buy with gold, quaint old cities—Nuremberg, Bruges, and Prague—old poets and painters—Becerra and Bassalin, Albert Dürer and Hans Sachs, the cobbler bard—sweet old songs, old haunted houses, the gray old manse, Nature the dear old nurse, dear old England,—on phrases and thoughts like these his fancy broods." "His favourite virtues are endurance, calm; his confidants, gentle hearts; his pet themes, the praise and love of children." "There is nothing startling or outré, or 'wild and wordrous,'" in Longfellow's lyrics, "but, in a degree only inferior to the songs of Burns, they enhance our joys, soften our sorrows, and mix like music with our toil, floating upwards in storm and calm."

With all Professor Nichol's admiration for Hiawatha, he cannot help misspelling several of its outlandish names; and although he makes some learned remarks about the poem, he omits the most important fact, viz., that it is, in almost every respect, a reproduction of the Finnish Kalewala. Professor Nichol's regard for Longfellow's genius has led him into an unpleasant denunciation of what he is pleased to term "the half-scornful, half-clamorous conspiracy against Longfellow." He says:—

"Miss Margaret Fuller, in The Dial, leads the attack by a notice, in which she openly professes her dislike of Aristides; she has been followed, on both sides of the Atlantic, by the new school of critics, who have determined that nothing is to be accepted as poetry which is not either unintelligible or disgusting. These very clever people do not want a guide to direct, or an artist to charm, or a musician to lull them to repose amid 'the tumult of the time disconsolate.' They seek a phenomenon to stare at, an enigma to unravel, an ugly subject to dissect, a double lock to pick, something on which to show their own skill as intellectual conjurors or mental funambulists."

Now, in the first place, Margaret Fuller's severe criticism of Longfellow's poems did not appear in The Dial, if we remember aright, but was written for Horace Greeley in the New York Tribune; in the second place, it was forgotten years ago, and no one pays much attention to it now, any more than to Poe's jealous insinuations; thirdly, Professor Nichol can hardly have read the American reviews for the past year, or he would have known that hostile criticism of Longfellow's poetry is almost entirely confined to this side of the Atlantic; and finally, although it is true that "unintelligible and disgusting" verse seems lately to have become precious to many people, the statement that we have a "new school of critics" who will accept nothing as poetry which is not either the one or the other, and that this school has organised a "half-scornful, half-clamorous conspiracy against Longfellow," seems to us extravagant, and, so far as regards Longfellow, ridiculous. The truth is that the recent disparagement of his poetry has come, not from the "fleshly" school, but from the strictly intellectual school of critics, and has been provoked in great part by the unfortunate efforts of his admirers to secure for him a foremost place for qualities other than those which constituted his chief merit.

In spite, however, of the temptation to follow Professor Nichol step by step through his attractive volume, with much agreement, and only here and there dissent, we must confine ourselves to a few words about the remainder, and then pass on to the critic's special duties. In his account of Walt Whitman he treats a difficult subject with great discrimination; it is an admirable piece of literary criticism, and the description of the imaginary scene when Whitman bursts in upon a meeting of the Boston Saturday Club, which is basking in the serenity of Emerson and the "mellow sunshine" of Longfellow's presence, is one of the best bits in the book.

We can hardly speak too highly of Professor Nichol's essays upon Emerson and Hawthorne; the latter, especially, and the comparison of Emerson with Carlyle, is both profound and brilliant. His account of Thoreau, too, is admirable, and perhaps the most complete and satisfactory sketch in the book, but we fancy some readers will catch their breath when they come to the expression "a stoico-epicurean adiaphorist." The author's attitude toward so-called "American humour" may be judged from the following remark (one of the caustic passages to which we have alluded):—

* American Literature: an Historical Sketch, 1690-1890. By John Nichol, LL.D., Professor of English Literature in the University of Glasgow. Edinburgh: Adam and Charles Black. 1882.

"As the names of those who supply mental garbage (a species of food in great and increasing demand) should be left to sink in the oblivion from which they have unfortunately emerged, I shall refer to some of the worst of these caterers to a corrupted and corrupting taste by their self-assumed titles."

Professor Nichol's book bears the marks—we say it with regret, but without hesitation—of great carelessness. We have noted no fewer than a hundred inaccuracies of various kinds, of which we cannot, of course, give a complete list; first, typographical errors, misspellings, and misquotations; then, errors due to a want of familiarity with American life; and third, inaccuracies of statement. The first of these three classes comprises half of the entire number, and is due wholly to carelessness. For instance, gymastical, penetential, chesnut, Massachusetts; on page 76 a word omitted; storey for story, 1819 for 1619 (p. 33), gleam for glean (p. 149), bétise for bêtise, approchments, denoiement, unbarreable for unbarrelable—making nonsense of a sentence of Emerson (p. 297), and demoniac love for Emerson's daemonic love (p. 299), &c. A still worse case is where he says (p. 139):—"The moment Garrison was out [of jail], he went on printing, with the declaration, 'I will not recede an inch, and I shall be heard.' Such a voice could not be stifled." We are inclined to think that such a voice would easily have been stifled. What Garrison really said—and, if we remember aright, it was when he began the publication of the Liberator—was:—"I am in earnest,—I will not equivocate,—I will not excuse,—I will not retreat a single inch,—and I will be heard,"—a very different thing from Professor Nichol's milk-and-water version. The most misleading inaccuracy occurs, however, in the quotation (p. 301) of Emerson's Brahma. Professor Nichol announces it as a "transcendental enigma," and challenges his readers to unravel it; and then—by way, we suppose, of putting their wits to a more severe test—he omits the word not from the third line of the first stanza. Our readers may judge of the effect this is likely to have upon the "unravelling" process:—

"If the red slayer think he slays,
Or if the slain think he is slain,
They know [not] well the subtle ways
I keep, and pass, and turn again."

In most poetry, the fault of metre would rouse the reader's suspicions, but Emerson is frequently irregular, so there is nothing to betray the blunder. Many of the poetical extracts in the volume—e.g., Mrs. Julia Ward Howe's Battle Hymn of the Republic, Whittier's Maud Muller, Emerson's Brahma, Lowell's Fable for Critics, Leland's Hans Breitmann's Barty,—are garbled or badly mispunctuated. Finally, in the index alone there are nearly a dozen mistakes.

Of the second class of errors, those arising from an imperfect acquaintance with America, we will specify only Newhaven for New Haven (p. 49), Van-Buren for Van Buren (p. 114), the name of the F B K Society wrongly written with hyphens between the words (p. 357), Empress City for Empire City—New York (p. 193), and Pennysylvanian, Philadelphian, and similar forms wrongly used as adjectives, instead of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, &c.

A large number of names of American writers are given incorrectly, as follows:—Dred Scot for Dred Scott, R. C. White for Richard Grant White, Halliburton for Haliburton, Gustapon for Gustafson, Nora Percy for Nora Perry, H. B. Dana for Richard H. Dana, W. G. Curtis for George William Curtis, C. C. Leland for Charles G. Leland, Faucett for Fawcett, Phæbe Carey for Cary, Miss Whitney for Mrs. Whitney, Gale Hamilton for Gail Hamilton, Brookes for Preston S. Brooks, the assailant of Charles Sumner, and in Mr. James's Portrait of a Lady the hero is Ralph Touchett, not Roger Touchett. Professor Nichol speaks (p. 174) of Irving as at home "among the slopes of Sleepy Hollow, by which he built his New England home." This is also a mistake: Sunnyside, Irving's little home in the Sleepy Hollow region, was not in New England, but in the State of New York, near Tarrytown, on the Hudson. The date of Cooper's Pioneers was 1822, not 1823, as Professor Nichol gives it (p. 175). Longfellow's Kavanaugh is called (p. 178) "a perfect prose idyll [sic] of a schoolhouse in the West." The scene of Kavanaugh is laid in New England, as may be seen from the beginning of chapter xxi. The well-known song My Maryland is wrongly included among the "anonymous ballad literature of the war" (p. 239); it was written by James R. Randall. The date of the death of Theodore Winthrop was June 10th, 1861, not April 10th, as given by Professor Nichol (p. 371), and the name of the battle in which he fell was Big Bethel, not Great Bethel.

We cannot refrain from an allusion to the style of this book. What can the learned and brilliant author mean by allowing himself to write such sentences as "the, to him, face-haunted waters," or "this long anonymous and yet undeservedly-obscure romance," or "but, in both cases, a purely disinterested, was invoked by antagonism to a merely selfish, intolerance," or "a highly creditable, because frequently imaginative though sometimes rough, translation;" or, worst of all, "the most famous of whom had she never met it would have been well for both"? They sound more like extracts from Mark Twain's chapter on "The Awful German Language," than the deliberate writing of a Professor of English Literature, and the author of a Primer of English Composition.

In conclusion, we would suggest to Professor Nichol that the value of his book would be much increased by the addition of chronological tables of the writers of the different periods, and especially of a chronological table to the chapter on "American Politics and Oratory;" that a short bibliography of American literature would be very welcome in the appendix; and that since the book is a "sketch" only, and he disclaims all intention of making it a catalogue, he would do well to omit several long lists of names. In one place (pp. 185-6), he gives forty names on a page, and in the addendum, among novelists who "seem to have attained considerable celebrity," veteran authors like Edward Everett Hale and T. W. Higginson are classed with Robert Grant, whose only book, The Confessions of a Frivolous Girl, is the worthless scribble of a man just out of college; and among "American poetesses" to whom the author pays a sarcastic "tribute of imperfect knowledge, but implicit belief," Mrs. Lydia Maria Child is mentioned with half-a-dozen young ladies who have contributed occasionally to Harpers' or Scribner's magazine. This is mere cataloguing, and is unworthy of a place in such a work.

As we have criticised this volume at considerable length—a task which devolved upon us the more, since the three of our learned contemporaries which have already reviewed it have made no allusion to its inaccuracies, an omission which would hardly have occurred in the case of any literature except that of America—we recur with satisfaction to the author's prefatory statement that he will "be only grateful for corrections or suggestions, whether to omit or to add, that—friendly or otherwise—may proceed from any well-informed source." He will have seen already that we belong to the friendly class, and we congratulate him again upon the production of a timely, valuable, and very interesting work.

A COUNTRY CLERGYMAN OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.*

THIS is a slight book, and possibly too thin in matter to satisfy the curiosity of the general reader. It is not likely to be sought after with eagerness by the subscribers to Mudie's, or the Grosevenor; but the interest of the volume is, we think, amply sufficient to justify publication. The editor, Mr. Richard Twining, who dates from the well-known house in the Strand, states that his great-uncle is known to scholars by his translation of Aristotle's Poetics, and that the compilation which now appears in print for the first time was commenced in 1817 by his grandfather, the half-brother of Thomas Twining, and brought to a conclusion by the Rev. Daniel Twining, who died in 1853. "Shortly before his decease," the editor writes, "he made over the charge of all the letters and papers to myself. Thus it has fallen to my lot, in such intervals of leisure as a busy life has afforded, to complete a work for which others had made so much thoughtful preparation." The necessity for such laborious and prolonged preparation is not apparent. It may, however, have prevented errors, and if there are mistakes in the volume, we have been unable to detect them.

A few facts from the brief memoir written in the early years of this century may be worth stating, before striking into the heart of the volume. Thomas, eldest son of Daniel Twining, tea-dealer, of London, was born in 1735. He was placed in his father's business, but his love of literature and his aversion to trade were so strong, that after some private tuition he was sent to Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, where, it seems, he was elected a Fellow, upon taking his B.A. degree. At the age of twenty-nine he married, and, having taken Holy Orders, settled at Fordham, near Colchester, where he lived for nearly thirty years, spending most of his time in his study devoted to books and music. We are told also that,—“In the constant habits of his life, and in the performance of all the duties of a clergyman, particularly of the most important duties of the minister of a parish, he was exemplary;” but his correspondence contains no intimations of his clerical position. A letter of condolence to a nephew on his sister's death, the sole page in the volume in which the mystery of life and death is alluded to, might have been written word for word by a thoughtful heathen. It should be added, however, that Twining published three sermons. In the latter years of his life he left Fordham, for the living of St. Mary's, Colchester. When he died, in 1804, Dr. Parr, who considered him “one of the best men that ever lived,” placed a Latin epitaph to his memory on the walls of that church. Parr's admiration for him was extreme, and the feeling was mutual. Between Twining and Dr. Burney, also, there was a strong friendship, due, doubtless, to the similarity of their tastes. When Burney projected a history of music, Twining, who had in contemplation a work of a similar kind, promised him all the help in his power, and gave it without stint. The letters that passed between the two men are not confined to one subject, and will be found among the most entertaining in the volume.

In 1767 the piano was used for the first time in England, and seven years later Twining thanks his friend for sending him the instrument. “It is delightful,” he writes, “and I play upon it con amore, and with the pleasure I expected. If it has defects which a good harpsichord has not, it has beauties and delicacies which amply compensate, and which make the harp wonderfully flashy and insipid when played after it.” At times, when the ear asks only for harmony and a pleasant jingle, he turns to the harpsichord, but “as soon,” he adds, “as ever my spirit wakes, as soon as my heart-strings catch the gentlest vibration, I swivel me round incontinently to the pianoforte.” Books were as much his passion as music; like Southey, he received a parcel of them with almost boyish delight. “I have been reading like a dragon,” he writes, “I wish I could leave off this silly trick. I have sometimes a great mind to administer an oath to myself that I will read nothing for one whole year, by way of experiment. I wonder what would be the effect? Sometimes, I think I should find myself very much improved at the year's end; sometimes, I think I should hang myself par ennui.” Twining's talk about books is always interesting. He delights in Chaucer and the old ballads, and finds the Rowley poems full of genius, making up his mind that they are partly forged and partly not; and though he does not appear to give much credit to Chatterton, when writing seven years after the tragedy of his death, he confesses that he can scarce bear any poetry after taking up his. Of Swift, Twining's admiration was great. He will not admit that he was a misanthrope, or that his writings “have any one bad tendency.” He was simply a great humourist, and the world, from the lack of humour, has taken all he said of himself for truth. “What connection is there,” he continues in a letter to his brother, “between indignation at the vices of mankind and hatred of mankind? But, basta! pray, now, agree with me about all this. Your hand, your hand, I will have your hand! You do love Swift, now, don't you? Ay, ay, I knew it! And yet can you possibly love an ill-natured man? No. Ergo, Swift was not an ill-natured man.”

When Johnson's Lives of the Poets appeared, the “Country Clergyman” read them with eagerness, and criticised them frankly. His comments on the Great Cham of Letters show an independent judgment, and might have been written in the early years of this century, when a reaction against Johnson's judgments was one of the signs of a great poetical revolution. Twining's opinions contain a goodly portion of truth, but they are not the whole truth, for although Johnson had no ear for the divine music of Lycidas, or for the majesty and harmony of Milton's blank verse, although he sneered at some of the grandest sonnets in the language, abused Gray, and failed to appreciate the rare art of his friend Collins, he was not without the visida vis animi which goes towards the making of a poet, and wrote “after his kind” with a power surpassed only by Pope. Yet it is impossible not to sympathise with Twining when he writes that, in matters of poetry, he finds his palate continually at variance with Dr. Johnson's, and observes that what he esteems poetry is only good sense put into good metre. When Boswell's Life appeared, Twining was “prodigiously entertained and gratified.” “I have met with those,” he writes, “who call this book tiresome; I never read a book that was less so,”—a judgment with which every reader will agree who appreciates good literature. If Twining overestimates in some degree the charm of Fanny Burney's Cecilia, the mistake must be set down to his friendship for her father. Why the book should have made that age cry, as by all accounts it did, is a perplexity to ours. Mrs. Chapone, we know, lost her sleep for a week after reading it, and the Duchess of Portland and Mrs. Delany “thrice wept their way through the five volumes.” Thomas Twining has a similar story to tell:—

“I know,” he says, “two amiable sisters at Colchester, sensible and accomplished women, who were found blubbering at such a rate one morning! The tale had drawn them on till near the hour of an engagement to dinner, which they were actually obliged to put off, because there was not time to recover their red eyes and swelled noses. The person who caught them in this pathetic pickle was alarmed at their appearance, and thought of nothing less than of some domestic calamity. As to myself, Cecilia has done just what she pleased with me. I laughed and cried (for I am one of the blubbers) when she bade me.”

How strangely this reads! But probably half a century hence the pathos of some modern writers who can now do what they like with us will have lost its moving power. It is only genius of the highest order that is untouched by time, and outlives all the chances and changes of this mortal life.

To one feature of this volume we have not yet referred, and now we must content ourselves with alluding to it. Like Gray, whom he estimated at his full worth, Twining had a genuine love of scenery, and describes his home travel—we believe he never crossed the Channel—with the intelligence of a man of culture. Every one knows Lamb's delightful essay, “Grace before Meat,” in which he asks why “the received ritual has prescribed this form to the solitary ceremony of manducation.” “I own,” he says, “that I am disposed to say grace upon twenty other occasions in the course of the day beside my dinner. I want a form for setting out upon a pleasant walk, for a moonlight ramble, for a friendly meeting, or a solved problem. Why have we none for books, those spiritual repasts,—a grace before Milton, a grace before Shakespeare, a devotional exercise proper to be said before reading the Faery Queene?” The same idea had, it appears, occurred to Twining long years before. The sight of a fine view upon the banks of the Calder makes him exclaim:—“I never felt anything so fine. I shall remember it, and thank God for it, as long as I live. I am sorry I did not think to say grace after it. Are we to be grateful for nothing but beef and pudding?—to thank God for life, and not for happiness?” Curiously enough, another remark of Lamb's, in which he writes of the statue of Garrick in Westminster Abbey, is also in the same strain as one in Twining's letters, and in this case the similarity has been noted by the editor. Of course, there could be no plagiarism on Lamb's part in either instance, but these passages serve as examples of the way in which minds running in the same groove think the same thoughts.

We had marked several passages for quotation and comment, but the space already given to the volume will suffice to illustrate its character. The lover of literature may spend an hour or two delightfully over these pages, and will not be able to imagine that his time has been wasted.

THE SCIENCE OF FORESTS.*

AMONG the many lessons which are being taught us by Science, in this age of progress, none is, perhaps, of more consequence to mankind in general than the ameliorating effect of arboriculture on soil and climate, a fact now beginning to be generally acknowledged by learned men. In our desire for the increase of cereal crops, we have even in these kingdoms, but more especially in America and in the Colonies, swept away trees and forests with a ruthless hand, going far, in some instances, to cause the earth to return to that state of barrenness in which we find it in many treeless regions. For the want of foliage, increasing, as it does, both the heat and dryness of the air, not only lessens the amount of vapour which is necessary for the health of vegetation, but also has an effect not merely upon the climate of the country in which such a state of things exists, but, in the case of very large clearances, even indirectly upon our own. For these reasons, conjointly with other economic considerations, Dr. Brown, in his new edition of his valuable and exhaustive work on forestry, presses upon us most earnestly the necessity of thorough scientific and practical training in arboriculture for all those who have to take any part in the management of woods and forests, and he does not say too much, when he adds that it would be the duty of the English Government to establish a thoroughly-equipped School of Forestry, for the benefit not merely of this country, but of all our colonies and dependencies. It is indeed singular that such teaching should still have to be sought from private and often inadequate sources, and that owners of large properties should, in many cases, be willing to entrust such an important part of their demesnes as their forests to men who are as uneducated as they are unskilful, on the very false ground that the profit derived from their woods is insufficient to warrant the payment of high salaries. Dr. Brown shows very clearly that were the forester possessed of a thorough knowledge of woodcraft, a very considerable profit might in a reasonable time be made; and his arguments ought to have great weight with the owners of forests, who at present, however, would not find it easy to meet with persons really up to their requirements in this branch of science. A forester should, of course, be a good arithmetician, so as to be able to make elaborate calculations and keep proper accounts; he must have a knowledge of grammar, be able to write well, and understand the lower branches of mathematics, that he may take measurements and draw plans; and he ought also to be able to read French and German, since there is much instruction to be obtained from foreign works. Besides all this, he is bound to understand botany, entomology, chemistry, and vegetable physiology, at least to a certain extent. So much for theory. This, however, will avail little, without practical knowledge, which can only be attained by working under a skilled manager. Dr. Brown advises the formation of an Arboricultural Association, composed of leading landed proprietors, and the establishment of a college, say, for a hundred students, such an association being liberally assisted by Government, if, indeed, the whole business should not be undertaken by the State, which possesses so many facilities for carrying it out efficiently. For our own parts, we should advise the combination of instruction in arboriculture with that in horticulture, a national school for the latter science being also a great desideratum; and we do not see why this latter section, at all events, should not be open to women, who might perfectly well become landscape gardeners, and also occupy themselves with the production and culture of both fruit and flowers, departments at present monopolised by a class of specialists.

To return to Dr. Brown's book, however, after asking what is the cause of so much waste land being found in the north of Scotland and in many parts of England, and replying that it is the want of trees to give shelter, and after stating that it is a well-known fact both in Canada and the United States that the yield of the wheat-crop gradually diminishes as the forests are cleared away, and that the heaviest crops of this cereal are found on land sheltered by wood, he goes on to say, "If the population of a country doubles itself every fifty years, where is the supply to come from, in one hundred years hence, if the waste land be not improved by forestry? This is a question which demands serious consideration, and must, upon reflection, point out the influence of planting upon the general welfare of a country. If any piece of waste land, after being drained and ploughed, will yield twenty bushels per acre in a state unsheltered by forest trees, the same land will yield at least thirty-five bushels per acre if judiciously sheltered by them; and from this, we are bound to conclude that the inhabitants of a country have a right to expect that such a state of things should exist. And not only is the community at large benefited by an extended system of improvement, but every proprietor who will plant forest trees not only gives shelter to his fields, but, at the same time, greatly enhances the value of his estate."

As a proof of the drying effects of the absence of trees, the author tells us that he has repeatedly seen in North America the beds of former watercourses under cultivation, and only observable as such by the hollow lines running through the farms, and been told by the settlers that when they first came into the forest a never-failing supply of water ran down these courses, which gradually became dry as the woods were cleared, and that hundreds of families have been obliged to change their locations for want of water from a similar cause. "But," adds Dr. Brown, "we need not go out of Britain, for proofs of the drying effects of injudicious clearing of forests on the land. In our own experience in dealing with woodlands, we have seen, after a large tract of wood had been cleared from the hill-side, springs which had, while the land was covered with trees, yielded a constant supply of water, completely dried up, and there are many who can attest this from observation in respect to similar cases in their own parts of the country."

On the shortsightedness of depending upon foreign countries for our supply of timber, Dr. Brown also strongly insists, remarking with great truth that not only do vast forests everywhere diminish as civilisation extends, but also that, with the increase of that civilisation, the demand for timber increases too, and each country, as it becomes more refined, will have enough to do with its own supply. At present, the United States are depending upon Canada for their useful timber, but Canada consumes an enormous quantity of wood for fuel, and it is already believed, by those who are well acquainted with the subject, that this commodity will before long be not only very scarce there, but very dear. If it be true, as the author asserts—and it is but fair to say that he adduces many proofs of his statements—that, as a general rule, land which is unfit for high farming can, under good management, be made to pay the proprietor, at the end of seventy years, nearly three times the sum of money that he would have received from any other crop upon the same piece of ground, we surely ought to turn our attention to intelligent planting, more especially as we are by no means restricted to the use of the trees which either are or have been for ages indigenous with us, since there is no country so well adapted as ours for the introduction of foreign species; and, as Dr. Brown shows us in his admirable catalogue raisonné of the different kinds of trees, there are a great many exotics which we should do well to cultivate. Speaking on this subject, however, he is careful to remind us that only seeds taken from trees growing in an equally cold climate with our own can be expected to produce plants hardy enough to succeed satisfactorily with us, and that it is, therefore, of the highest importance to collect seeds only from trees growing on the high and cold regions of the mountains on which they are found. In acclimatisation—that is to say, in accustoming tender plants to grow in cold climates—Dr. Brown does not believe; and he therefore insists, not merely that the seed-gathering should take place, whenever possible, in a temperature like that in which the tree is expected to grow, but also that, in making new plantations, we should select the young trees very carefully with reference to the sites they are to occupy, not merely having regard to the kind of trees employed, but also to their age and their manner of growth in the nursery. If for a high situation, for example, they must have stood wide in the rows, since very close planting is equivalent to several additional degrees of heat. It is for this reason that injudicious thinning is so especially to be deprecated.

In Continental Europe, forestry is, as we all know, in a much more advanced state than with us, the various Governments taking the lead in efficient management; in Portugal in particular, a great deal is being done in this direction, and much attention is paid to the experimental planting of new coniferæ. We should do well to emulate so good an example. From the study of Dr. Brown's work alone, a man anxious to improve himself in forestry might learn much; and to the general reader also the work is of considerable interest, or at least that large portion of it which is descriptive of the different kinds of trees and their habitats, with the uses to be made of their timber. We find that there are no less than sixty distinct species of the oak, although but two of these are British, the others being chiefly natives of Europe and America; while out of the exceedingly numerous varieties of the pine tribe, the Scotch alone is indigenous to our country, but as this is precisely one of the most useful of the species, we have at least no reason to complain, nor have any of the new kinds of fir trees as yet apparently surpassed in value our old friend the larch,—indeed, although some of the new importations of coniferæ are of undoubted value, the greater portion of them have either not yet had time to prove their useful qualities, or should be cultivated merely for the ornamentation of our parks and gardens. Where the useful only is to be considered, the proprietor who intends planting extensively will do well to read with attention that section of Dr. Brown's work which treats of the kinds of trees which may most profitably be planted in a given part of the country, and in this section we find a most curious enumeration of the requirements of different classes of tradesmen and manufacturers, and discover that it is almost as essential to find out what is of value in the nearest market, as it is to know what kind of timber will flourish on a certain tract of land.

TWO CENTURIES OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH.*

WE have read this book with great care, and some interest. The subject forms a significant portion of the history of England, but the treatment it has received from Mr. Molesworth is far from satisfactory. He has ample materials at his disposal, he can accumulate facts, and in a dry sort of way understands how to relate them. On the other hand, he fails, we think, in passing from the sphere of the chronicler to that of the historian. We look here in vain for an intelligent and comprehensive view of a great subject. Nor is this all. A writer with an unattractive style often compensates his readers for this deficiency by scrupulous exactness, and by a clear perception of the difference between what is of mighty significance and what of trivial importance. Such a man may be solid, if not brilliant, but Mr. Molesworth's History is neither one nor the other. The narrative is monotonous, and occasionally it is inaccurate, and appears to have been written with carelessness and haste. Sometimes the author states the exact opposite of the meaning which he wishes to convey, as when he observes, upon page 135, that while under James II. the preachers of Protestantism had full license to attack, the preachers of Catholicism were strictly forbidden to defend; sometimes he fails to conclude a sentence, as may be seen on page 92; sometimes, too, we meet with passages which appear nearly, if not wholly, contradictory. In writing of Bishop Burnet, Mr. Molesworth says, upon one page, that in his writings he shows great unfairness to his opponents, "in whom he can seldom discern any merit whatever;" and on the next that, "in showing courtesy and hospitality to men of all classes and opinions, no English prelate has ever surpassed him." Courtesy to opponents in society may exist with unfairness in the study, but if this is what the writer meant, he should have stated it more plainly. Repetitions also are frequent, and of chronology the writer has a vague impression.

As an historian, Mr. Molesworth strives to be just, and this is surely a great merit. He looks at his subject with honest eyes, and if at times he lacks judgment, he is never wanting in justice. We differ from him at the outset. After agreeing with the late Henry Melvill that the post-Reformation Church was simply a continuation of the Church which had existed before the changes which were made, changes affecting, indeed, its character, but in nowise compromising its existence, the writer adds:—

"But the same cannot be said with regard to another period in the history of the Anglican communion. Then there was a distinct solution of continuity, which admits of no denial. At the period of the Great Rebellion, the State not only separated itself from the Episcopal Church, but violently suppressed it,—substituting for it a Presbyterian Church, forbidding, under severe penalties, the use of its Liturgy, and holding it up to the scorn and hatred of the people. It is not, then, either from Christ and his Apostles, nor yet from the period of the Reformation, that we must date the foundation of the present Established Church of England. If we would seek out its origin, we must come down to a much later period in the history of our country, reckoning from the time when the Stuart dynasty was restored in the person of Charles II., and the Legislature adopted that last great Act of Uniformity, by which she recalled into renewed existence the Church she had previously abolished."

It is quite beside our purpose to argue in favour of Apostolical succession, but we may observe that those who hold that dogma will not find it difficult to reply to this assertion. Let us grant, they may say, that the National Church was violently suppressed from 1642 to 1660, a period of eighteen years; that the hierarchy was dissolved, that 2,000 of the clergy were deprived of their livings, that it became illegal to use a form of prayer or to administer the Sacraments according to Anglican rites. The Church did not cease to exist because the clergy were treated with contempt, or because the rites they held so sacred had to be administered in secret. Bishops and priests did not lose the powers they had received, when restrained by force from exercising them. Is a meadow less a meadow because it is flooded by a violent tempest; and can it be said that a Church ceases to exist because it is thrust down for a time from its high and natural position? We think that Mr. Molesworth's statements will not only be objected to by High Churchmen, but that, in his view of the Church as an Establishment, he makes too much of the temporary success of the Presbyterians, and too much also of that most objectionable measure, the Act of Uniformity. The bigotry and narrowness of the men who forced the Westminster Confession upon Englishmen, and prohibited even the private use of the Book of Common Prayer, was as conspicuous as the bigotry of Laud. They were not more enlightened, they were not more humane, as a rule they were not more devout; and, to use Mr. Molesworth's words, "after having bitterly denounced the tyranny which they had suffered during the reign of Charles I., they had themselves imitated, and even surpassed, the intolerance of which they had so loudly complained." But toleration, unless by a few select souls, was not understood in those days, and even a wise and good man like Baxter confessed that he abhorred it. Presbyterianism was virtually dead in England before the Restoration. It did not suit the genius of Englishmen, and the severity of its discipline was felt to be intolerable. Charles II. and his advisers could never have acted as they did, had not the bulk of the nation been with them; not, indeed, in the licentiousness and political degradation which made the reign of the so-called "Merry Monarch" the worst in our annals, but in their determination to throw off by any means and every means the burden under which they groaned. So sternly had the people been driven in one direction, that they took the other with a bound at the first opportunity. The people, it was said at the time, were "doting on the old service." It may be questioned, indeed, whether the love of it had been ever lost in the country; and if, as Mr. Molesworth observes, the Prayer-book only a few years before had been cast aside with every expression of disgust and disdain, it was from the hands of the dominant party that it suffered this treatment. The case was widely different in Scotland, where Episcopacy and a form of public prayer were at all times obnoxious to the people. In England, devout persons rejoiced in being able once more to worship God after the manner of their fathers; but devotion, despite the influence of such saintly men as Bishop Ken and Jeremy Taylor, was not a strong feature of Restoration Churchmanship. Its power was chiefly felt in the political arena, and the persecution under the Protectorate, when Cromwell's Triers formed, as it has been well said, a spiritual court-martial, without a military code to guide them, was re-enacted in another form.

Mr. Molesworth takes what may be called the popular view of the characters of the Second Charles and his brother, and, indeed, there is no other view to take. Charles II. was cruel and unprincipled, because he was a sensualist and loved his ease; James II. was cruel, partly because he had a hard, unforgiving nature, and partly from the sincerity of his convictions. Both of them were bad kings and bad men, but James possessed at least the virtues of sincerity and courage. Truly does the writer say that he was honest, brave, and sincere, and that "the tenacity with which he clung to his religious opinions, not only throughout his short reign, but also after its unfortunate termination, shows that he possessed these qualities in a degree that was very unusual in his day." Both the brothers were as absolute as they could be, and neither of them had the faintest respect for conscientious scruples. William III., on the other hand, did not trouble his head about them. He had not the faintest interest in the ecclesiastical questions that agitated his reign, but handed them over to his wife; yet this indifference, which amounted to contempt, did not give emancipation, or even a limited toleration, to the Roman Catholics, for in the early part of the reign of William and Mary, as the historian reminds us, a Bill was passed "that contained clauses condemning a Roman Catholic priest to fine and imprisonment for life if he said Mass, and that disqualified a Papist from becoming the proprietor of land, either by inheritance or purchase." And similar disqualifications oppressed the Roman Catholics in the reign of Anne. Some of them, although contemptible, were none the less annoying, as, for example, the law that no Papist might purchase a horse above the value of five pounds. "Even the most ardent advocates of civil and religious liberty," says Mr. Molesworth, "the moment that the Catholic Church was in question seemed to cast away their principles, and to become the advocates of the most abominable tyranny and the most flagrant injustice." This is historically true, but the surprise it naturally excites will be lessened when we remember how deeply and comparatively how recently this country had suffered from the tyranny of Rome. No one can excuse the mad doings of a bigot like Lord George Gordon, but it is not difficult to account for them.

Mr. Molesworth exposes the defects of the Church of England, in the days when formalism and respectability, rather than zeal and piety, marked its rulers; but at its lowest stage, there were always men distinguished by learning and devotion. Bishops of lasting reputation, like Beveridge, Taylor, Sancroft, and Ken, lived in the reigns of Charles II. and his brother; Burnet, Tillotson, and Tenison did their duty honestly in the reign of William and Mary; and in the reigns of the Georges there are names which, like that of Butler and Wesley, must ever stand in the front rank for learning and piety. Mr. Molesworth's History, by the way, begins with the Restoration. Such a history demands a notice, however brief, of the great men, whether belonging to the clergy or laity, whose earnestness and wisdom have done more than any mere ecclesiastical arrangements to elevate the character of the Church of England. The true history of a Church is the history of its members, a fact of which, judging from a passage in the preface, the author seems to be aware. Yet this important branch of his subject is, for the most part, neglected. Sancroft, Tillotson, and Ken obtain, perhaps, sufficient recognition; Sheldon and Baxter, also, are not neglected; but Jeremy Taylor is not mentioned, or is barely mentioned; and in a curious sentence, which implies that the influence of the following laymen was "at work about the same time," he is content to link together, without any discriminative comment, the names of Nelson, Addison, Dr. Johnson, Burke, Coleridge, Southey, Wordsworth, and Wilberforce.

The last chapter of the volume relates the history of the Oxford Tracts, of the Gorham case, of the Papal aggression, of the Church Union and the Church Association. Men, as well as measures, appear in this chapter, in which Maurice and Kingsley are granted a page and a half between them, while more than two pages are devoted to Mr. Voysey. We may note, in conclusion, that Mr. Molesworth states he was unacquainted with Messrs. Abbey and Overton's well-known work, published, we believe, in 1878, The English Church in the Eighteenth Century, until a great part of his book was already in type. "I will, therefore," he adds, "content myself with remarking that their work is of a different character from mine, and intended for a different class of readers."

MR. PICTON'S LIFE OF OLIVER CROMWELL.*

THAT the reading public takes interest in the history of England during the seventeenth century seems to be proved by the large number of books written upon the subject. Nor is this surprising, for the seventeenth century is, for practical purposes, our transition time between past and present, the period when, in din of battle and clamour of controversy, our affairs were getting placed on their modern footing, and the terms of that partnership between England and Scotland, that arrangement between Church and State, that compromise between Crown and Parliament, which have since been, in the main, preserved, were being settled. And yet we are convinced that ignorance of our history during the seventeenth century is widely prevalent and very dense. The literature of the time, except here and there a book, has become obsolete. Its watchwords, its party cries, its nicknames, its dominant ideas, have passed away. Not long ago, Mr. Harrison, a man of information and intelligence far above the average, called Milton, in one of his pieces of fervently eloquent declamation, the "great malignant." The words might thrill Milton's bones with horror, after their rest of two hundred years. To apply the term "malignant" to Milton is what it would be to call Gambetta "the bold Imperialist." The word expressed, more perhaps than any other, that combination of fury and hatred with which the Puritan and Parliament party regarded the party of prerogative and of prelacy.

This train of reflection has been strongly pressed upon us in looking over Mr. Allanson Picton's volume upon Cromwell. It is in many respects meritorious. Mr. Picton is an able, careful, studiously candid writer. No man could approach the subject with more sincere purpose to speak the truth. He has read a good deal in the authorities, has mastered Cromwell's letters, and does not, we think, fall into serious mistakes on matters of detail. True, we have not hunted for such, but if there were many they would have come in our way; and we recollect nothing more important than the statement that Carlyle does not give a letter of Cromwell's containing a notable allusion to Naseby, which letter Mr. Picton will find in Appendix No. 9 of Carlyle's book, third edition.

His account of Cromwell's early life is remarkably clear and ample,—perhaps a little, but certainly not much, too ingeniously imaginative in fitting the circumstances of Cromwell's boyhood to his future career. In the general estimate of Cromwell, we find a great deal to admire and accept. Mr. Picton has the right notion of Cromwell as a mass of rugged energy and lightning-like genius, thoroughly imbued and inspired with what Hume called enthusiasm, what German discourses on the philosophy of history would call the religious idea, and what he himself called faith in God. Need we say more to evince our belief that this volume is a valuable contribution to the literature of the subject?

Nevertheless, Mr. Picton's book illustrates the extreme difficulty of attaining to a really deep and intelligent apprehension of the motives and objects, the good qualities and the shortcomings, the opinions and the sentiments, the party distinctions and real causes of misunderstanding, among our ancestors of the seventeenth century. He often strikes us as writing like an outsider,—an outsider who, standing on the wall of a city, can discern the costume and movements, and even to some extent the features, of those who people its streets, but has no inner vision of their hearts and souls. His temper is that of a philosophico-religious critic of great mental serenity; and he has to judge of men who were in the throes of intense excitement. He does not give us the atmosphere of the time, with its terrible vibrations. It is in this respect that, despite grave drawbacks, Carlyle has value,—nay, even transcendent value, as an historian. He has not only the Homeric breadth and vividness of narrative, but that intense Homeric sympathy which, as we read the Iliad, makes us feel that the poet lives in his own Achilles. Carlyle is, indeed, the Homer of revolutions, and chiefly of the Puritan revolution. He entered into the stern enthusiasm of the men who rose against Charles, with the impassioned sympathy of a Puritan or a Covenanter born out of due time. Even Carlyle, however, did to some slight extent, though less beyond all comparison than previous writers, translate the language of the seventeenth century into that of the nineteenth; and it may be reasonably doubted whether Cromwell would have endorsed at all points the exposition and vindication of his character and purposes tendered by his most celebrated worshipper.

But Mr. Picton is much less capable of feeling as Puritans and Covenanters felt than the son of the grim Presbyterian peasant of Ecclefechan. He makes us aware, at a critical and crucial stage in his narrative, that such a thing as popular theological enthusiasm—such a thing as a nation caring intensely about questions of doctrine and Church government—has not been imaginatively apprehended by him. But here we come upon the differentia of the Puritan period. Mr. Picton has not realised the truly singular, yet strictly historical phenomenon of an England and a Scotland in which, for the great body of the people, from squires, well-to-do farmers, and merchants, down to ploughmen and apprentices, the points in dispute between Papist and Protestant, between Arminian and Calvinist, between Episcopalian, Presbyterian, and Independent, were matters of an interest as intense and consuming as that which Jacobins of 1794 took in their Republic, or that which Reformers of 1831 took in their Bill. He says that the grievance of "the English people" against Charles, Laud, and Strafford "had been mainly that of illegal impositions, and only secondarily that of religious persecution." This we hold to be the most comprehensively fatal error into which it is possible for any man to fall in treating of the history of Great Britain in the seventeenth century. Without forgetting for one moment that the popular party was resolutely bent upon placing the political liberties of the country on an impregnable basis, and making Parliament not the mere instrument and appanage of the Sovereign, but authoritative, in the last resort, over the Sovereign himself, we, nevertheless, are absolutely certain that the main impelling fervour of the Revolution was religion.

How any one can read Milton's pamphlets, and in particular that apostrophe to England sitting like a mother bereaved of her children, who had been driven into the wilderness of the West, and yet think that it was for exemption from taxes, and not for freedom to worship God according to conscience, that the Puritans drew the sword, we are unable to comprehend. When we speak, however, of the Puritan demand for liberty to worship God according to conscience, we must beware of the almost equally fatal error of supposing that they fought for what we moderns understand by toleration. That was not, in England at least, the contention of the time. Toleration was on the way; the century was not to close before, with the aid of Dutch William, our perverse ancestors found themselves grudgingly and grumblingly compelled to adopt it; but the generation of the Civil Wars had, for their special work in connection with toleration, to demonstrate, amid bloodshed and heartburning, that civilisation had become impossible without it, that its evolution was a necessity of progressive national life. If we would understand the Puritan Revolution, we must realise that no one in the time of the Long Parliament was tolerant. Some men were vastly more tolerant than others. Milton and Cromwell distanced the great body of their contemporaries in this matter. But Cromwell fiercely refused to tolerate the Mass even in Ireland, and Milton expressly held that Roman Catholics could not be tolerated. Indeed, the English of that age, even the foremost of them, were hardly on a level with men of light and leading on the Continent. Richelieu's scheme of toleration embraced Protestants as well as Roman Catholics, and Cromwell, while claiming privileges for members of the Reformed Church in France, avowed himself unable to meet Mazarin half-way by granting at home what he asked for abroad.

What rendered the problem of arrangement and pacification amid the contending parties impossible in England, except by the transmutation of Cromwell's sword into a sceptre, was that each party made conscience of finality for its own principle. Had the Episcopalians been able to tolerate the Presbyterians, or the Presbyterians to tolerate the Independents, the sword might never have been drawn, or would have been soon restored to its sheath. Mr. Picton frankly admits that, when the Independents had their own chance, in America, they were as intolerant as the others. This fact will present to us no difficulty, and cause us little offence, if we apprehend that each party believed itself to possess the very truth of God, and conceived that all other doctrines were more or less hateful and insulting to Him. It was not to escape a dreaded spiritual despotism, it was to procure liberty to adopt their own model of doctrine and discipline, that the Independents came to a quarrel with the Presbyterians. Mr. Picton concedes, with his usual candour, that the inquisitorial despotism of Presbyterianism, of which he speaks, has never been exemplified. But he might have added that the Presbyterian Churches have everywhere been conspicuously self-contented; that in Scotland (where the Presbyterian system, whatever he may suppose to the contrary, was in operation in absolute perfection during the ascendancy of the Covenanters), all Dissent has originated in the wish of the people to be more Presbyterian than the State Church; and that neither in Scotland nor in America has Presbyterianism been other than a curse of political freedom. Accustomed to the Congregational discipline, under which the Church satisfies itself that every member is in a state of grace, Mr. Picton omits the enormously important consideration, as bearing on the question of inquisitorial despotism, that the Presbyterian Churches have always made membership depend not upon proof afforded of personal grace, but upon such reasonable presumption thereof as is afforded by a satisfactory acquaintance with Biblical doctrine and an externally unblemished walk. Let it not be fancied that we are pleading the cause of Presbyterianism, or maintaining that the Presbyterians of the Long Parliament were, on the whole, justified in coming to a breach with the Army and with Cromwell. What we say is, that Mr. Picton, in expatiating on the general principle of toleration, misses the mark in respect of the particular grievance complained of by the Independents. The hardship was that they, who had been the forlorn hope in the struggle, should be stigmatised as "Sectaries," and not permitted to practise their own worship. How, the modern reader asks, could the Parliament, led by the Presbyterians, make so monstrous a proposal? The answer is that, on parchment, their case was very strong. In the Grand Remonstrance, the manifesto of the popular party on the eve of the conflict with the King, it is expressly and pointedly declared that no liberty is claimed for the separate Congregational model. In the League or Covenant drawn up between the Parliament and the Scots, when the Army of the latter entered England, before the great battle of Marston Moor, the clause relating to the ecclesiastical arrangement to be adopted in England was, probably through the adroitness of Vane, left ambiguous, but the Presbyterians could reasonably argue that its meaning had been determined by the specifications of the Grand Remonstrance. In one word, the Presbyterians had a lawyer's case; Cromwell and the Army planted their feet on natural justice. No previous understandings, no parchment provisions, said Cromwell and his men, could justify the Parliament in decreeing that the soldiers of Naseby and Preston, if they wished to serve God in the manner of the so-called Sectaries, must follow their brethren to the wilds of America.

We have said that, in matters of detail, Mr. Picton is generally right, but we cannot add that he has presented a quite accurate view of the great forces and influences that played a part in the Revolutionary commotions of England in the seventeenth century. Can it be believed that the name of Charles's Queen does not occur in Mr. Picton's index? He seems wholly oblivious to the part she played in the troubles. Yet we have it under the King's hand that it was to save her that he took steps at the most critical moments, and nothing can be surer than that, had she been away, all would have been different.

MR. GRENVILLE-MURRAY'S ACQUAINTANCES.*

No doubt, as the preface tells us, the author of this book, "during a long and chequered experience of life had opportunities of seeing a great deal," and of gleaning "an ample store of material" for "contemporaneous portraiture." Nevertheless, the "People I have met" are by no means true types of English society as it is, or, indeed, for the matter of that, as it ever was, though, doubtless, thirty or forty years ago some of the traits described might have been more frequently observed than at the present day.

About the time when the lively author of that brilliant and incisive satire, The Loving Englishman, a book that did much good in its day, may have been contemplating his first essays in literature, the legends embodied in Thackeray's wicked Marquis, in Warren's smooth-mannered physician full of grim experiences, and in the stock lawyer of the popular novelist laden with dreadful mysteries, were accepted almost as social facts. But the world knows itself better in the last than in the second or third quarter of the nineteenth century. It has ceased to put faith in the special wickedness of "old Earls," or the mysterious puissance of "family solicitors," and most of these sketches will owe whatever popularity they may attain simply to their amusingness, as clever presentments of recently extinct myths. Not that all of them are of this character. The "family solicitors" of real life do not, like Mr. Vellumson, live on the basement floors of their offices; but dwell in big houses, built in sunny suburban aspects, surrounded by large, well-kept gardens, containing, perhaps, an acre of "glass." Nor do they resort to a species of "chantage" to force even Dukes to do justice, still less do they pocket the interest on trust funds confided to their care, in addition to any usual per-centage, which is, we should imagine, where charged at all, much below five per cent. But the "usurer" is still among us, and Mr. Benoni Crabbe, with face "clean-shaven, save for about an inch of cropped whisker just before his ears," awakened eyes like those of a "pig in the wind," fox-like face, and massive jaw, is much too easily found by those whom their vices, follies, or misfortunes compel to seek his pernicious services. The money-lender is, indeed, a permanent type of society, and has presented pretty much the same characteristics in all ages,—no rogue, but what, perhaps, is a more dangerous personage, a callously merciless, honest man. His life of concentrated selfishness is, however, commonly a joyless one. Mr. Benoni Crabbe had but a single pleasure, the trivial amusement of breeding canaries. The portrait of the "College Don" is a most pleasing one, and, despite current notions to the contrary, is not too flattering a sketch of the modern University dignitary. The glimpse given of the late Regius Professor of Hebrew bears witness to the grateful veneration in which he is held by all who came within the sphere of his influence. Of Mr. Wyse, the "Bachelor," the traits are drawn with vigour and a good deal of fidelity to a type commoner in England perhaps than in any other country, and of which not a few examples may be seen disconsolately shuffling from one club-room to another, or yawning over the damp second edition of the Times, yet always with a certain air of self-complacency and self-containedness. One would be glad to meet governesses as charming and high-souled as Miss Beauchamp, the daughter of the clever Civil-Service clerk, who had never dared to give up a certainty for an uncertainty, and at sixty was a "nervous, dejected, old person," with six grown-up daughters, all unmarried, and five hundred a year," tortured, to boot, by a constant dread of superannuation. There are, perhaps, many Miss Beauchamps, but few of them have the luck to find themselves residuary legatees of a rejected suitor, and we are afraid it is rather an optimistic view that self-sacrifice and steady good-conduct seldom go unrewarded. "Le Nouveau Riche" is, perhaps, the cheeriest of these portraits. But our author, going beyond Juvenal, not only scorns pedigrees and long descent, but falls down in an ecstasy before new-made wealth. "Pick out half-a-dozen or a score of them [nouveaux riches] in any country of the world," he exclaims, "and see how advantageously they will bear comparison with the titular nobles, both in mental and physical development." Still, among the merits of the richest Englishman of his generation was the fact that "he looked, spoke, and acted like a Conservative Duke."

* People I Have Met. By E. C. Grenville-Murray. Illustrated from Designs by Fred. Barnard. London: Vizetelly and Co. 1883.

The key-note of Mr. Grenville-Murray's writings is a detestation of the aristocratic and official classes, to both of which he belonged. "I would rather," he makes his typical lawyer say, "I would rather that a son of mine broke stones upon the road than that he entered the public service. Neither his fortune nor his character is ever safe there, for he may be condemned to utter ruin without a trial." No less a personage than the Master of Muriel, giving advice to a friend, exclaims, "Now, and at all times in England, it is, and has been, a very wise thing to be on prudent terms with persons of quality. Rank has many methods of exalting itself at other men's expense, in these islands, and very small scruple in using them." But the satire is too bitter to be amusing, and too infected with a tone of personal resentment to make much impression on the reader, who feels that he is not listening to an impartial judge.

Mr. Grenville-Murray was a genre painter, preferring striking effects and dramatic contrasts, to those subtle touches and subdued methods which suggest rather than blurt out the story. After The Roving Englishman, we like, on the whole, French Pictures in English Chalks and The Member for Paris more than any of his other writings. He was, indeed, of a French rather than an English turn of mind, a beau raconteur, fluent, keen, and fertile, but superficial. He possessed to the full the French quality of never being dull; his pages sparkle with cleverness and with a shrewd wit, caustic or cynical at times, but by no means excluding a due appreciation of the softer virtues of women and the sterner excellences of men. We cannot say that the present volume will prove much of an aid to what Pope calls the proper study of mankind, but those who look to it for amusement, and not for instruction, will not be disappointed. It is only right to add that these sketches are free from slang, and are, indeed, throughout written in a clear, lively, unaffected style.

We have left ourselves no space to give Mr. Barnard's illustrations the notice they deserve. Among the best of them are the portraits of the "Usurer," in which the keenness, and cold, joyless nature of the character are well brought out; the scene where the "Butler" is discovered drunk by his sly rival—a subject quite after Mr. Barnard's heart—the "Bachelor," whose easy, self-complacent air is admirably rendered; and the pretty "Favourite Daughter," whose sweet face makes the reader sigh the deeper over her silliness. The talent of the artist is, indeed, akin to that of the author, and the result of the combination is a book that once taken up can hardly be laid down until the last page is perused.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Alirabi; or, the Banks and Bankers of the Nile. By a Hadji of Hyde Park. (Blackwood.)—If this volume could be looked at simply as a story, it would probably be found entertaining enough by the ordinary reader. The adventures of Mrs. Chrysanthema Warwick, the lively and fascinating widow of a banker, with, or on account of, Alirabi, an officer in the Egyptian Army, who becomes her mad worshipper, are told with much liveliness, although we think the incident of her running away with a baby crocodile is rather forced and farcical. Besides, we are not quite sure that Chrysanthema does justice to Alirabi. She gives him up, because he is accused of the murder of his senior officer, which is one of the most melodramatic episodes of the story. But his guilt is certainly "not proven." The writer shows undoubted knowledge of Cairo, and of Bedouin and Coptic characteristics; and there are in his pages some lurid revelations of domestic Egyptian life, and of the oppressed condition of the wretched Fellaheen. Yet the reader of Alirabi is uneasily conscious all the time he is perusing it that he is being boozed by the author, that the book is a squib on the late military rebellion in Egypt—as such, indeed, it looks as if it had been rather hurriedly prepared—and that he cannot find the key to it. There are passages in Alirabi of the kind popularly known as "graphic," which recall the style of more than one veteran author of the day. It may, indeed, be the first vigorous effort of a new writer, or a piece of somewhat "scamp work" by an "old hand" who delights in mystifications.

Mollie Darling. By Lady Constance Howard. 3 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—The author of this novel, doubtless, means well. Her sympathies are with right and goodness, such as she conceives them to be, but she has not a very judicious way of showing them. She thinks, for instance, that Circe Dysart is a bold, bad woman, and much disapproves of her liaison with Mollie's husband; but to describe the love-scenes between them, is not exactly the best way of pointing her moral. Indeed, even her good people are dangerously given to the practice of kissing. Geoffrey Adair, who is supposed to be a paragon, kisses a certain Vivienne, a married woman, after having told her plainly more than once that he loves her. It is something worse than bad-taste to talk of this kiss as being "such as we give to our beloved dead." Lord Mark, another paragon of virtue, kisses the heroine, in a scene which, to our mind at least, seems a little too warmly coloured. We cannot help wondering who are the readers for whom Lady Constance writes. Do the ladies of the class to whom she belongs really like what would certainly make less highly placed women blush? As for the form in which this very doubtful matter is presented to us, it is, to say the least, remarkable. Here is a sentence which describes the way a would-be profligate feels for Circe's lover:—"Happily, his conduct will not be so iniquitous as that of the man he is now envying with all that organ called his heart, as, being only a few years removed from a babe in the nursery, and under age, he has not yet caused one more unhappy woman to wish it had pleased Providence not to create her, by the misery of becoming his neglected wife."

The Greater Poems of Virgil. Edited by J. B. Greenough. Vol. I. (Ginn, Heath, and Co., Boston, U.S.)—This first volume contains the Bucolics and Books I. to VI. of the Æneid, a curious departure from custom, and, we may add, from correctness, hardly justified by considerations of convenience. One valuable feature of the edition is the copious illustration from ancient wall-paintings, vases, coins, and the like. This valuable, we might almost say indispensable, addition is made in a simple and inexpensive fashion, and is highly to be commended. There is nothing specially noteworthy about the annotation, which, though generally useful, and especially praiseworthy for its brevity and compression, is not free from fault. In Ecl. ix., 48, "quo segetes gauderent frugibus," the note, "gauderent, subj. of purpose," is inadequate. The tense requires explanation, as it is difficult to take processit, in the preceding line, otherwise than as a perfect. In Æneid vi., 11, the unusual rhythm of "mentem animumque" should have been noticed. In l. 23, "Stat ductis sortibus urna" should have more than the remark, "ductis sortibus, abl. absol." Ductis looks very like an unusual present participle passive, as the artist must be supposed to have chosen for the subject of his representation the agony of suspense while the lots were being drawn. In l. 620, the anomaly of Phlegyas' call to repentance addressed to those who were hopelessly doomed deserves some notice. The ingenious transposition that has been suggested in the passage beginning "Quisque suos patimur Manes" should have been mentioned. We may not choose to adopt it, but it solves a difficulty. In l. 818, "fascas receptos" is not adequately explained by "wrested by Brutus from the kings, and restored to the aristocracy." The aristocracy never had possessed the power. The note on "paribus quas fulgere cernis in armis"—"since their power was about equal"—is surely very frigid. It is better taken as proleptically descriptive of civil strife, where both combatants are similarly accoutred. The volume contains a vocabulary covering the whole of Virgil.

American Humourists. By the Rev. H. R. Haweis, M.A. (Chatto and Windus.)—Mr. Haweis's book is disappointing. In the first place, the style is unpleasing, even provoking. The writer arranges what he has to say in little snippets of paragraphs. Such paragraphs are tolerable only at very rare intervals, when there is something very weighty to be said. Mr. Haweis uses them for the most trivial and common-place statements. Then the matter itself is, for the most part, poor; there is nothing striking in the criticism, and the extracts do not show much judgment in selection. The first lecture, "Washington Irving," gives a most imperfect account of its subject; the lighter humour of "Knickerbocker's History," for instance, is wholly unrepresented. The second and third, dealing with O. W. Holmes and J. R. Lowell, are no better. The greater part of them has nothing to do with the humorous characteristics of these writers. If a writer gives us extracts from "The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table," how can he omit that most side-splitting account of the island of Sumatra? But Mr. Haweis has far too much to say for himself, and far too little for his authors. A lecturer, like a biographer, should be willing to efface himself. Mr. Haweis we should judge to be anything but willing. In the lecture on "Artemus Ward," his personal experiences come in very opportunely. It was a happy chance that brought so thoroughly an appreciative listener to Mr. Charles Browne's lecture. He describes it admirably, in a way that brings back the reality to any one who was present, as the present writer can testify, in the most vivid way. The two remaining lectures, "Mark Twain" and "Bret Harte" are better than the three which stand first in the volume, in proportion as their subjects are easier to deal with.

The Blackest of Lies, by Albany de Fonblanque (Remington), is a very unpleasant story about very unpleasant people, such as a hysterical clergyman and a Jesuit Father who is given to thieving and poisoning, and a lady who drinks to excess and elopes with a boy. Even the heroine finds herself in such unfortunate circumstances and in such peculiar company, that the telling of "black" lies to her discredit is no matter for surprise. Yet the story is told with some vigour, and one character, that of an American Judge, who knows his mind and can express it, is so well drawn that we are sure Mr. de Fonblanque could do much better than he has done in these three volumes, if he tried.

Nature Studies. By Grant Allen, Andrew Wilson, Thomas Foster, Edward Clodd, and Richard A. Proctor. (Wyman and Son.)—This is another pleasant volume added to the "Knowledge" library. Out of the twenty-four essays which it contains there is not one which may not be read with pleasure, even though the reader have but the very slightest tinge, or even no tinge at all, of science. The first is a memorial of Charles Darwin, brief, but giving an effective view of his services to science; and the second is a very eloquent and able comparison of the same great philosopher with Newton. Of the others, we may single out for notice "Intelligence in Animals," with the general conclusion of which, that animals do exercise reason, most readers of the Spectator will probably agree; "Strange Sea-monsters," which takes up a very reasonable position about the "sea-serpent"; a very instructive paper by Mr. Grant Allen about "Our Ancestors"; "Found Links," by Dr. Andrew Wilson; and "Brain Troubles," a subject of engrossing interest, we need hardly say, to all who write, and not a few of those who read. It is comforting to be told that the loss of memory, which is one of the most amazing as well as alarming symptoms of advancing years, often indicates a temporary rather than a permanent weakening of the brain-power. In "A Wonderful Discovery," Mr. Proctor exposes the hoax which doubtless took in some readers of the newspapers, that means had been found in Australia of freeing animals into insensibility, and restoring them to life when they were wanted. He might have added to his paper a very apposite illustration, in M. Edmond About's famous tale, "L'Homme à l'Oreille Cassée," in which a French colonel of the First Empire, frozen in the year 1813, wakes up to life some fifty years afterwards, much to the discomfort of the new generation. We cannot agree with Mr. Clodd in ranking "ghosts" with "the predictions in Zadkiel's 'Vox Stellarum.'" In another paper, Mr. Proctor quotes from Dr. Carpenter words which are apposite to this matter,—"Every one who admits that 'there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophy' will be wise in maintaining a 'reserve of possibility' as to phenomena which are not altogether opposed to the laws of physics or physiology," but rather transcend them." That men exist after death is certainly probable; that they may appear to the living is not "opposed to any law of physics or physiology."

Eve Lester. By Alice Mangold Diehl. (Bentley.)—The girl who gives her name to this novel shows force in her vigorous efforts to overcome the obstacles that a bad education has placed between her and a life of true womanhood, and her portrait has been carefully finished. It is difficult, however, to have patience with her half-mad father and his wretched Brotherhood of Freedom, or her lover, Ross Grant—or Grant Ross—with his morbid imaginings, his habit of lecturing, and his strange hospital or menagerie. If Miss Diehl would wait a little before she writes again, forget all about the course of loose, pseudo-philosophical reading she has evidently gone through, and pay strict attention to English grammar, she might produce a fair story.

The Mississippi, by Francis Vinton Greene (Trübner), is the eighth of a series of volumes descriptive of the campaigns of the American Civil War. So far as maps, statistics, and actual narration of military movements are concerned, it may be found useful. But the style is exceedingly dull, and the author shows too clearly on which side his sympathies lie.

Melodramatic vigour, strong situations, and ejaculations in very dubious French and German, are the leading features of On Dangerous Ground, by Edith Stewart Drewry. (F. V. White.)—Lady Glen-Luna, the would-be murderess and social panther of the story, shows some originality in her designs against her invalid step-son, for instance, in causing an accident to the lift in which he is taken from one part of his house to another, and in throwing at his head, in the capacity of private secretary, a fascinating woman who is separated from her husband. But no other merit can be assigned to a very crude literary performance.

Weighed and Wanting. By George Macdonald, LL.D. (S. Low.)—This is probably the poorest and least pleasant story Dr. Macdonald has ever published. The Raymonds are a disagreeable family; there is not a truly manly or womanly character in the whole book; and there are some disagreeable incidents, such as the horsewhipping administered by a father not only to his son, but to that wretched weakling's wife. Dr. Macdonald must not allow the pious children he is so fond of to indulge in something very like blasphemy. Little Mark Raymond, who figures in Weighed and Wanting as the spokesman of the author's favourites, is simply repulsive, when he comes on the stage with his "Dear God" and "Good-bye, God," and "How happy Jesus must have been when he went back to his papa," and "You know if God were to go to sleep, and forget his little Mark, then he would forget that he was God, and would not wake again." Dr. Macdonald should go through a course of the Calvinism of his native country, or of Carlylian "mysticism." Neither of these is irreverent, or teaches ought but reverence, in the presence of the Eternities and the Immensities.

William I., German Emperor, and King of Prussia. By W. Beatty-Kington. (Routledge.)—Mr. Kington was special correspondent to the Daily Telegraph during the Franco-German war, and its representative at Berlin during the seven following years. Of these opportunities he has made use to write this agreeable little memoir of the Emperor. We cannot, of course, look to it for a thorough and searching analysis of his character as a ruler. For this, the time has not yet come. But the book does what it professes to do satisfactorily. The vindication of William I.'s conduct during the troubles of 1848 is noteworthy. The Crown Prince, as he then was, had no authority whatever in the capital, and steadily refused to give any orders. It is probable that his sympathies were not with the popular party, and that the inhabitants of Berlin perceived this, and hated him for it; but it is tolerably clear that he did nothing to deserve the odium which necessitated his temporary exile.

Sweet Inisfail. By Richard Dowling. (Tinsley Brothers.)—This is not one of Mr. Dowling's best stories; indeed, it has every appearance of having been written in a hurry. Otherwise, nearly one-half of a volume would not have been devoted to a conflict in a bedroom between an Irish carman and Frederick Manton, murderer in intention, and chief villain and nuisance of the story. The heroine is a mere phantom; we obtain no information about "sweet Inisfail," and have but little that smacks of Ireland, except the humour of the carman Doherty, and the egotism of a constable ambitious of promotion. Yet there are scenes and situations in Sweet Inisfail marked by that peculiar descriptive power which Mr. Dowling has at his command, and it would have been in every way enjoyable had it been compressed within the limits of one volume.

The Married Women's Property Act (1882): What it Does, and What it Does Not Do. (Ward and Lock.)—Here we have a review of the state of the law relating to the status of married women as it was up to January 1st, 1883, and the changes wrought in it by the legislation of last Session. We may hope that most households will go quietly on without any appeal to this new legislation; but it is well to know what it has really done, nor could this be better learnt than from this little handbook.

For King and Kent, by Colonel Colomb (Remington), is far too long and discursive; and the plot is very loosely constructed. The story of the rising of the men of Kent on behalf of Charles I. is sufficiently healthy, and even enjoyable, if the reader accepts or adopts the Cavalier stand-point. Colonel Colomb has, further, shown considerable skill in giving his characters the proper historical costumes, and in placing the proper historical language in their mouths. If he had said all he had to say in one volume, we should have had only favourable criticism for it and him.

A Royal Warren; or, Picturesque Rambles in the Isle of Purbeck. By C. E. Robinson, M.A. (Typographic Etching Company.)—We have more to say in praise of the illustrations than of the letterpress in this volume. Mr. Robinson is sometimes jocular, after Dickens's least effective manner; sometimes pathetic and picturesque, with but indifferent success, and not unfrequently very vague in his constructions. But he writes with enthusiasm, and he knows the country which he describes very well. A book written under these conditions is sure to have some value, and we may be content to put up with its defects. The etchings are distinctly good, elegant, perhaps, rather than powerful, but certainly pleasing and effective.

My Beautiful Daughter, by Percy B. St. John (J. and R. Maxwell), is full of overflowing of old-fashioned love-affairs and villainies, and is written in crisp paragraphs, on an average not more than two or three lines in length. Mr. St. John's villains are all arrangements in the blackest of black, and he hurries over his ground like the "Flying Dutchman," till Rupert Leslie, the "superior fiend" of the whole, is stabbed, gets a glass of brandy, and dies. The effect of the hurry on the reader is rather bewildering, but not unpleasant.

Talbot's Folly. By W. B. Guinee. (Tinsley Brothers.)—This is a story with a well-constructed plot, and full of a humour which, if rather broad and rollicking, is enjoyable, if too much of it is not taken at a time. Talbot, the hero, is a spirited young fellow, and the "Blossom," with whom his "folly" brings him into the relations of fiction, is a pleasing contrast to the young ladies who figure in ordinary novels of the day. Wellbore, as a typical Member of Parliament, is, however, a mere caricature; and political life generally is looked at too much from the stand-point of the Reporters' Gallery. If, however, Talbot's Folly is a first effort, it is more than ordinarily promising.

We cannot profess to be acquainted with the subject of The Practical Pigeon-keeper, by Lewis Wright (Cassell and Co.), but we may commend it to the notice of those who are interested in the matter. The writer's "Practical Poultry-keeper" has been a success, and we do not doubt that this manual, which seems thorough and exhaustive in its treatment, will prove equally satisfactory.

We have before us The Vastir of Laukurán: a Persian Play. Edited, with translation, &c., by W. H. D. Haggard and G. le Strange. (Trübner and Co.)—The play is a recent Persian translation from the original, written in Azerbaijani Turkish, and its suitability for its present purpose, the convenience of travellers, &c., is that it contains, not the classical, but the colloquial Persian of the day. The editors supply, besides the text and English translation, a grammatical introduction, notes, and a vocabulary, with the words marked for pronunciation.

Debrett's Peerage, Baronage, Knightage, and Companionage, 1883. Edited by R. H. Mair, LL.D. (Dean and Son.)—Debrett now appears for the 170th time, containing about two months' later information than can be procured from kindred works. Hitherto confined to relating facts anent living members of the nobility and of those collaterally related to them, the present volume contains upwards of sixty pages of information referring to predecessors of Peers.

NEW EDITIONS.—Life of Lord Wolseley. By Charles Rathbone Low, I.N. (R. Bentley and Son.)—This is the second and enlarged edition of a book first published in 1878. Mr. Lowe has now added to it an account of Sir Garnet Wolseley's administration in Cyprus, his doings, military and political, in South Africa, when he went out to succeed Lord Chelmsford, and finally, his campaign in Egypt. Mr. Low, as those who know his books are aware, does well all the work that he takes in hand; in this case, he seems to have had the advantage of unusual acquaintance with the subject of his memoir. His narrative derives fresh interest throughout from personal reminiscences with which he has thus been able to illustrate it. Fresh interest has naturally been given to a volume which we had the pleasure of welcoming at the time of its first appearance.—Boy-life; Sundays in Wellington College, 1859-1873. By E. W. Benson. (Macmillan and Co.)—There are forty-seven sermons in all, divided into three books. We cannot do better than hope that the Archbishop's utterances may be as appropriate and effective as were those of the Head Master.—We have received the second part of Vol. II. of an excellent publication, of which we have already spoken with well-deserved commendation, The Encyclopædic Dictionary. (Cassell and Co.)—The speciality of this work, we may remind our readers, is to give not only the meaning and usage of a word, but when it stands for an art, a science, an object in nature or art, to give a brief description, illustrated, when occasion demands, by an engraving. The part before us takes in from "Conation" to "Destructionist."—A second edition of T. Hancock's sermons, Christ and the People. (Hodges.)—The fifth edition of Handbook to the Masterly Series, by Thomas Prendergast. (Longmans.)

BOOKS RECEIVED.—Contributions to the Physical History of the British Isles, by C. Hull. (Stanford.)—Salamina. By A. Palma di Cesnola and S. Birch. (Trübner.) This book is an interesting and well-got-up illustrated history of the treasures of Salamis, in the island of Cyprus.—Notes on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (Kegan Paul and Co.), intended for readers of the Authorised Version, or the original Greek.—Brand's Decisions, by E. G. Blackmore. (Spiller.)—Volume V. of the serial illustrated edition of Our Own Country. (Cassell.)—Volume II. of the Sunbeam Library, containing reprints of Whyte Melville's "Kate Coventry" and "The Interpreter," and Trench's "Realities of Irish Life."—Australian Aborigines, by J. Dawson (Robertson, Melbourne), the vocabulary of native languages, in which will be useful to missionaries, emigrants, and settlers.—Electric Illumination, edited by J. Dredge, with abstracts of specifications, prepared by W. L. Wire; being Volume I. of the "Engineering Series," compiled from or reprinted from the Engineer, and published at the office of that newspaper.—The Incorporated Law Society Calendar for 1883.—A Dictionary of Christian Biography, edited by W.

Smith, and H. Wace, (Murray.) Vol. III., "Hermogenes—Myensia."—The Boundary Disputes of Connecticut, by C. W. Bowen. (Osgood and Co., Boston, U.S.; Trübner and Co., London.)—A Synopsis of Moral and Ascetical Theology, &c., by J. A. Skinner, M.A. (Kegan Paul and Co.)—The Law of Master and Servant, by J. Macdonnell, M.A. Parts I. and II., "Common Law" and "Statute Law." (Stevens and Sons.)—History of the Boehm Flute, by C. Welch, M.A. (Rudall, Carte, and Co.)—Principles of Agriculture, by W. T. Lawrence. (Chambers.)—A Summary of Tactics, by H. F. Morgan (Ward and Co.), intended as a companion volume to the "Summary of Military Law," issued by the same publishers.—How to Help Cases of Distress, by C. S. Loch. (Longmans.)—The Dismal Science, by William Dillon (Gill, Dublin), is not so much a treatise on political economy, as an essay by a student, who has also the advantage—or disadvantage—of being an Irishman. The author has read a good number of the popular works on the subject of which he treats, and seems to have become infected, to some extent, with the Georgian and Reciprocity heresies.—Pen-and-Ink Sketches on Military Subjects, by "Ignotus" (W. H. Allen and Co.), is a series of articles reprinted from a weekly contemporary. We agree with some, we probably disagree with more, of the special views in regard to military reform advocated by "Ignotus." But he invariably writes well.—Float-fishing and Spinning in the Nottingham Style, by J. W. Martin. (Sampson Low.) This treatise on the "coarse" fishes of the chub, roach, and pike type is written in a lively style, and the author knows his subject. The chapter on pike-fishing is exceptionally good.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

REUTER’S Roman correspondent sends a sketch of the understanding which, according to the Foreign Minister of Italy, has for some time existed between Germany, Austria, and the Italian Government. The three Powers undertake to use the greatest care not only in avoiding a war with France, but in keeping up friendly relations with that country. If, however, any one of the three should be attacked by France, the other two will declare war on her behalf. In the event, again, of any one of the three declaring war on any Power other than France, the other two, though they may remain neutral, must not join the attacked Power. Really, Prince Bismarck, from his own point of view, is a great diplomatist. Under that Treaty, he remains free to attack any single Power he pleases, certain that neither Austria nor Italy will interfere; while if his grand apprehension proves true, and he is ever attacked by Russia and France together, Austria and Italy must advance to his aid. In return, he guarantees Austria against France only, a mere phrase, as the two Powers have no conflicting interests, and also Italy, which by that very guarantee is rendered safe against the assumed contingency. For France to invade Italy with 200,000 men—and less would be useless—while Germany was pouring across the Rhine, would be an act of something like political insanity. There is probably, in addition, a private promise that Italy will keep up her Army and Navy at what the German Staff consider an effective level.

M. Léon Say, the best French financier and most influential Free-trader, is, we are sorry to see, entirely in favour of the policy of Colonial expansion. He believes evidently that foreign trade depends upon foreign influence, regrets the retirement of France from Egypt, and is desirous of pursuing a forward policy in Tonquin, Madagascar, and the Congo Valley. Those expeditions hardly concern us; but it is becoming evident that the upper classes of Frenchmen feel a keen jealousy of England, and suspect her of designs to impede French colonial progress. Fortunately, the masses are entirely opposed to war; but the situation should be watched, if only because it is one so different from all anticipations. In France, the “reasoning” middle-class is agog for expeditions, while the “unreasoning” masses are for the policy of the fireside. We are not sure that we may not see something of the same change in England before long. The Members are much more warlike than the people.

At Scarborough on Tuesday, Mr. Dodson made a good speech at a meeting of the Scarborough Liberal Association, in which he declared that the Government would continue “their policy of justice to Ireland, whatever the clamour, reproaches, or menaces addressed to them, and would do what in their consciences they believed to be right towards Ireland; and they would do so in the hope that in time, be it long or be it short, the doing of right would bring its own reward.” He also spoke out very clearly and strongly about the Affirmation Bill, declaring that it was a considerable mischief in itself to multiply oaths, and much better to let everybody who preferred it take an affirmation, instead of an oath. Still more was it unjust to refuse to any constituency the right to return whom they would to Parliament on account of unpopular, or untrue, or even offensive religious opinions, so long as the representative chosen was prepared to accept loyally the political constitution under which he must act. In short, everything that Mr. Dodson said was manly, and much of it courageous. The speech proved him to be one of the heartiest Liberals in the Cabinet, though he is probably less well known to the people than any other Commoner whom it contains.

Lord Salisbury has been tilting this week against the Radicalism of Birmingham, having made two speeches and two speechlets, the best of them addressed on Wednesday to 500 members of the Midland Conservative Club at a banquet in the Town Hall. This was one of Lord Salisbury’s most telling efforts. He began by replying to Mr. Bright’s Glasgow speech on the wastefulness of war, remarking that Mr. Bright ignored the creditor’s side of the account, and claiming for British wars that we are still inheriting all the advantages of the Duke of Marlborough’s wars, of the war with France in Canada, and of the Duke of Wellington’s wars against Napoleon, to which last, in his opinion, we owe it that England is not French territory. Lord Salisbury then twitted the Liberals with their composite Ministry, remarking that the Government reminded him of the old weather-toy, which he described wrongly by saying that when the old man came out it was fine weather, and when the old woman came out it was the reverse. “I will not for a moment attempt to indicate who is the old man; but you may safely say that the mechanism of our political system is this,—when it is going to be fine, Lord Hartington appears; and when Mr. Joseph Chamberlain appears, then you may look out for a squall.” The coalition between Whigs and Radicals had led to a zigzag policy,—first a Whig tack, then a Radical tack, never a continuous line. The policy adopted on the Radical tack persuaded the Egyptians that no force would be used; then the Whig influence prevailed, and force was used. During a Whig tack the force was sent to restore order in the Transvaal, when suddenly the Radicals got the upper-hand, and it was discovered that “though there was no blood-guiltiness in fighting, there was in winning;” and to this craze, said Lord Salisbury, we owe it that at the present moment there are “hundreds of thousands”—so at least he is reported to have drawn the long-bow—of trusting South-African natives slaughtered, starved, and driven out of their homes, because they had confidence in English pledges.

Lord Salisbury also made his usual attack on the Irish policy of the Government, declaring that the Burlesque which should be entitled “Ireland Governed by Irish Ideas” had been concluded, as it had been begun, by “an explosion.” He remarked with great bitterness on Mr. Dodson’s declaration at Scarborough that the Liberals intended to clear their conscience with regard to Ireland, asserting that the most saintly Liberal conscience ought to be satisfied by this time, and that if it was not, and if the conscience was to go on, there would very soon be a renewal of disorder. The Marquis concluded by expressing his conviction that “the growing Conservatism of the country” was largely due to the lessons that Liberal inconsistencies teach,—which may be true, whether “the growing Conservatism of the country” be a fact or an illusion. If it be a fact, it is, we suppose, due to a greater dissatisfaction with the Liberals than with the Conservatives; if it be an illusion, there is no formal inaccuracy, though there is something misleading, in suggesting that that which has no existence is due to an imaginary cause. Ex nihilo, nihil fit.

Mr. Gibson also spoke, but spoke badly. As usual, he tried to make out that the House of Commons was far too magnificent an Assembly to be of much importance in its legislative capacity, and gave the impression that the less legislation it does, the better it deserves its grand historical position. We had been, he said, under a Radical Government for more than three years, and he wanted to know who was the better for it? Is agriculture more prosperous? Is trade more thriving? Bad workmen find fault with their tools, and the Ministers found fault with their legislative tools in the House of Commons, though he would not say they were bad workmen. The "God-given Ministry" had adopted "a profane programme." The "Rads," as Mr. Gibson, with refined playfulness, called the Radicals, were always "despotic," and, in his experience, "invariably intolerable." To use the words of a great American orator, "for downright double-barrelled, copper-bottomed, bevel-edged bigotry, 'give me,' said Mr. Gibson, 'a man who calls himself a Radical,'—and the delighted assembly cheered this silly slang as heartily as the Yankee inventor of it could have cheered it himself.

The speeches of Thursday were not so remarkable, at least as regards Lord Salisbury's efforts; of Mr. Gibson's we have seen as yet no adequate report. Lord Salisbury spoke three times. He attacked the caucus, declaring, with a singular bias towards the mal à propos, that on a question like the Affirmation Bill, the caucus would ride down all independent dislike to it among the Liberals,—the fact being that on the Bradlaugh question, as it is called, the caucus had either not attempted to assert itself at all, or utterly failed to dictate to the Liberal party,—men of all shades having, with what we regard as a singular want of apprehension of a question of principle, refused to vote for allowing Mr. Bradlaugh to take the oath, and stayed away even when it was a question of making an affirmation. Lord Salisbury further complained of Ministers for not offering a formal opportunity for discussing for the tenth time the over-discussed Kilmainham treaty, and for the second time their Transvaal policy, though the latter opportunity has never been refused. He accepted Lord Beaconsfield's description of the Conservative policy as national, stigmatising the Liberal policy as "sentimental, cosmopolitan, or poetical." And he tried to convince his hearers that the Liberal Government, left to itself, would soon be "stripped of India, stripped of the Colonies, and humbled before Europe." But of this, as we need not remark, he did not attempt to offer any tittle of evidence.

The Standard reports its belief that the Mastership of the Rolls has been offered to, and declined by, Sir Farrer Herschell, and has since been offered to Mr. Horace Davey, Q.C., M.P. for Christchurch. We only hope for the sake of the country that Sir Farrer Herschell has really determined to stay in the House of Commons. That he would have made an extremely able judge, we do not doubt. But in the House of Commons he would be greatly missed. Lucid and masterly in exposition, a universal favourite, endowed with at least as sound political as he is with legal abilities,—both of no common order,—he is one of the few lawyers in the House who are heard with as much deference in a great political debate as he is on a subject professionally his own. Such a man can ill be spared in the chaos of an assembly where crystallising forces are comparatively few.

The ceremony of the enthronisation of the new Archbishop of Canterbury was performed on Thursday, in the Cathedral, the Archdeacon pronouncing the operative words, "Induco, installo, et inthronizo," which would, we suspect, have amazed Cicero, though not Gregory VII. Six Bishops of the Province appeared as officers of the See, and three other English Bishops, three Colonial Bishops with Sees, one American Bishop, and seven Colonial Bishops without Sees, assisted in the grand procession, led by the Archbishop, wearing the long scarlet train which stands in place of the ancient pallium from Rome. The Duke of Edinburgh, and a host of dignitaries, officials, and visitors were present, much of ancient magnificence and form having been restored to the show. The Archbishop afterwards made a speech in the library, the most noteworthy sentences of which were that the Church ought to reject temporal dominion, that she should not fear intellect, which was of God—but is, we may remark, like the rain, given to just and unjust alike—and that he personally admired the comprehensiveness of the English Church, shown in allowing the French Protestant Church to exist within the limits of the Cathedral. Dr. Benson is, therefore, effectively Archbishop, after a delay, for one futile form or another, which we agree with the Times is wholly unsuited to modern circumstances, and after an expenditure which ought to be thoroughly revised. Between nomination and enthronisation, an Archbishop Elect is plundered at every turn.

The death of Mr. John Brown, the Queen's personal servant, has created some interest in society. He has for years been a conspicuous figure in the Royal Household, and at one time the most absurd stories of his influence with the Queen were greedily believed. The truth is, that he was a confidential servant, so trustworthy and devoted that the Queen treated him, as he deserved, as a humble friend, and in particular relied more upon his vigilant watchfulness than upon any police or guards. Kings value devotion like Mr. Brown's with a feeling compounded of true gratitude and of a master's kindness for a great dog, and naturally consider service to themselves service also to the State. In this light, there is nothing unusual in the strong expressions with which her Majesty, in the Court Circular, records the "grievous shock" she has felt at the "irreparable loss" of "an honest, faithful, and devoted follower; a trustworthy, discreet, and straightforward man," whose unceasing care in the performance of his duties "had secured for himself the real friendship of the Queen." There is a ring of true and most creditable feeling in the whole official notice. Mr. Brown died of erysipelas, supervening on a cold caught while inquiring, at the Queen's desire, into the reported attack on Lady Florence Dixie.

The House of Commons reassembled on Thursday, and began business by taking the bit in its teeth. Dr. Cameron moved that "the minimum charge for postal telegrams should be reduced to sixpence," his theory being that if sixpence was sufficient, the difference between that sum and a shilling was a special tax levied on the telegram-sender, which is not sound, the community benefiting not by the sending of telegrams, but by the power of sending them. Dr. Cameron might just as well say that, if a letter to Kirkwall costs in transmission more than a penny, the difference is a special tax levied on the community for the benefit of Orcadians. It is levied for the benefit of all, for all may want some day to send a letter to Kirkwall. He showed, however, that a shilling was a high charge; and Mr. Fawcett did not really oppose, only pleading that if the Treasury would risk the £177,000 a year to be lost at first, he would be happy to try the experiment. Mr. Childers objected to give up his money, though he said he would see what could be done by next year; but the House, by 68 to 50, decided that there had been waiting enough. The expense will be considerable, for Mr. Fawcett must have new buildings, and the organisation of delivery will be difficult,—though we think a cheap Echo-boy system could be managed; but the increase in telegrams will be very great, especially if the office will take threepence for the single words "No" and "Yes." We do not envy the operators.

The police of Liverpool have received information that buildings "in a neighbouring town" are to be blown up by a local branch of the "Invincibles," and are keeping strict watch. On Wednesday, a man was arrested on a Cork boat with a box full of a very powerful explosive, nitricised glycerine and sawdust, and two clock-work machines, like that used by the "monster of Bremerhaven." The police also arrested a railway porter, in whose residence it is said important documents were found. Further arrests have been made in Cork, and so important is the whole matter deemed, that the Home Secretary on Thursday refused any information to the House of Commons. The police are said to be thoroughly informed, and are acting in Ireland and England at once, the law being the same in both countries. We said last week that legislation could do little; but a good, heavy tax on the importation of explosives, levied with the severity of the tobacco-tax, would make importation more difficult, and if the money were given to informers, would enlist the sailors' wits on the side of order. They do not greatly love men who bring dangerous explosives on board without the captain's permission, and so risk the safety of the ship, and they would search closely.

The Times on Thursday gave a front place and its largest type to a letter from "A Tory," complaining that Sir Stafford Northcote is to unveil the statue of Lord Beaconsfield, instead of Lord Salisbury. This decision he regards as one more attempt of the "section" or "faction" who follow Sir Stafford to achieve a permanent triumph over the more numerous followers of Lord Salisbury. He affirms that a rumour is being widely circulated that a decision has been taken "in high quarters" to send for Sir Stafford, whenever the country again requires Conservative statesmen, and deems it indispensable to "denote" intrigues "which threaten the vitality of a great political party." That sounds like theatrical thunder, but it shows that the unity of the Conservative party is not quite perfect. That, however, is of little importance. They will have plenty of time to recover themselves, and, to do Tories justice, when in office they are as obedient as soldiers could well be. We have always thought that the world did not sufficiently honour Lord Beaconsfield for his magnanimity in not abolishing the Ten Commandments. If he had made the proposal, the Lords might have saved them, as "very ancient institutions," but the Commons would not.

On Thursday, Lord Grey published in the Times a bitter, and Sir Bartle Frere an able, though preposterously prolix, letter on Cape affairs. The latter maintains that under the Convention with the Boers, Great Britain is bound to protect the natives on the borders of the Transvaal, and especially the Bechuanas. He proposes, therefore, that a British Resident should be sent to Bechuanaland, to guide the chiefs, punish native marauders, and remonstrate, when necessary, with the Government of Pretoria. The better section of the Boers would then, he believes, help to create an opinion which would keep the filibustering section in check. The assertion that we took upon us an obligation to interfere, instead of claiming a right to do so, is the precise one which the Government denies, and the suggested remedy is a very feeble one. If the Boers despise us, as Sir Bartle Frere asserts, they will pay no respect to our Resident, and as he will represent the British Government, we shall in no long time be compelled to back his representations by force. Mr. Forster's plan of compelling the Boers to keep the Convention or accept war is more direct than this, and more manly, too.

The late Master of the Rolls was buried in the Jews' Cemetery at Willesden yesterday week, and this day week the Delegate Chief Rabbi, Dr. Hermann Adler, preached a sermon on the occasion at the Central Synagogue, which was preceded by a prayer for the soul of the deceased Judge; so that it is clear that the Jews do not countenance the curious superstition of some Protestants against prayers for the dead. The prayer was that God would "remember in mercy" the soul of the departed, that his soul might be "bound up in the bond of life everlasting," and that his rest might be "in peace." Dr. Adler's sermon was on the duty of the Judge, and on the qualities essential to a perfect Judge, as described by the old Jewish sages, of which seven were enumerated, two of which are, we should think, by no means indispensable to a great Judge, and far from conspicuous either in the best and ablest of our other Judges, or in the late Master of the Rolls,—“wisdom, modesty, fear of God, hatred of gain, love of truth, love of one's fellow-creatures, and an unstained reputation.” Probably the second has not belonged in any remarkable degree, and the fourth not in any degree (unless it be construed to mean hatred of gain earned by the perversion of justice), to any great Judge of our time. For the rest, probably no Judge of our day had a better right to have these qualities ascribed to him,—though they do not seem to us to cover any very specially judicial characteristic,—than the late Master of the Rolls. In addition to all these qualities, his mind was characterised by singular uprightness and impartiality, and his power and will to do justice promptly, were greater than that of any of his great contemporaries. The judgment in the Epping Forest case, for instance,—a case the argument of which occupied twenty-two days, covered documents filling many folio volumes, and the evidence of 150 witnesses,—was delivered at once on the conclusion of the case, “without a moment's hesitation or preparation,” as Mr. Robert Hunter, who was engaged in the case, testifies to the Times, and the judgment was so unassailable in its reasoning that it put an end to all litigation at once.

On Saturday last (Easter Eve), a curious outbreak of what we suppose we must call fanaticism, took place in St. Paul's Cathedral, a man of the name of George Campion, who had, according to his own account, lost a good business through the prejudices which he had excited against himself by denouncing the Ritualists, interrupting the evening service by springing on the Communion table and knocking down the large cross, the candlesticks and candles, and other ornaments, all of which had been there for the last twelve years, and all the Easter floral decorations, before he was secured. Canon Gregory appears to have taken the lead in securing him, Campion charging the militant Canon with an attempt to suffocate him by thrusting a handkerchief into his mouth, an act not very inappropriate, when Campion was crying “Protestants to the rescue!” in the middle of evening prayer.

Campion, who was brought up before Sir Thomas Owden on Monday, described himself as an inventor of agricultural implements, and wanted to justify himself by pleading the wrath of God against idolatry, and the apathy of the law in putting it down. Sir Thomas Owden, however, very rightly remarked that if there was anything illegal in the service, there were legal means of putting an end to the illegality; but that no one could be allowed to interrupt a religious service, Roman Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, or Freethinking, by an act of violence of this kind, and he entirely refused to go into the Ritualistic argument into which the prisoner sought to divert the case. Eventually, as it was asserted that Campion's wife was ill, and even dying, on promising the Court never to be guilty of such violence again, he was only fined £5,—the fine being paid by a friend,—and got his discharge almost too easily, considering the violence and irreverence of which he had been guilty. Nevertheless, we cannot regret the lenity of the Court. It is always well, where it is possible, to treat genuine fanatics with exceptional lenity, partly because fanaticism is a disease which is greatly aggravated by severity, partly because it is not altogether ignoble, and is generally due rather to ignorance than to malice. In many Protestants there is still a sort of physical horror of what they call idolatry, though they are quite unable to define even to themselves in what idolatry consists, except it be in the use of solid religious symbols under a certain size. The Gothic arch does not seem to excite this superstitious fury,—we suppose because it is too big,—but the Christian cross and the Jewish candlestick do.

The English Clergy seem to us to be taking a very false step in signing the memorial to Mr. Gladstone against the Affirmation Bill, and we wish they would read an admirable letter to this week's Guardian on that subject, by the Rev. Malcolm MacColl, who seems to us to prove to demonstration that what the Clergy are really contending for is not in any sense a genuine test of Theism, but rather for imposing a formal, and in the minds of true Christians almost blasphemously hollow, use of the name of God, on men who, because they do not in the least believe in any personal God, will feel little or no scruple in using the term in any sense they please. And the logic of such a test will, Mr. MacColl argues, necessarily lead rather to the substitution of pallid and unmeaning latitudinarianism in all the forms of the House of Commons,—the daily prayers, for instance,—than to anything approaching to genuine religious creeds. The argumentum ad clerum is ably put, and is well worth reading.

Six men were sentenced by Mr. Justice Lawson at the Antrim Assizes on Wednesday to long terms of penal servitude. They had all been members of a criminal society called the Patriotic Brotherhood, founded by an Irish-American for the murder of landlords and agents of the law, and had all specially conspired to murder a landlord named John McGeough. The evidence was most extraordinary, an informer named Duffy swearing that a regular record was kept of the decisions and acts of the society. These records were produced, and implicate O'Donovan Rossa, among others, in the most direct manner. Their genuineness was, of course, impugned with great earnestness; but they corroborated much of Duffy's evidence, though he could not have seen them, and they were written in a way which almost precluded the idea of forgery. The letters were imitations of print, obviously to conceal handwriting, and it was shown that one man in the Brotherhood was expert in caligraphy. Mr. Justice Lawson's charge was singularly moderate, but he, as well as the jury, obviously considered the records genuine; and if they are, there is no doubt of the prisoners' guilt. It seems possible, among certain classes in Ireland, to form these societies almost at will. Nothing is necessary but an Irish-American, a room, and a few pounds, and men come forward to pledge themselves to murder by the score. They do not always keep the pledge, but they take it.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE QUEEN.

THERE is something very touching and motherlike in the frankness with which the Queen, through the Court Circular, asks her people to sympathise in the grief she feels for the loss of a devoted attendant. The grief is perfectly natural, for service like John Brown's, the service of a servant who makes life easier at every turn, yet is as trustworthy as a gentleman, is what every one seeks, and few ever find. The Queen has relied for years upon her husband's favourite attendant, not only for the usual services of a chasseur, but for a personal guardianship against the lunatics whom even she, as her history shows, has constantly to dread. The Queen is in no danger from her British subjects, and is, we believe, more protected than any Minister against Fenians by the Irish certainty that America would never forgive any attempt on her life; but the danger from lunatics is irremovable and real, and the constant guardianship of a powerful and devoted attendant is essential to her Majesty's freedom to ride, and walk, and enjoy the chilly air she loves. A man so trusted must become a humble friend, and we honour the Sovereign for expressing so publicly that "friendship" was the feeling she entertained for one so humbly faithful for so many years.

We wonder how many of her subjects ever reflect on the pathetic element in the Queen's present position, the contrast between her place in the world, as the only woman alive now reigning over a great people by legitimate right—the only other great reigning lady, the Empress of China, is only Regent for her son—popular or even beloved by millions, half-worshipped, as a well-informed correspondent tells us to-day, in India, a separate figure known to the whole human race, yet burdened with a solitariness only to be felt by Kings. Sovereigns are always more solitary than others of mankind, for, except with husband or wife, a Sovereign can have no perfect intimacies; and if their lives are long prolonged, their friendships must grow few. The "friends" of every young Sovereign are always persons older than himself—a fact markedly true of the Queen, to whom Lord Melbourne, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Lansdowne, all men of an earlier generation, stood first in that relation—and as they drop off, they are irreplaceable. The Queen has survived not only her husband, but almost all relatives of her own time, all her earlier political friends, and an entire group of closely-attached dependants, like Sir C. Phipps, Sir Arthur Helps, and many another less known to the general world. There is no one living who could address her by her Christian name, or, indeed, on any terms of equality; while all her children but one are married, scattered, immersed in business and households of their own. It is a lonely peak to sit on, at the top of the world, and as age draws on the Sovereign, who already has reigned so long that men passing middle age have consciously known no other, must feel this more and more painfully, with a sadness which the movement of the world does not diminish. The Queen has had no misfortunes such as have afflicted many of her predecessors, no loss of subjects like George III., no loss of public honour like George IV., but she has to bear the burden of an ever-increasing pressure of interests, incidents, movements of mankind, of all which she must to herself seem the centre. Nothing eventful can happen in the world which is not in some way or other borne in pressingly on the Queen. The special feature of the age, the new complexity of life arising from rapid communication, began shortly before her accession—Huskisson was killed in 1830—and from that moment to this, affairs must have seemed to press in ever-increasing volume upon her, as if the very atmosphere had grown more weighty. Imagine what the telegraph alone has been to the Queen. To feel imperative duties increasing, and strength decaying, and life growing more and more lonely, is a sad position for any one; but what must it be to a Sovereign who receives every day evidence that she is one of the central figures of the world, who hears on Monday that all America is glad because the report of an accident to her had proved exaggerated, on Tuesday that an Indian tribe has accepted her as goddess, on Wednesday that her daughter, one day to be Empress of Germany, has celebrated her Silver Wedding with Princes for train-bearers, on Thursday that a plot has been discovered which renders doubled watchfulness necessary round Windsor? It is a strange position, one not to be desired; and, remember, it must be judged not from the Constitutional point of view, that the Queen only accepts advice, but from her own point of view that the Queen, after taking advice, gives her own commands. No Monarch ever yet quite lost the feeling that in some indescribable way he was himself in some special degree responsible for the welfare of his people, and in that responsibility alone, be it as unreal as it may—and Englishmen often underrate the Queen's direct influence on affairs—is a burden which to a lonely woman long experience can only make the heavier. Experience teaches us what to do, but teaches also how useless the doing often is. We are no devotees of Monarchy, gravely holding self-government to be more educative and more dignified; but there has never been in history a reign like that of Queen Victoria, who, surrounded by an impenetrable etiquette, breaks it to tell her people that devotion, even in the humblest of followers, has roused in her "real friendship." Republicanism in England sleeps, and will sleep while the Queen reigns. Is there not in that mere truism a sufficient biography?

LORD SALISBURY AT BIRMINGHAM.

LORD SALISBURY'S first speech at Birmingham was much the ablest of the group which he has fired off in the capital of Radicalism. But we may fairly say this of the whole group of speeches, that, considering the tone of bitterness which has pervaded such speeches of late years, Lord Salisbury has not, as was his wont, exceeded, but rather reduced the amount of superfluous acrimony which seems to be the distinctive characteristic of the present tone of the Conservative party. We have not yet had an opportunity of reading any full report of Mr. Gibson's second speech, but so far as we can judge, Mr. Gibson has made an effort to introduce more of acrimony into his one tone, while Lord Salisbury has abated a good deal of his political malice, and thus the two orators have hit a tolerable mean of severe but not indecent political vituperation. We note this alteration of Lord Salisbury's tone for the better—Mr. Gibson's change for the worse is, we suppose, due only to a natural and we hope temporary effort to accommodate himself to Lord Salisbury—as the only ominous sign for the Liberals in the Tory campaign. We quite admit that it may really be a result of increasing confidence in the force of the Conservative party, and that it is a change of tone likely, so far as it goes, to gain a hearing for that party amongst reasonable men. Party Conservatives, of course, cheer most warmly the most furious speeches; but it is not the furious speeches that win Conservative votes. The strength of that party is and must always be amongst the moderates, who do not like abrupt change, but for that very reason, also do not like extravagant imputations on public men whom, as they well know, the nation at large respects and trusts. Lord Salisbury will gain a more respectful hearing amongst such men by his tone at Birmingham than he could possibly have gained by his popular speeches of last year, at Hatfield, for instance, or in Edinburgh. The more he condescends to recognise in his opponents men who are not altogether devoid of statesmanship or of regard for political duty, the more we recognise his speeches as forces which may take effect on the mind of his own party, and of that not inconsiderable section amongst Englishmen who pride themselves on not belonging to either party, and on voting sometimes with one and sometimes with the other, as they in their discretion may think most fit.

Lord Salisbury's cleverest speech was undoubtedly the speech of Wednesday, on what he termed the unfortunate "zigzag" line of policy in which the deliberations of a Cabinet representing a coalition between Whigs and Radicals are apt to end. Conservative Cabinets, of course—for this was what he implied, though he did not say it—never show any traces of divergent elements. It is only since the Radicals have been admitted into alliance with the Whigs that the disastrous phenomenon of successive slants, which hardly seemed to be dictated by the same general aim, has appeared. In Ireland, he said, the view of Mr. Bright that "force is no remedy" was tried first, and much too long. It was only after it appeared that the outragemongers had fairly got the upper-hand, that the Whig policy prevailed, and drove the Government into the second branch of the zigzag. It was the same in Egypt. There Mr. Bright's policy was tried first, and it was not, in Lord Salisbury's view, till the Egyptians had fully persuaded themselves that no other would be tried that recourse was had to arms. It was the same again, he held, in the Transvaal, only that there the Whig policy was tried first, instead of second, and the Radical policy substituted for it, just as the Whig policy was on the eve of success. All that is very skilfully put. It has thus much amount of truth in it,—that in all these cases, just as in relation to the problems which most puzzled Lord Beaconsfield's Government, there are two quite distinct classes of considerations, one set of which probably found the ablest representatives in one section of the Cabinet, while the other found the ablest representatives in the other. It is very likely true that there were some members of the Cabinet who would have suppressed the Land League before others were willing to do so. It is very likely true that there were some members of the Cabinet who would have applied force in Egypt before the others were willing even to send the fleet to Alexandria. It is possible that there were some members of the Cabinet who thought that the Boers must be reduced to obedience before their claims to independence could be reconsidered, while there were others who would have been glad to make overtures of a conciliatory character before invading the Transvaal at all. But when was this anything but true of any Cabinet in the world? Did not Lord Beaconsfield, on his return from Berlin, honestly avow to the Tories who feasted him at Knightsbridge that he was in favour of war with Russia at a time when his colleagues were not prepared for war, and that he therefore had to acquiesce in a zigzag policy in which he could not himself feel any satisfaction? Did anybody doubt that Lord Palmerston, at the time of the Danish war with Germany, accepted from the majority of his colleagues, and from the overpowering representations of his Radical followers, a policy with which he himself was not satisfied? Everybody knows that it was the same with the Cabinet "of all the Talents" at the time of the Crimean War, with the Conservative Cabinet which "dished the Whigs" by the Reform Bill of 1867, and, indeed, with almost every Cabinet which has had a critical question before it within the memory of men. The very use of Cabinet Government is to ensure that the policy adopted shall not be the policy merely of one masterful mind, but rather a policy which shall recommend itself to the average Englishman, and which, therefore, shall rest on those complex considerations which appeal partly to one kind of mind and partly to another. The only difference that we know of between the policy of previous Cabinets at such crises and the policy of this, is that in previous cases the Prime Minister has not unfrequently been notoriously overborne by his colleagues or his party,—Lord Aberdeen, Lord Palmerston, and Lord Beaconsfield were all so overborne,—while, so far as we have any means of knowing, Mr. Gladstone's judgment has gone decisively and cordially with the most important steps taken by this Cabinet, and has even sanctioned more or less heartily the time chosen for taking them.

For example, as to the suppression of the Land League, we know pretty well by Mr. Gladstone's speech at the Guildhall that the time chosen for that strong course recommended itself completely to him, and that till then he had hoped—perhaps a little beyond hope,—in the efficacy of Mr. Forster's "Protection of Person and Property Act" to prevent outrage, by the seizure of "village ruffians" only, without the suppression of the Land League or the imprisonment of its leaders. There was, indeed, a very great deal to be said for that long forbearance by all statesmen who believed,—as the Liberal statesmen, without exception, did,—that it was the failure of the Compensation Bill in the Lords, and the unjust evictions consequent on that failure, which led to outrage, and that after the passing of the Land Act the outragemongers would lose the tacit sympathy of the Irish peasantry. But, without rediscussing a very difficult question of policy, this at least is clear,—that for a Liberal Cabinet, the first duty was to try remedial measures, and the second only, to suspend the ordinary law. In point of fact, the two duties were discharged together, only that, in consequence of the unfortunate choice made by Mr. Forster in relation to the kind of suspension of the ordinary law which was most desirable, the latter measure never took the effect intended, and, indeed, rather aggravated the situation. Again, as regards Egypt, whatever Cabinet had been in power, there must have been a section reluctant to apply force up to the very last moment, and another section which believed that an earlier action would have been better. That was undoubtedly so in all the other War Cabinets of our time, and on general principles we may safely conclude that it will be so in those of the future. Able men will differ in judgment as to the right moment for applying kill-or-cure remedies. But so far as we can see, there is very much less reason to think that any differences of opinion of this kind were pernicious in this case, than there has been in any previous instance of the same kind that has occurred during the last thirty years. The presence of a great fleet at Alexandria,—the messages and warnings sent to the Egyptian authorities,—the deliberate notice given at the last,—were all emphatic indications of what was coming, if Arabi continued his high-handed action. The zigzag in this case seems to us to reduce itself rather to a continuous curve. And as for the Transvaal case, Lord Salisbury, when he cleverly puts it that the Government, though they had no scruple as to the bloodguiltiness of making war, saw the most serious bloodguiltiness in winning the day, chooses to ignore the fact that in the interim the Boers had offered terms in which the British Government saw the conditions of a reasonable settlement. The zigzag there was determined not from within, but from without; the force which altered the line of policy was the offer received from the Boer Triumvirate.

Clever as Lord Salisbury's "zigzag" speech was, we submit that he made out no zigzag of policy which is not to be discovered in even more strongly-marked lines in the case of every Cabinet that has had to deal with great questions in recent times, and certainly none in which, so far as the public can judge, the judgment of the Prime Minister has been more completely reflected, both as regards the resolves taken and the moment at which they were carried out.

The most remarkable point in Lord Salisbury's speech of Thursday is the curious Conservative zigzag for which he himself pleaded in relation to Free-trade. 'I am a Free-trader,' he said in effect, 'but it is only on expediency grounds that I accept Free-trade; and if by any temporising, by any partial regression to Protection intended to bring others to Free-trade, we can convert the rest of the world more rapidly, why, to that temporising and partial regression I should not object.' That appears to us to be Lord Salisbury's drift, and if it does not mean that, if it does not mean that he wants to avail himself of Mr. Lowther's help, without committing himself to Mr. Lowther's views,—that he wishes the Conservative policy on this subject to be a sort of zigzag, tacking now towards Free-trade and now towards a retaliatory policy of protection as against Protectionists, we have no comprehension at all what it does mean. Lord Salisbury should not taunt Liberal Cabinets with their proclivity for zigzag, when he shows himself so much greater a proficient in devising a zigzag policy for his Party, even while out of office, than Mr. Gladstone has ever been.

THE "ENTHRONISATION" AT CANTERBURY.

THE special interest of the grand ceremonial performed at Canterbury on Thursday is not difficult to explain. The imposing display attracts all antiquarians, all devotees of ecclesiasticism—always a wide-spread cult—all the lovers of many-coloured, slowing-moving pomp, and two much more numerous classes besides. All those who hate and many of those who love the Established Church are irresistibly drawn towards the scene. They are all English, the English nature, in spite of its admiration for splendour, is realistic to the core, and it is impossible for them to see or to read of all this ecclesiastical pageantry, this show in which Bishops are the players, and the nation audience, and the Sovereign standard-bearer, without asking themselves what is the moral and intellectual justification of it all. Here is a ceremony as elaborate, as scenic, as pompous, to use the plainest word, as a coronation, a ceremony in which form is everything, magnificence a decency, and ostentation eagerly expected, which is described in a word—"enthronisation"—more mouth-filling than the one we apply to Royal shows of the same kind, which tries the descriptive powers of reporters who luxuriate in magniloquence, and which is, after all, only intended to recognise that a Minister of Christ charged to assist with his guidance other ministers has been regularly selected. There can hardly be a sincere Christian in the Protestant world, however steeped in Church feeling, who has not felt a doubt, however swiftly it may have passed, whether such a pageant can be wholly right,—whether Christ can have intended such a recognition of his Church, whether a true teacher of the Christian Faith could be so unlike an Apostle in outward seeming, an "enthroned" Prince, first among Peers, the occupant of a Palace, ordered to live with the great of earth, cut off, so far as external circumstance can cut a man off, from the great community of the suffering and the poor. Such a Christian cannot but feel that, outwardly at all events, there is more of the Cæsar than of the Church about the whole affair, more of ostentation than humility, more of earthiness than spirituality, and something horribly unreal besides, and cannot but long in his heart for a Chief Bishop dignified only through the respect of the just, who should enter on the office as on a burdensome but simple career, and should be to all the Church, or, for that is nobler, to all the nation, a wise counsellor, somewhat apart, yet always accessible, conveying his message with an authority derived only from visible likeness to his Master,—or if that may not be, and the ideal is too high, from visible single-heartedness in interpreting his will. Granting that Episcopacy is the divinely ordered organisation, or at the lowest, an organisation permitted by the Divine, should not the true Overseer be nearer to those of whom he accepts the charge, nearer in daily life, in those sympathies which, if they have their origin deeper, yet flourish most when they are nourished by like circumstances of position? We confess we do not understand the Christian to whom that view is not, at the first blush, the true one; who does not, at least till he has reasoned the matter out, feel a sensation of regret as he reads the reporters' "purple patches" about the public recognition of one who should be, and let us add, often in spirit has been, servus servorum Christi.

It takes thought to justify an Archbishopric of Canterbury, but yet it may in its essential features be fairly justified. Of course, the pomp with which insignificant details like the formal recognition in the Cathedral of Canterbury—the "enthronisation" is only that—are surrounded can be defended only on the historic ground. The ceremony has been for ages, and therefore should be; that is the only explanation possible or needed, until it is certain, which it is not yet, that the pageant, in itself a matter of indifference, works positive injury to the cause. We could not devise such a scene anew, lest it should be ridiculous or offensive; but we can tolerate it or like it, as we tolerate or like other survivals of the kind. Sweep away the Lord Mayor's Show when the citizens loll out their tongues as it passes, but not till then. But the Archbishopric, in its essence as an ecclesiastical institution intended to be "grand" in the earthly sense, can be defended. To begin with, the assault is based on far too abject a recognition of the effect of clothes, far too great a concession to the strange and most un-Christian theory that true religion cannot exist under splendid externals; that the only possible Apostle is the Fisherman; that humility and full dress are incompatible; that Cæsar cannot be converted and remain in a golden palace. Because the humble may be Christian, the great are not necessarily Pagans, any more than a tribunal is necessarily unjust because the presiding Judge wears the wig of another age, and a robe needlessly magnificent. The "position" even of a pastor is but his dress, and therefore a matter of detail, which it may be useful, or decorous, or attractive to regulate by historic usage, attention to which so often sobers and quiets men. But for a stately etiquette often intensely artificial the House of Commons would be a bear-garden, and an army a camp of brigands; and Christ never told the Church to fling away useful powers. There is no more harm in the Archbishop's pomp than in any other earthly etiquette, much less harm than there would be in any forced or artificial assumption of humility. Better "enthronisation," even if we wince at it, than the washing of beggars' feet previously made clean for the fastidious touch. An emperor may reach heaven, though he sits on a throne, and do all his duties too; and so may a Christian priest, if only his work does involve the acceptance of that seat. The only true question is whether it does, and though we cannot for ourselves honestly answer in the affirmative, believing, for one thing, that a true Church should recognise and sanctify every growing force not contrary to morality, even if it be such a force as the passion for equality, we can see clearly that those may be right who think otherwise, who doubt if men have yet advanced to the point when grandeur does not bespeak reverence, who question if authority can put off trappings, and who believe that in cathedrals, in music, in stately worship, there is an influence which lifts the soul to a higher atmosphere than that of daily life, which, for the majority of men, doomed as they are to labour, must always be somewhat colourless and sordid. If that is true—and it was true for almost all men once, and may be true for millions now—the incidental pageantry of the Archbishopric is amply justified. It is, we must recollect, at bottom truthful pageantry; for the Head Presbytership of the English Church, with its hold over millions, its antique history, and its influence with the great, is still a vital power, an actual force, which in assuming all this pomp only announces actual facts to the world. The ceremony of Thursday is but the crown of a system, as little immoral and as useful as that formalised worship with which no people as yet has ever shown itself able to dispense, yet retain in its common life the deep impression of its creed. While other things which should be spiritual, like justice, need and use trappings, the Church may use them too; and if they are used, let them be of the very best. We can conceive of a Church whose head should be an anchorite, fenced round only by unbought reverence—and, as our readers may, perhaps, suspect, we prefer that ideal—but if he is to have "position," let it be with the highest, till even in that detail there is acknowledgment that the spiritual forces are equal in men's regard to the secular, that even in rank the teacher of religion may stand by the side of the victorious soldier or the successful statesman. A less position than that, if "position" is to be granted at all, except involuntarily, only deepens the constant suspicion of the millions that those far above them hold such teachers in disregard, and think those only honourable who increase their wealth, or repute, or power. It is not the noblest way of influencing mankind, or the most effective, but it is morally unobjectionable, and it has at least this advantage, that powers and capacities otherwise lost to the Church, and indispensable to her working as an institution, are thereby attracted to her service and her aid. Rome knows all that well, and the machinery of Rome—we are not speaking of doctrine—has been organised by men who had the world to think of, and not one country only, and who, therefore, never forget that till man is civilised he is affected even in spiritual things by external ceremonial,—that the Ark had not for Syrian wanderers the impression of a gilt box. We have a suspicion, and a strong one, that the civilisation of England has advanced beyond that ceremony of enthronisation; but we have also, on the other hand, a deep conviction that London journalists read many things into the minds of the millions over whom, and not over the hundred thousand of the educated, Dr. Benson was so splendidly announced to be the leading pastor. We all make too much of clothes, in being annoyed at them; and yet, and yet,—the only preacher who ever hurried the masses of Europe out to voluntary death for the sake of a great idea, who for a moment extinguished in the millions fear, and greed, and selfishness, was a Hermit, without a home, clothed in a dirty shirt of unbleached wool.

MINORITIES AND THE DEMOCRACY.

IN Mr. Bright's second speech at Glasgow last week, he gave vent to one of the very few virulent political animosities which he still permits himself to entertain, in his attack on the representation of minorities and on the mode in which, in the three-cornered and four-cornered constituencies, that representation is achieved. We are not in the least disposed to contend specially for the latter expedient. It is unquestionably a very great anomaly that whenever a minority seat is separately vacated, it must necessarily be filled up by a representative of the majority. And in every case the minority Member feels a shamefaced consciousness of representing not the deliberate preference of the whole constituency, but only that of the outvoted part of it. Moreover, it may be admitted to be an anomaly, and a serious one, inherent in the present accidental and so to say hand-to-mouth system of representing minorities, that it tends to diminish unduly the practical influence of the great constituencies to which it applies in the House of Commons,—the effect of it being that a great constituency, like Liverpool for example, whenever it happens to have a minority Member seated for its third seat, can only add as much to the majority by which any measure is carried as Portarlington itself contributes if its Member happens to vote on the same side. The vote of the minority Member for Liverpool cancels the vote of one of the majority Members, and leaves Liverpool only as much net influence over the practical decision of the House as Portarlington itself exerts. We fully admit that in both these aspects our present minority clause is extremely objectionable. But the mischief of the latter flaw is in reality due not to that more adequate representation of Liverpool opinion which the minority principle brings about, but to the excessive influence assigned in our representative system to a bare majority of an infinitesimal constituency like that of Portarlington. If Portarlington included no more political influence than any other collection of some hundred or hundred and fifty voters, and if the minority of every constituency had as much chance of getting its views represented in the House as has the minority of Liverpool, it would not be possible to say that the practical influence of Liverpool in the House of Commons was outweighed by the practical influence of a very much smaller place in the same Assembly. This last anomaly, though it is mischievous in its results, is really one arising from the excessive influence given under our Parliamentary system to the bare majority of minute constituencies, and not one arising from the attempt to make the voice of Liverpool speak the convictions of Liverpool with greater exactness than it would do if some two-fifths of the electors had never any better prospect than that of voting unsuccessfully against a candidate with whom they disagree.

It will be seen, then, that we are not at all disposed to fight for the clumsy and truncated attempt to assert the rights of minorities to a fair hearing in a true representative assembly, which is embodied in our present tentative and very inadequate political experiment. But when we find a contemporary as clear-headed as the Pall Mall Gazette going far beyond the present awkward arrangements to the very root of the matter, and boldly denying that any attempt ought to be made to give minorities a fair hearing in Parliament at all, we are compelled to say that what is struck-at, seems to us to be the very principle of Democracy itself,—the very principle of representative institutions,—and that what is really advocated is a system of representing political opinion in which only one side need be represented in the House of Commons at all, and in which the other side of opinion, even though it were enthusiastically adopted by two-fifths or three-sevenths of the nation, might be “conspicuous by its absence,” and by that alone. The Pall Mall on Saturday last appeared to be quite prepared to adopt such a view, and even disposed to contend for it as right in the abstract. “Mr. Bright,” said our contemporary, “had an easy task in exposing the unreasonable absurdities of the present minority clause. But the battle will have to be fought, and at no distant date, on the whole principle, and not merely on this irrational and mischievous application of it. The Times is only too well justified in saying that Mr. Bright will find, when the Reform Bill comes on for discussion, that a very large number of men, by no means confined to the Conservative side of the House, will contend for the principle of the representation of minorities. In fact, many less likely things have happened than that a serious split should take place both in the ranks of the Liberal party and in the Administration upon this issue. It will be the test, as we think, of true Liberalism. Whatever schemes you may frame for representing minorities, they will operate solely in strengthening all those anti-popular interests which are always too strong by their intrinsic position.” What our contemporary here maintains appears to be this,—that all true Liberals should be in favour of artificially strengthening the opinion of the majority of the nation, so as to exclude from view, as far as may be possible, the evidence of the fact that a very strong opposition was registered to that opinion; and this for the simple reason that Conservatism always has a natural advantage by virtue of its “intrinsic position,”—a natural advantage so very great, that it needs to be balanced by constitutional contrivances for securing that the Conservative Party shall exert considerably less influence relatively in the House of Commons than they exert in the constituencies themselves. Now, is this seriously to be called a “test of true Liberalism,” namely, that we shall deliberately choose to make the Commons an assembly not representing as nearly as possible the opinions of the country, but, on the contrary, representing as exclusively as can be managed, the opinion of that class in the country which happens to be most in favour? What is the true “Liberal” theory of representation? Is it that the House of Commons shall reproduce, as near as possible on a reduced scale, the opinions of the country at large? Or is it that the House of Commons shall reproduce as exclusively as possible on that reduced scale the opinion predominant in the country at large? Is it “Liberal” to wish to silence the deliberative voice of our opponents,—even though that voice would only be heard in exact proportion to the popular influence which those opponents wield,—on the express ground that Conservatives have so immense an advantage in their “intrinsic position” that there ought to be a counter-weight intentionally put into the Liberal scale, to make up for the advantage of that Conservative possession which is said to be nine points of the law? If this is to be a test of Liberalism, we confess to thinking it the most illiberal test of Liberalism ever suggested, and the most undemocratic burlesque on the theory of Democracy. The very notion of a Democracy is, that the people shall settle political matters for themselves as nearly as they can; and that as they cannot all meet together to discuss the national politics, a Council of the nation shall be summoned, which shall reproduce as nearly as may be on a small scale the opinions spread abroad in the nation at large. If the whole people could meet together, the minority, we suppose, would be allowed not only to express their views, but to show the world how large a proportion of the people hold those views. But, according to the new doctrine which it is to be a test of Liberalism to hold, the Conservative minority in the House of Commons should be distinctly prohibited from exerting any influence in proportion to that wielded by them out of doors, on the astounding pretence that Conservatism is in a position of so much greater natural advantage than Liberalism, that we ought to muffle its voice artificially, lest Liberals should, after all, fail to make their own voice duly heard. Is that the true opinion of Liberals? Does any genuine Democrat fancy that when the majority of a nation can both make its voice heard, and make it heard with the exact authority attaching to its preponderance, it will yet need to have its authority artificially enhanced by keeping generally out of sight the popular weight of the minority which it has beaten? Such a doctrine seems to us one of the most ignoble ever proposed in the name of Liberalism and Democracy. It is the doctrine of men who do not desire representative institutions at all, but misrepresentative institutions in which exaggerations shall be deliberately authorised,—all these exaggerations to be in the direction of making the stronger side seem relatively a good deal stronger than it actually is.

In saying this, we are by no means condemning the doctrine that the minority of a nation may be fully represented, without any attempt to elect what are now called minority Members. We are quite willing to admit that under the very great difficulties of the case, a system in which the constituencies are so carefully and uniformly subdivided, that the majority of one constituency may be trusted to speak for the minority of another, might prove the fairest of all. All we contend for is the principle that we ought to try by one means or another to get in the House of Commons as near a copy of the shades of opinion in the nation as the best representative institutions,—and these, at the very best, are necessarily imperfect,—will admit. What we insist upon is that we ought to aim at getting the opinion of the minority represented in one way or another, and fairly represented,—represented in the full weight attaching to its proportional diffusion through the nation. If this can be best attained by subdividing large constituencies into wards, and giving each ward a Member,—every elector in each ward having but a single vote,—we shall be satisfied with that way of attaining it. It may very well be that, with a system of that kind, there will be little chance of a misrepresentation of the total result, for the minority of one constituency might, under these circumstances, be sure to get its due influence in the House of Commons, through the voice of a majority of another constituency of the same general kind; the minority of one agricultural constituency by the majority of another agricultural constituency, the minority of one middle-class borough or manufacturing town by the majority of another middle-class borough or manufacturing town. But we do protest in the warmest manner against this new-fangled test of Liberalism which actually assumes that, unless Liberalism is to have an artificial advantage over and above the natural advantage of its superior popularity,—the artificial advantage, namely, of commanding in the House of Commons a very much stronger majority than it actually commands in the country at large,—it cannot make any headway against the force of Conservative prejudice and of Tory possession. That is not the view of a democrat, but the view of a friend of privilege, who wishes to arm the majority with greater powers than that of their numbers and of the moral and intellectual superiority of the doctrines to which those numbers give in their adhesion.

THE RUSSIAN CORONATION.

A CHANGE has occurred in the Russian situation on which it is hard to avoid speculating, even though the uncontested facts are so few. The cloud of dread which, after the murder of Alexander II., had settled down upon the Court of St. Petersburg, has evidently been partially lifted. Though the old, free life of the Czars has ended, probably for ever, and no Russian Emperor will again stroll unattended through the streets of St. Petersburg, or enter uninvited a private house, as Alexander I. and Nicholas used to do, Alexander III. is again moving among his subjects, holding reviews, giving entertainments, and even presiding at semi-public dinners in his honour. It is possible to obtain an order from him without a visit to Gatschina, and most citizens of St. Petersburg have seen his face. Whether the police, as they boast, have arrested all conspirators, or some secret arrangement has been made with their chiefs, or the Court, in despair, has resolved to disregard them, the Czar has certainly recovered his freedom of action, the Czarina is relieved from fears for her children, which at one time threatened either life or reason, and the Ministry are relieved in part of their unendurable extra charge. The Coronation, without which the Russian Sovereign is held by the mass of his subjects to be only Czar-elect, has been determined on, a day for it has been publicly announced—to be changed, it may be, as the time approaches—and Asia and Europe are ransacked for means to make the ceremonial magnificent. It is noted, as a mere indication of the scale of the preparations, that Russian agents have purchased in advance all the flowers obtainable on the Italian Riviera, and that the final salute will be repeated, so far as possible, in the same indivisible moment of time, at every artillery station from St. Petersburg to Petropaulovski, the melancholy fortress on Behring's Sea. Every Court in Europe or Asia, including, we hope, India, is to be represented by a Prince or a special Mission, as well as by its regular Embassy, and the heirs of those semi-dependent Tartar Kings of Northern Asia of whom the Western world knows so little—for the Khans of Khiva and Bokhara are only two out of ten or eleven, each with power of life and death—are all to pay their homage to the White Czar, whose shadow protects while it crushes them. They know better than the West does what security the Russian uniform gives them against China, against insurrection, against their tribal enemies, and their representatives will not be merely prisoners of war. There is no such gathering of the representatives of the world in our day as that which attends a Russian coronation. In spite of the condition of Russian finance, the ceremonial is to be of "Arabian Nights" magnificence, and to overawe by its bewildering pomp the representatives from every province and city, who have been summoned in order that on their return they may convince the eighty millions that a Czar, autocratic, magnificent, and fearless, has again received the visible sanction of Heaven and the Church for his claim to rule.

The eagerness to perform this ceremony, though it is, of course, indispensable in Russia, is not altogether hopeful, for it suggests that the Czar's impulse amid the dangers which surround him is to strengthen his hold on the unreasoning reverence of the masses, who are still impressed with the divine right of a crowned Emperor, rather than to make any effort to conciliate the educated, whose teaching, now spreading in the Army, and in some provinces among the peasantry, most endangers his throne. The Nihilists will not worship because the Czar is crowned. It is difficult, however, to repress a hope that Alexander III., who certainly has considered the results of a liberal course, once crowned and liberated from the fear of appearing to yield to personal violence, may be induced to allow the people of Russia some further measure of freedom. We have never been among those who think it possible, or even certainly right, for the Czar to surrender his autocracy. Ultimate power in a State must reside somewhere, and it is by no means certain that, amidst a people so ignorant, so numerous, and so scattered as that of Russia, the Sovereign may not be a safer depository of it than any representative body he could summon, or any electorate that he could invest with power. His moral claim to rule cannot be rejected while the people would give him a plébiscite of ninety per cent., and he can be guided by their wishes, once expressed, as readily as by their orders. An autocratic Peasant Parliament, as ignorant as Russia, as autocratic as the Czar, and beyond even the restraint of assassination, rather appeals the imagination even of men who hold strongly, as we do, the faith that liberty educates. The ablest reformers of Russia have never asked this, nor is there anything in the circumstances which renders so enormous a change peremptory or unavoidable. But it is manifest that Russia has advanced beyond the stage of silent submission; that the hostility of the educated paralyses the Government; that the Czar, if he is to exercise his immense powers in security, must take his people into council, must give them the means of stating their views, their grievances, their hopes, publicly and freely and with authority. This can be done safely only through a deliberative Assembly, and with the autocratic right openly and expressly reasserted in the Constitution, as it once was asserted in that of Denmark, we fail to perceive what there is under existing circumstances for an Emperor of Russia to dread. He need not call the Assembly together in Moscow; and even in Moscow, with the garrison he can command, he has nothing to fear from popular insurrection. The Deputies will be devoted to him, and granting they were not, would all be on the road to Siberia twelve hours after they had declared against the throne. The Czar, if protected from criticism—and in Germany, or for that matter, England, the protection of the Crown is nearly perfect—has nothing to fear from free speech. His agents may have, for no doubt if speech were once really free in Russia, even though the right were limited to the Deputies, a flood of light would be poured upon dark places; but the Czar gains nothing by ignorance of oppressions committed in his name, or by allowing to his servants powers which only make them hated by the people. He does not want to govern more strongly than, for example, the German Emperor governs, and he would retain indefinitely greater authority. Not only the present Czar, but even his father and grandfather, have allowed ordinary affairs to be conducted according to law; and the bureaucratic violences, which are, in fact, breaches of law, produce nothing to the dynasty. The attacks which a Deliberative Assembly would, no doubt, direct upon the Treasury could not affect the Emperor, whose state is kept up, for the most part, by a quasi-private fortune beyond compare in Europe. The Deliberative Assembly could not of themselves abolish a tax, or reduce the Army, or decree a special course in foreign politics, and their representation on any such subject would not of itself be executive. Perhaps the Court fears it would be, that when grievances were once frankly stated and proved, such a weight of public opinion would gather behind the Deputies, that their representation must be obeyed; but if Russia is so forward as that, resistance is ultimately impossible. Public opinion, when it is powerful, is not the weaker for not being formalised. We suppose the true objections in the Czar's mind are, in reality, two; one, that the mystical charm of his authority, its independence or self-existence, would be broken, if he were seen to be guided; and the other, that the administrative machine would give way, or be unworkable, under the weight of popular criticism. The first objection has undoubtedly a weight in Russia not quite comprehended in the West. It is the one which is always put forward by the sincere and, so to speak, pious absolutists like the President of the Synod, and it convinced the Monarch himself, at the great Council held after his father's death; but it is completely met by the reply that the independence of the Throne is not attacked. The Czar is not asked to part with any portion of his sway. Under the scheme proposed, the Emperor remains the free autocrat from whom alone the laws derive validity. He only accepts a Council as counsellor as he might accept an individual as counsellor, and the Deliberative Assembly's petition is but the "Report" which precedes action in any department. The second objection in part is solid. No one familiar with Russian methods of administration will doubt that the bureaucracy would greatly fear the Deliberative Assembly, would lose much of its independence under free criticism, and would for a time grow perplexed and out of heart. It is most difficult when you have managed affairs as you pleased, to manage them under strict surveillance. But the answer is, that this is the very change to be sought first of all, that the independent action of the bureaucracy is in Russia the root of evil and the cause which most spreads dissatisfaction, and that the reorganisation of the service upon the German principle, that the official must obey both his superiors and the law, is the grand necessity of the Empire. The Czar cannot lose by adopting it, and it is hard to believe that, with his knowledge of Germany, the fear of losing it renders his mind impervious to a concession which might recement his power. It is the harder, because the Czars feel bitterly their difficulty in controlling subordinates, and the excessive exertion necessary to enforce improvements, more especially the abolition of bribery and the honest collection of taxes, which they themselves desire. Not to mention that an Assembly of any kind might authorise taxation which would put the finances straight, no absolute monarch likes a revelation like that which within this month has been laid before the Czar as to the peculations in the Ministry of the Interior; and they go on, more or less, in every distant office, and can be stopped only by the publicity which a Deliberative Council and its necessary supplement, a fairly free Press, would secure. The representative of Samara would have no power to punish the theft of contributions for his province, but the mere fear that he would expose them would carry the money safely on its way. The Russian officials, when detected, execute themselves.

Everything still depends in Russia upon the character of an individual, and that of Alexander III., though it may now be known to a few Councillors, remains to most of his contemporaries a sealed book. Considering the commotions of his reign, the freedom of speech among Russians outside the Empire, and the eagerness with which an autocrat is scrutinised, it is astonishing how undefined his mental outline remains. It is not even known yet whether he possesses any of the ability which has hitherto been wanting to few of his House. It is probable, by all accounts, that, though obstinate and tenacious, he is equal to the average in intelligence; and the average intelligence of a man used to great affairs, and accustomed to regard them as his affairs, has sufficed to make considerable Sovereigns. Many men govern estates fairly well who are not very brilliant; and we all forget that the business which strikes outsiders as political, and therefore difficult, must strike a despotic master as work which he has constantly to do, and therefore can do as well as another. The Czar must know what his troubles are, though they concern an Empire, as well as a noble knows his own, though they only concern an estate, and must, from the habit of a lifetime, be fairly accustomed to weigh advice. He may believe, as so many another man does, that any change is dangerous; but he may also believe that the present situation does not admit of rest. If the latter impression should in the end dominate his mind—and one specialty of his mind is known, that he dislikes and dreads financial disorder—he will hardly find a better opportunity for making changes than the moment when he is accepted by the immense majority of his subjects as the crowned Czar who must be on their side, and whose decisions spring from purposes they cannot fathom, and a wisdom beyond their measure. Whatever he gives will be accepted with enthusiasm as a free gift, and if he will but give enough, the educated may be as powerless to resist his initiative as the nobles were to resist his father's decree of emancipation.

MR. LOWTHER AT KIRKBY MOORSIDE.

MR. LOWTHER'S speeches out of Parliament have always an interest of their own. They show us the natural man of Toryism. Sir Stafford Northcote is a Conservative, because "moderate," being with us always an adjective, cannot stand alone; and as it must be associated with some substantive, Sir Stafford prefers that it should be with the substantive "Conservative," rather than with the substantive "Liberal." Mr. Lowther's reason for the name that belongs to him is altogether of another type. If he were perfectly out-spoken, he would probably set down his leader as a mere Laodicean, afraid to be frankly hot or frankly cold, and constantly disappointed by Englishmen not proving as lukewarm as himself. Whatever Mr. Lowther is, he is not lukewarm. His theory of Opposition strategy consists in taking care of the pence, and leaving the pounds to take care of themselves. If he were speaking to only ten men, he would be as bent upon securing their votes, and as indifferent to the effect his words might have upon others, as though they constituted the whole Electorate. His speech at Kirkby Moorside on Tuesday is an excellent example of his peculiar method. Considering how large a share the Conservatives have had in the formation of the Grand Committees, a common-place Conservative would have thrown his abuse of the new machinery into the future tense. He might have dwelt upon the danger that, under other circumstances and in another Parliament, Grand Committees might not fairly embody the sense of the House of Commons; but he would have congratulated his hearers upon the success with which this danger had been for the present averted. Mr. Lowther's dislikes have this in common with Omniscience,—that the future and the present are all one to them. What a thing may conceivably become, that, if it suits his purpose to make it so, it is already. No respect for Sir John Mowbray prevents him from calling the Grand Committees "carefully packed representatives of the Birmingham Caucus." That Mr. Chamberlain should have found a willing tool in the Conservative Member for Oxford University, has no improbability in Mr. Lowther's eyes. If he happened to differ from Lord Salisbury, he would have no scruple in describing him as the self-constituted mouthpiece of the blatant Radicalism of the Northern towns. Nor will any regard for names or appearances make Mr. Lowther deaf to the summons of duty. When the Bankruptcy Bill or the Criminal Procedure Bill comes back from the Grand Committee, he, as an elected representative of the people, will be ready to consider its provisions. He will move amendments and take divisions upon every clause, and do his part, unassisted, to make the Bill "Lowther's entire."

In speaking to farmers, however, it is necessary to come nearer home than questions of Parliamentary procedure. A remedy has to be suggested for agricultural depression, and it must be such a remedy as a Liberal Government can be trusted not to provide. Mr. Lowther sees at once that, from this point of view, compensation for tenants is not at all a safe subject. It is certain that the Liberal Government will give the farmers as much compensation as a Conservative Government, and it is probable that it will give them something more. Consequently, Mr. Lowther's cue at Kirkby Moorside was to present tenants' compensation as a very small matter indeed. "They heard," he said, "a vast deal of stuff and nonsense talked about so-called compensation for improvements; but this talk about improvements, exhaustible and inexhaustible, only concerned the man who happened to be going to leave his farm." In these times, we should have thought that too many farmers "happen" to be going to leave their farms, to make this jaunty reference to such a state of things quite prudent. Perhaps, however, Mr. Lowther felt sure that men who were under notice to quit for non-payment of rent would hardly be among the guests at a Conservative banquet. Perhaps, also, he had so much faith in the beautiful vision he was about to conjure up for them, that this reference to their possible misfortunes seemed to him nothing more than a trick of oratory. The farmers were to be set meditating on rent-day, which they see no chance of meeting, in order that they might the better appreciate the panacea which Mr. Lowther was preparing to bring out of his pocket. Parliament is to insure that every man shall have a fair return for what he lays out. It is true, Mr. Lowther inserts a condition—if it can be equitably done—but he evidently has no fear that this condition will be wanting. All that Parliament has to do is protect the British producer against foreign competition. Mr. Lowther is shrewd enough to see that he cannot hope to get Protection for any one British industry, however important. He must find other industries willing to make common cause with the one in which he is interested. Help must come not through a league of British farmers against British manufacturers, but through a league of British producers against foreign producers. Not one tradesman only, but every tradesman, is to have an interest in the new political venture. Everything that is grown or made in England is to be protected against everything that is grown or made abroad. In this way the farmer will once more be independent of sunshine. Sunshine is no better than a quack remedy for agricultural depression. "With wheat at the price at which it has frequently stood of late, it will be impossible," according to Mr. Lowther, "for farmers to carry on their industry, whatever sunshine they may enjoy." If they are to live at all, prices must be raised; and so long as the Americans ask no more for their wheat than they have asked lately, prices cannot be raised, unless American corn is kept out of the country.

Mr. Lowther takes credit to himself for being so much more outspoken on this point than the leaders of his party. A great many of his best friends, he admits, are not prepared to go thoroughly with him in regard to Protection. It is strange that this abstention on the part of his friends excites no suspicion in Mr. Lowther's mind. He does not see that it would be the cue of every Conservative to promise the farmers protective duties, if it were possible to do this without incurring worse dangers in the opposite direction. Mr. Lowther has no such doubt. He has, to all appearance, persuaded himself that it is quite safe to think only of the producer, and to leave the consumer out of the account. He does not even remember that the producer of one thing is the consumer of everything else, and that a great deal of his consumption goes to help in his own special production. Even farmers, the class which of all others would benefit by Protection, might not be willing to close the door against American machinery. They would like to be protected themselves, but they might not be equally impressed with the importance of protecting the British ironmaster. It is certain, therefore, that Mr. Lowther's notion of combining producers would end in nothing, and that in the end he would have to come before the country with a naked proposal to give Protection to British agriculture. It is no wonder that his friends are not prepared to go this length with him.

The Conservative leaders have very little notion of playing their cards well. If they had, the really good cards which they sometimes hold would more often give them the trick. But they are too sharp to identify themselves with Protection to British wheat. Only, so long as they have no policy of their own to propose, they are naturally powerless to keep politicians like Mr. Lowther silent. In the absence of instructions from his leaders, he sets to work to frame a policy for himself; and pleasing as the result of this creative act may be to himself, it must have given Sir Stafford Northcote some uncomfortable moments, if he had the courage to read what his follower had said.

"ABU TELFAN."

IT is not often that much teaching is to be obtained by Englishmen out of translated German novels. There is amusement in Freytag's books, principally derivable from the contrast of English and German manners; and we all acknowledge the charm of Werner's scene-painter style—hardly any Englishman yields so broad a brush—but Spielhagen's strength is mainly untranslatable humour, and the teaching in all is very slight. We stumbled the other day, however, on a German novel with wisdom in it. Anybody who happens to be very miserable, and especially anybody who is miserable from the feeling that his life has become for the moment a prison, in which unfavourable circumstances are crushing down energy and naturalness, and even hope—and who among us is so fortunate as never to feel thus, if it be but for moments at a time?—may, we think, read with advantage "Abu Telfan" by Herr Raabe, translated by Madame or Mademoiselle Sofie Delfs. The translation is not perfect, from incomplete mastery rather of English than of German, and the writer's slightly bitter humour may not strike others as strongly as it struck ourselves, with the odd sense of pleasure one derives from entirely new and piquant food, of which one does not want to eat much; but the reader who goes on steadily will, we feel confident, come to one conclusion. He is somehow a little stronger for that book. We are not going to review it, for the original was published in 1867, but its central figure is a German loafer, half mauvais sujet, who, finding home intolerable, enters the service of the Engineers who first reported on the Suez Canal, wanders southward up the Nile, is carried by a negro tribe to a village of Darfur named Abu Telfan, and is kept in slavery for ten years. Nothing is described of his slavery, except that it was cruel, endless labour in insufferable heat, his mistress, a fat old negress, using the whip incessantly; but at the end of the time Hagebucher was bought, out of pity, by a German dealer in beasts for menageries, and sent home. His adventures when he arrives at home, with his character modified by his suffering, make the book, which is well written and readable, but not specially notable, except for sly sarcasm, and for the main thought, which, though not obtruded, is made with really admirable subtlety to pervade every page of it,—the thought that Abu Telfan, instead of destroying, made Hagebucher. The man has been baked, like bread which was dough. In that utter misery, a specially constricting and confining misery, endless labour under a blazing sun, with the whip for thanks, and more labour and more whip and less strength for future, with the brain unfed and cheerfulness impossible, and the whole nature seeming to its possessor crushed, and dwarfed, and insensible to aught but pain, the soul had gathered strength and calm. Not from religion. The author, we should fancy, believes little, and does not bring that little forward; but Hagebucher in his slavery has reached the bottom, has touched the realities of things, and has thenceforward the benefit of a stoicism which is liker Christian resignation or the Quaker quietness than any stoicism—to be, after all, mainly stoicism, and not something higher—that we ever saw portrayed. Naturally, what is personal suffering, or mental depression, or spoiled hopes, or any misery of life, even that great one of seeing wrong triumphant, when one has been German engineer and slave for ten years in Darfur, without hope of escape, under the whip of Kulla-kulla? But the difficulty is to get the benefit of that exemption, and this Hagebucher, not through reflection or any panacea, but simply by unconscious endurance and a certain manliness, has done. The dough is not reflective in the oven, but it becomes bread. (By the way, there must be a moment when it was dough and is bread, though people say conversion is a lie.) And Herr Raabe, though he does not preach ever, and sometimes leaves the oddest impression of not quite seeing his own wisdom, clearly thinks that every man—especially, be it noted, for Raabe is essentially satirist—every German who is not well off, well liked by the police, and utterly Philistine, passes through his own Abu Telfan, be the same external or internal, his slavery sometimes lasting years, and might, if it were in him, profit thereby, and come out of bondage more of a man, not to say hero, than he went in. "We have all heard that before," do you say? "from nurses and mothers and preachers, and it is only the old story that trials are sent for our good, and is horribly irritating." Not exactly, though we may have sufficiently failed, from want of art, to leave that impression. There is no preachiness in Herr Raabe, and he does not think trials for our good, but for our bad,—very detestable things, to be eschewed and escaped, whenever that is honourably possible. But they come, and his notion is that when they come, and especially when they come in the form he most detests, namely, actual bondage—bondage, he hints, as of Germans under their princely régime—or spiritual bondage, there may be, for some well-tempered natures, in the bondage itself, in its strong constriction and compression, its blasting effect upon all that is unreal, an annealing force that makes the soul strong enough not only to endure, but to comprehend in enduring,—a much higher level of being. It is the Christian teaching in a way, but not from the Christian stand-point, and will address minds, if we have judged the book aright, on which Christianity, or, at all events, the Christianity taught in pulpits, has lost its capacity to bite.

We are not saying that the teaching is valuable to all. Souls are not cucumbers, to be all quickened alike by heat; nor is suffering good for all,—the irritating mistake preachers are apt to make. There are some men, and more women, so happily organised that expansion comes to them, as to most flowers, from the sunshine, and there are others whom hot suffering shrivels up or withers. Their souls die out in it, as a fire does in the afternoon rays. One-half our common people, if too miserable, are driven into drink, which then, at all events, benefits no one. They drink from drouth of happiness, not drouth of throat. But there are others to whom suffering, even when presented in that horrid form of bondage, slavery to detested or unacceptable conditions, to chronic ill-health, say, or to a loathed kind of work, or to a conviction which yet somehow you have lost and do not quite know you have lost, is a strengthening force. The man comes out of it more strong, more tolerant, more refined, with the refinement which is not outside polish, but a change of nature. That last effect has been noted for ages, we suppose because refinement shows at all times, instead of occasionally; but the others are true, too, and how, setting Christianity apart, as we are doing all through this paper, do they come? A Hindoo or a disbeliever benefits also sometimes from residence in Abu Telfan, and how does that happen? A man's courage can hardly be increased by bondage—Kingsley used to say it was the one condition which cowed the brave—and certainly slaves acquire a notable and artificial timidity of their lords. Nor can bondage which involves the non-use of powers increase them as use does. Cheerfulness increases force, and misery, even when it is past, can hardly increase cheerfulness, though the contrast may make us see causes for indulging the dwindled power which we never saw before. Is not Raabe's explanation the true one,—that misery so brings us to the sense of the realities of things that we cannot again deceive ourselves so utterly, or see men as trees walking? Everything about you except your inner self is so trivial under that burning sun, and daily toil, and Kulla-kulla's whip. The essential principle of the true stoicism, which is, after all, that the inner self is all and the externals nothing, the stoicism of Buddha as well as Seneca, is begotten in the sufferer without his own consent, and therefore with the power which most of the unconscious tendencies have. (You do not will that the eyelids shall snap at light, and therefore your eyes are protected with a certainty that the most intense conscious volition could not secure.) With that stoicism comes endurance and patience, and if the nature is large, toleration. The clear touch of an overpowering reality has burnt up effeminacy and impatience, and the incapacity to bear. "Toothache, did you say? Ah, I was a slave in Darfur! You cannot wait? I had to wait 3,650 days, —87,600 hours. Bad, is he? He is an angel to Kullakulla. The scoundrel triumphs? Ah, the huge negro who caught me lived by murdering children!" There is one curious evidence that Raabe is right, and that it is in making men see realities that suffering benefits them, which all our readers may not have seen, but which yet must be a widely diffused experience. Did you ever see a man thoroughly recovered from a long and real suffering—a long illness with actual pain in it, or a bereavement severe enough to shut his mind to externals, or a period of biting adversity, not fear of adversity, but actual down-coming—who was not, in however faint a degree, more humorous than before? The smile, if he happens to have one—an extraordinary number of men do not smile, but only laugh or grin—is deeper and more frequent, as well as gentler. Well, the source of humour is the perception of the incongruous, and in no one is that perception so certain as in the man to whom suffering has made patent the realities of things. If you have been in Abu Telfan, and not perished there, as, of course, most do, the German policeman must strike you as slightly comic, if only because he thinks himself so much above an old negress, and is so much less terrible. Be hungry for three days, and see how much you will care about high cooking.

That the sense of reality is what we gain from suffering, and that it is much, we are certain; but wherein for the non-Christian, the higher stoic, the gain lies, is a question hard to answer. If a man can say with Ebenezer Elliott,—

"Pain but appears to be;
What are man's fears to Thee,
God, if all tears shall be Gems on thy throne?"

the matter is simple enough; but if not, how then? Yet it is true that bondage in Abu Telfan often benefits the unbeliever, and also true that the reality of things by itself is not always either an ennobling or an encouraging subject of contemplation. "All flesh is grass" is reality, and yet half mankind, perceiving it clearly, live like cattle. The explanation is, we suppose, that whether a man believes or not, he cannot get from under the laws, the very first of which is that truth is harmony, and that in perceiving any truth he comes into a relation to all other truths which makes them educative to him. That all men live under a capital sentence is not by itself an ennobling fact; but when you see it as the miserable do, it is the base, if not the germ, of every thought which has lifted man above his worst enemy,—the self which in suffering occasionally loses its dominance.

WOMEN AND COMMERCIAL GAMBLING.

CHICAGO has been the first place, apparently, to provide regular accommodation for those women who gain their livelihood by speculating on the rise or fall in the cost of provisions. There, if we may trust the reporters, there is a regular place set aside for the resort of women so engaged. It is not a Stock Exchange, but a Provision Dealers' Exchange. One lady is said to have made £1,600 sterling on "the Corn Corner" of January. Another has "planked her bottom dollar" on the May wheat; a third is speculating deeply in pork, and in "futures in hog-products." The reporters say that this occupation has a curious effect on the countenances of the women who frequent this Exchange. They lose the mobility of feature and expression which is one of the great charms of women, and don the mask of impenetrability peculiar to the man of business whose great object it is never to betray for a moment how things are going with him. Now, so far as we know, there is no reason whatever, except the prepossessions of the existing Committees of the various Exchanges of Europe and the West, why women should not be admitted freely to all these Exchanges; and it is pretty certain that, at a time when the legal restrictions which exclude them from other professions are being one by one removed, no legal restriction to exclude them from this profession is likely to be imposed. If, therefore, women are not to embrace these speculative careers as freely as they will, doubtless, embrace before long law and medicine and soberer commercial pursuits, it must be their own choice which is to prevent them, and not any permanent external obstacle which it is out of their own power to overcome. If women as a rule think fit to engage in speculative businesses, women will before long undoubtedly be allowed to engage in them almost as much as they please, and to speculate as freely as they please in "the futures of hog-products," or in the liveliness or droopingness of "Scotch pig." Nothing but their own resolve is at all likely to deter them from the least suitable of all careers except, perhaps, that of a soldier—and we are not quite sure that even that would injure the feminine beauty of their characters so much,—upon which they could contrive to enter.

For this very reason we are disposed to press upon women the question whether they themselves are prepared to regard all careers which do not involve great physical daring as equally suitable for women. The late Lord Beaconsfield has told us what he thought of speculative women in the clever little sketch of "Lady Bertie and Bellair," who pretends to wish to go on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, but is really plunged heart and soul in railroad speculation, and who faints on hearing that "the narrow gauge has won." Lord Beaconsfield's verdict,—delivered, as usual, through his favourite oracle, Sidonia,—is, "She pesters me with her letters, but I do not like feminine finance;" and perhaps there was more reason for this judgment than there was for most of Mr. Disraeli's epigrammatic and sententious decisions. Undoubtedly, of all careers which are likely to unsex women, that of staking considerable stakes on the results of a complicated series of dubious commercial events seems to us the most likely to produce that effect. Impersonal excitements which depend for their interest on heavy pecuniary risks, can hardly be really good for any human being. But if they must be undergone by any human being at all, certainly they do least harm to those who have the least susceptibility to finer feelings, who are most impersonal in the whole attitude of their mind, who are nearest to intellectual engines and furthest removed from the life of the affections. We have known many men who could run great pecuniary risks with little or no disturbance of their best personal life,—and in deprecating these gambling commercial pursuits as morally dangerous, we must not be understood to express any doubt that the equalisation of prices which results from calm and wise speculation on a sound basis of capital in the upward or downward movements of stocks and commodities, is of great advantage to the world,—but the present writer, at least, has never known a woman to whom it would have been reasonable to attribute the same imperturbability. Nor do we think that if such a woman existed, she could be, in the best sense of the term, feminine. A true woman is utterly vulgarised by having her highest excitements and preoccupations not merely removed from the personal to the purely impersonal world, but made dependent on doubtful events containing a large element of chance. That which is best and finest in women will not stand the wear-and-tear of this kind of life; and though that is true of most men also, it is not so true, and will never be so true, in their case, as it is in that of women. The corruption of the higher type, as was long ago observed, is almost always a worse corruption than the corruption of the lower. Now, women's sensitiveness of perception and liveliness of affection, and that delicacy of tact which arises from sensitive perceptions and lively affections, form unquestionably a much larger proportional part of their whole nature than the same elements form of men's. And as the excitements of commercial gambling,—i.e., of speculation on the risks and chances of commerce,—undoubtedly blunt that sort of sensitiveness and affectionateness and tact, it does much more harm to women than it does to men. And yet in unsexing them, it bestows upon them nothing of the better masculine life, for we do not count a little addition to the power of wearing a mask through ordinary chances and changes, one of the better aspects of masculine life. Just conceive what the Turf would become, if women were the chief managers of all its tricks and rascalities! Imagine what a woman acting as Mr. Trollope made Major Tufto act in "The Duke's Children" must become! The bare imagination is almost enough to demonstrate the hopeless ruin which gambling must bring on what is noblest in women. It is true, of course, that in dealing with what may be a perfectly legitimate and useful profession,—the making of large investments in commodities or stocks, on the strength of indications as to the changing needs of the public,—the gambling is not so demoralising as it is in cases where the sole and only effect is to drain money out of other people's pockets into your own. But it is gambling still, and the excitements of gambling are so preoccupying, so prejudicial to the healthy exercise of all the more human parts of our nature, that it should never be pursued by any one without a very cool head, and a very great power of limiting by the exertion of a strong will the risks to which he exposes his fortunes and the fortunes of those dearest to him. We believe that what may be called the refining influences of life can never be wielded by one whose eye is ever on the compass and his hand ever on the wheel, to prevent the ship from striking on a reef, or turning her beam to a heavy sea. You cannot be thinking of the little kindnesses of life, of the slight indications that others are happy or unhappy, that this change would make a house brighter, that that would make it more home-like, if your whole mind is concentrated on the risks which you are running by a great speculative transaction in shares or goods. A mind without oppressive impersonal preoccupations is essential for those personal amenities for which we all look to women. And, therefore, women,—who can, almost always, do more to make others at their ease and happy and gentle than men can,—should, in our opinion, never hide their gifts under a bushel by assuming the blunting and hardening career of a commercial speculator. We say this even of those cases of commercial speculation which are quite legitimate,—the cases where the speculator has an ample capital, does not risk more than he can afford, acts upon scientific calculations and indications of the movements of affairs, and really confers on the community the benefit of equalising prices by raising them when they are too low, and lowering them when they are artificially high. Undoubtedly, there are very few women who could really observe these limits so as to confer a great good on the community, while even those few would necessarily thereby sacrifice a great proportion of their best private influence. But we do not lay so much stress on the rarity of these women, because undoubtedly this is partly because women have had so little discipline in the calculations of risk, and of course they might acquire that discipline in a few generations. We put it on the much stronger ground that if they did acquire that discipline, they would deprive human life of a great deal more that is good than they can ever add to it by doing the heavy and blunting work of the Stock Exchange, or the other Exchanges of the world. You cannot at one and the same time be speculating heavily for a rise, and making the life of a home brighter and purer than it would otherwise be. It takes a great deal of self-command, a great deal of tenacity, a great deal of calculation, a great deal of careful reflection, observation, and strenuousness, to do any speculative business on which the fortunes of your house depend, with judgment and sobriety. All this means the expenditure of a great deal of vitality, and the draining of that vitality from a sphere in which it can be made to contribute vastly to the refinement, the graciousness, the goodness, the sweetness, and the harmony of life. If women are prepared to draw off their life from their own special sphere, and invest it in a hard calculating forethought and an indomitable volition, we can only say that they are prepared to inflict a great misfortune on the world. Let all kinds of life be as free to women as to men. But at least let them exercise their freedom with equal regard to the qualities in which they are strongest, and by which they can contribute most to the refining of human character. We think we may safely say, that amongst these strongest qualities women would not find in one case in a million those which specially suit the possessor of them for a life of sober and reticent speculation, and in that one case in a million would probably find also brighter qualities which must be suppressed, or at least, allowed to rest unused, if the former are to be put to the highest use.

GRATITUDE.

WE have before this remarked on the tendency in the English language, and to some extent in all language, to stamp moral epithets with too distinct an implication of praise or blame, or perhaps we should say rather of blame alone, for the impulse that approves is a much fainter one, and gives its verdict with less emphasis. We want the power of disinterested moral description. We have not a dialect in which to state moral characteristics as facts, without implying a judgment upon them; and it seems impossible to point out many types of character which in their concrete manifestation rouse no particularly strong feeling of revulsion or displeasure, without exaggerating all their evil. How black a shadow, for instance, is cast by our words, when we speak of anyone as ungrateful! Hardly any other accusation would be so impossible to soften with explanatory circumstance; it implies the opposite, not the deficiency of good; not human frailty, but diabolic wickedness. Yet, the truth is that, though what we mean by ingratitude is rare—for it implies much more than the absence of gratitude—yet gratitude is so little common, that we hardly look upon its absence, except when it is lighted up by strong personal feeling, as involving any serious moral offence whatever.

An ungrateful person, as we ordinarily understand the words, is one who is conscious of important obligation, and chooses to disregard it. Such a character, for the experience of most of us, does not exist. We cannot look at the world as it is, and deny that there is such a thing as good consciously received, and requited with evil; but for the world of average humanity, this kind of ingratitude is as though it were not. The ordinary human being remembers benefits, not so definitely as injuries, certainly, but he does remember them, and when occasion offers, if it involves no very great self-sacrifice, he acts upon them. Most of us, probably, would have to ransack our memories, and peer into many a shadowy corner of the past, before we could recall any one of whom we could honestly say that, taking the word in its ordinary acceptation, he had treated us with ingratitude. And the misfortune of the ordinary acceptation of the word lies here,—that seeing ingratitude is not a danger of average human beings in this sense, we are inclined to think it is not a danger in any sense. We relegate gratitude to the world of exceptional achievement and heroic self-sacrifice, so that in the unheroic world where most of us live and die it does not appear, because it is never summoned. But let no one think it is not missed. Because we do not aim at it, we are by no means incapacitated for regretting its absence, though we often mistake the thing we miss, and sometimes exaggerate it. And it would be the double gain from a truer view of this virtue that we should both expect it less and show it more.

We should expect it less, because we should see that it has as its foes not only all the vices, but also some of the virtues. Indolence is the foe to every form of goodness, and, therefore, to this among the rest. Gratefulness—so let us designate the quality we would describe, to distinguish it from that heroic development which has usurped the place of the homelier type—gratefulness implies a good deal more mental exertion than is obvious at first sight, as any one will allow who compares the occasions on which the feeling has been expressed by him with those in which it has failed to find any expression of word or deed. Pride, too, is its enemy,—at least, what we generally mean by the word is so; ideal Pride, being fastidious in accepting obligations, and scrupulous in acknowledging them, would rather appear as its ally; but the cheap substitute we put up with in every-day life somehow keeps only the first of these characteristics, and not always even that. And some of the qualities we most admire, we must confess, appear on the same side. It cannot be denied that this must be said of generosity, in a general way; although the fact is one we are slow to admit, mainly because we mistake the impressiveness of exceptions for their frequency. Probably most of us have known more than one person who was both generous and grateful, and the link forged by such a memory seems a thing no experience of its uniqueness can break. There are a few persons who shine both as a giver and receiver, but we shall be more just to ordinary humanity, if we remembered that it is not a small thing to exhibit one-half of what makes up the ideal of human nobility, and that we must never look for more.

After allowing that more than one of the virtues are apt to ally themselves with ingratitude, we must make the same concession for genius, for moral attractiveness, and for enthusiasm. The man of genius is as ungrateful as the child. In the child's case, we are all so prepared for the absence of gratitude, that the word strikes us as altogether inapplicable. Children cannot be grateful, and cannot therefore be ungrateful. Something not altogether unlike this is true of the man of genius,—indeed, it is true of a very much larger class than one we could designate by anything that the world recognises as genius. The wealthy, richly-endowed nature keeps habitually the standard of gratitude that we all held when we were four years old; love bestowed is as natural, service is as much a matter of course, merely to draw near one's benefactor is, in the one case as in the other, an ample requital of all service. We cannot say that the external effect is the same; it must always be with a certain shock that we discover that any mature human being keeps the child's recklessness of obligation, whatever reason may urge in defence. But reason has much to urge in this case. "It goes against me to see 'X' take his obligations to you so easily," says some wife, fully conscious of all she could have done for her children with the hundreds that have gone to make life easier for her husband's gifted friend. "You make too much of a little money," says he, but an uneasy feeling is revived by her words, and perhaps does not again slumber. Yet, after all, on which side lies the true obligation? It may be a matter quite indifferent to him that his name will be known to the generations that come after as the friend of "X;" he is not solicitous, perhaps, to be remembered otherwise than in the loving memory of a few survivors, but has not he received more from the poet or the teacher than he has given him? Is not his life more improved by the friendship than that which it has sheltered from penury? This is the question which, whenever he asks himself, he answers with an emphatic affirmative; but it is one of those truths of human relation which seem to depend for their truth on the lips that utter them, and it is always a shock to find that the man of genius himself takes this view of the relation. But indeed, though we speak of genius, we would point out the temptation of a much larger class. Genius is but the summit of that mental elevation of which the lower heights, though unrecognisable from afar, have to those who tread them not a few of the characteristics of genius, and many a name associated with no world-wide resonance rouses memories that could not be surpassed in vividness and significance by any that are enshrined in classic biography and revived by stately monument. Wherever there is this mental wealth, we shall be apt to find a certain poverty in the power of feeling gratitude. The man who is always welcome, who feels his presence a boon, who cannot but be aware that he leaves all society the chillier for his absence, does not associate any services rendered him with self-denial. Was it you who introduced him to this delightful home? He can hardly remember the fact, so many there are who seek his society. Did your painstaking service render possible this brilliant achievement? He feels you fortunate in having had a hand in anything that has seemed to him worth doing. Indeed, there is a great deal of careful, disinterested service, which the person for whose sake it is done would scornfully repudiate, if he supposed that any gratitude was due from him to the worker. Gratitude! Were you working at a noble cause, then, with merely personal objects? An enthusiast is indignant at the possibility of loyalty to himself coming in to eclipse the claim of devotion to his work. He cannot remember how mixed are the springs of most human action, how small a class of motives we can divide into good and bad, how unwise it is to discourage the personal influences that dilute a pure love of a principle or a cause. There is something noble in his ingratitude; but it is not politic, nor rooted in any real depth of moral wisdom.

On the one hand, then, the richly endowed are rarely grateful. On the other hand, we must say the same of the needy, when their whole experience is of need. This is one of the innumerable cases where extremes meet. The recollection is one we need most with regard to outward poverty, and the first warning we should give to a person who was trying to serve the poor would be not only that he must avoid looking for gratitude—that is true of all service, and hardly needs saying, though it needs remembering—but that he must be prepared for ingratitude. Many a noble life would be spared a bitter pang by the knowledge that the worst misfortune of need is its tendency to exclude the power of gratitude for its own mitigation. The discovery cannot be made without a shock. It is not that a man who has given time, and money, and anxious thought to the welfare of his workmen, and finds that at the first stress of difficulty they treat him merely as one belonging to a hostile class, was looking for gratitude: that is never the motive of one who really works for others, but the discovery of ingratitude rouses a question of the whole value of his service,—to what effect has he worked, if his desire to aid be not even believed in? The doubt is not ignoble, though it is mistaken. He is working to create the possibility of that grateful feeling which is a better thing than the outward advantages by which it is gradually developed. And the truth he needs to remember, though it is with regard to outward poverty we have most cause to remember it, is not confined to outward poverty. It is true of all need. The unhappy are ungrateful. Gratitude belongs to the temperate zone of the spirit. It withers alike in the tropic glow of unbroken prosperity and under the icy blast of arctic despair, it can live only where breezes alternate with sunshine, and the heart knows the meaning of a wish fulfilled, as well as of a wish disappointed. It is true that this is, we trust, the condition of the majority of the human race. Still, the minority is important enough to be constantly borne in mind when we think of gratitude. It is well to remember that the feeling is impossible to a large proportion of those we are tempted to envy, and a still larger proportion of those for whom we feel compassion. The happy and the unhappy, beyond a certain point, must be ungrateful.

We have pointed out the alliance of ingratitude with virtue, genius, and the extremes of good and evil fortune, not as an apology for it, but as an attempt to show that it is something against which any of us may be on our guard. Ungrateful, in the sense of seeing a benefit and not requiring it when we have an opportunity of doing so, most of us know that we are not, and we fail, therefore, to be alive to the many small claims for gratefulness that lie half hidden in the intercourse of every day. Human effort is so blind and so feeble, that much energy is given out in efforts at help that have had almost as little result as if they had aimed at filling a neighbour's cup in the dark; his thirst is unsatisfied, but the bottle is empty. It is a part of the general dislocation of aim and attainment that makes up so much human history in this world. The thing to which gratitude is due is aim, and not attainment. The young fail most towards the old,—innocently at first, as we have admitted, but not so innocently, on the whole, than an accurate memory of youth affords a painless review to any one. And then, again, if life continues, the old are apt to fail towards the young, though the ingratitude of age is a much smaller thing than the ingratitude of youth. But it is a more injurious thing. The young need encouragement, and never more than when they try to serve their elders, and it is surprising at such times how little gratitude is supplied by a great deal of love. A child's efforts to serve are often ineffectual and tiresome, but the most precious thing in the world has its roots injured when they are discouraged. And if gratitude seem too large and weighty a word for the father's smile and the mother's kiss when the book is found or the footstool put straight, that is exactly the thing we are complaining of. There is a thing that we want every day, that would more than anything else supply sweetness to average life, and we surround it with associations that make us feel it inaccessible, except at some crisis that comes, perhaps, once in a dozen lives. It is as if we treated sugar as our most precious possession, and had to take every meal that was not a feast without it, because to unlock the casket in which we had enclosed it were an effort too great to make more than once or twice in a year. And it should be a strong influence in driving us to make some effort to express thankful feelings in the trifles of every-day life, that the unthankful ones are sure to be expressed. Dissatisfaction, we may say, expresses itself. The natural impulse of human beings is to be silent about what goes right, and put every cause of displeasure into words. As long as servants do their duty carefully and completely, they hear nothing about it, but one detail wrong is a grievance. They should, perhaps, be distinctly told of a failure oftener than they are; but that should not be the only thing they are made aware of, and more often than not it is so. The habit of making a claim on others for sympathy in all our dissatisfaction has not always even the excuse that we are prepared to teach them to set the matter right. How common it is to hear the person for whose pleasure an expedition has been planned point out all the ugly features in the view, not the least in a spirit of ill-humour, but as an exhibition of his critical powers, while he leaves its beauties to be taken for granted! It is curious that it should be so much easier to say "I think that ugly," than "I think that beautiful," but there is no question that it is so. We all feel it cleverer, it is hard to say why, to discover flaws than merits, and with no tendency towards grumbling or complaint, the most natural form of remark will generally be found to be depreciatory. Perhaps that does not express the speaker's whole feeling, but it is the part of it that is easiest to put into words.

There is one reason why gratefulness should be made a conscious effort which may strike some persons as far-fetched, but seems to us a very real one. It is that Gratitude is the only virtue to which law gives no encouragement whatever. In a general way, we may say that disapproval, beyond a certain point, casts some shadow on the criminal code. When unkindness has gone far enough in the direction of cruelty, or untruthfulness of dishonesty, the legislator takes cognisance of these things; but a moral failing, which rouses more indignation than either, lies, even in its most heartless and revolting forms, utterly beyond his province. Ingratitude affords, indeed the most telling illustration of the truth that the sphere of morals and politics are not conferraneous, nor even concentric. Perhaps we might even say, with very little violence to the natural meaning of words, that so far as the law takes cognisance of gratitude at all, its attitude is a disapproving one. All grateful feeling, in the sphere of law or politics, becomes treachery to the State, and while the law interposes to prevent this sense of personal gratification being a basis of the relation between a constituency and its representative, it does not interpose to punish the offence against grateful feeling which the social code most disapproves. And if the law cannot urge us towards gratitude, neither can the person to whom gratitude is due. All high motives preclude such a claim, and a good many that are not particularly high. Pride comes in to aid humility here, as so often elsewhere; and good taste and a sense of the absurd are more effective, it is to be feared, than a true magnanimity. A quality that is so large an ingredient in the pleasantness of life, and is at so many disadvantages, should be cultivated by all the aid that can be given by education. And there is hardly any other in the cultivation of which parents might feel that they did so much for the happiness of their children. An average life to a thankful disposition becomes a happy life, for gratitude is one of the most delightful emotions the heart can entertain, and there is no life in which there is not some cause for it. And there are not many emotions more painful than the recollection of ingratitude, as most persons will acknowledge who have a clear recollection of their own youth. Perhaps we are not always just to ourselves, as we look back. It may be that if we could call back the teacher or parent from his far-off home, we should find that the acknowledgment, so faint and inadequate in our memory, had left on his an impression even of humorous exaggeration. But not even that contradiction, if it were possible, would assuage the pain of some memories of the patient kindness and wisdom poured lavishly on our youth, and recognised only in our age. Let us endeavour so to train our children that the pain shall come to them more lightly; in some degree and some form, we cannot save them from it, for it is the heritage of humanity.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE POLITICAL SCHOOLMASTER.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As a general rule, the Masters of our great Public Schools have, I think wisely, abstained from mixing themselves up with party politics. I doubt whether the departure from this salutary rule which I observe chronicled in the Harrow Gazette of last Saturday will afford satisfaction to any considerable body of Harrovians, whatever may be their political creed. It appears that on the 15th inst. a meeting of the Harrow Conservative Association was held at the Public Hall. The chair was taken by Mr. Cecil F. Holmes, an Assistant-Master in the School, and a J.P. for the county of Middlesex. The chairman commenced the proceedings by saying that the object of such meetings as the present was to give sound information to the working-men of Harrow on the leading political topics of the day, and after commenting, in the customary Tory style, upon some of those topics, he proceeded to deal with a speech delivered some days previously by the President of the Harrow Liberal Union, as follows:—

"He would now expose what the President called an instance of Tory misrepresentation, viz., that the 'Government were entering into contract with atheists and assassins,' which was the fact. Had not Mr. Gladstone given every sort of moral support to Mr. Bradlaugh, even to leaving the House sooner than to vote for his expulsion; and as to assassins—thanks to Mr. Forster—the infamous Kilmainham Treaty had been at last brought to light, by which Mr. Gladstone made terms, notably with one Sheridan, whom he knew was steeped to the lips in murder. . . . And how was this so-called 'misrepresentation' received by the Liberal Union, involving as it did such grave matter?—with laughter. 'Had the Liberal Union forgotten,' the chairman continued, 'the agony that Ireland had gone through ever since the Government came into power? Had any class or sex been spared—peer or peasant, farmer or labourer, landlord or tenant? Had not delicate ladies of rank been brought to the verge of starvation and the workhouse? Even dumb animals had been grossly maimed and ill-treated by savages, virtually hounded on by the Government. This was hardly a subject for merriment. For as sure as there was a God in Heaven, the blood of these murdered innocent people lay on the heads of the Government,—let them look to it. . . . The chairman concluded by saying:—The times, ladies and gentlemen, are very serious, and when in the Harrow Chapel I hear the prayer read for the High Court of Parliament, the words seem to fall with but little meaning on my ears, that the honour and welfare of our Sovereign and her dominions should be maintained, and that 'truth and justice, religion and piety, be established amongst us for all generations.' Could this be said to be the case under the present Government? It, therefore, the more behoved not only every Conservative, but every lover of his country, to be up and doing, and show what good stuff true and loyal Englishmen were really made of."

It is with considerable astonishment that I observe that this language was not only listened to without protest by a General Officer in her Majesty's Service, but that a vote of thanks to the chairman was moved by that gentleman, "in his usual polished and courtly style."—I am, Sir, &c.,

[A schoolmaster is a citizen, and has a right to his opinion. If, as in this case, it is a nonsensical one, that affects his reputation for efficiency, not his rights. Mr. Holmes, however, is fortunate not to live under a Liberal Dr. Hornby.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE CLERGY AND TOLERATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—May I state some of the reasons for which I hold that the present clerical and religious movement to defeat the Affirmation Bill is a serious mistake, likely, for a short season at least, to injure the cause of religion, and frustrate the intentions of those who take a part in it? It should not be necessary to say that civil or political disabilities consequent on the maintenance of religious or irreligious errors are entirely out of date. A man is plainly responsible for his faith or his unfaith to God and his own conscience, but in no sense to the State or general community. I do not deny that virulent and offensive blasphemy against the religion of the vast majority of the nation may be carried to such lengths as to call for repression, as a public scandal, injurious to morals, or incentive to breaches of the peace. But we shall all feel that State interference and judicial punishment are only possible in the most extreme cases. Any attempt to close the lips of assailants of existing institutions is not only incompatible with liberty of speech and action, but defeats its own end, by leaving an impression, on all uninstructed minds at least, that the cause of order is unable to defend itself, and therefore calls the arm of physical force to its assistance.

There are two conceivable theories of a Christian State,—one the absolute, that that citizen only is entitled to political rights who shares the faith recognised by the State, or that of the established religion of the country; and what I may call the relative theory, which, while it confirms the Church in the possession of her own, and recognises religion, yet grants full civil and political rights to all citizens alike. The latter theory is the only tenable one in modern Europe, and it is that on which we act. Therefore did we abolish the Test and Corporation Acts, and so admitted Nonconformists to all State privileges; therefore did we emancipate, and that most wisely and necessarily, the Roman Catholic and the Jew; and I am at a loss to conceive on what ground we can refuse the same simple justice to the avowed Agnostic. Should we refuse the services of a great Admiral or General in the hour of national danger, because he had the misfortune (as we consider it) to be an Agnostic?

Mr. Bradlaugh sees that he cannot prove a negative, cannot reasonably maintain that there is no God. He can only avouch, and does so, that the existence of God is not proved to his mind, and he further openly rejects the Christian revelation. So do other Members of either House whom we could all name, yet they accept the Oath of Allegiance as a decent formulary. They are willing to affirm their loyalty, or their submission to the Powers that be, in the name or in the presence of what is to them avowedly an abstraction. Can Churchmen or any Christians think that we can advance the interests of the Christian revelation, or promote the honour of our God, by enforcing an indefinite formula? The Positivist is perfectly willing to accept it, telling us plainly that his God is Collective Humanity. Another may say that his God is Anima Mundi, or the Principle of Life. Nobody proposes to enforce an orthodox construction of the word. Are not men fighting, then, for a shadow? Would it not be far more becoming for the Positivist and the Agnostic also to make a simple declaration, since, as a matter of fact and necessity, we are willing to admit, and do admit, both Positivists and Agnostics to the Houses of Legislation?

But, it is argued, Mr. Bradlaugh is personally offensive, on account of the character of his attacks on revealed religion and his moral teaching. The answer is, that Mr. Bradlaugh, like every other citizen, is amenable to his country's laws. Punish him, then, I would say, if you can, and if you will, on legal grounds. Nothing, in my poor judgment, could be more unwise, but that is not to the purpose; but, in any case, do not deny him his essential rights as a citizen. Though he is in the abstract, and that avowedly, a Republican by choice, yet, as living under a monarchy, he is willing to accept that monarchy. Wisdom and justice alike command us to take him at his word. By excluding him from the Legislature, we do our utmost to develop sympathy with him and his opinions. By drawing him within the bounds of the Constitution, we pledge him to some moderation of language and propriety of behaviour.

Why should the Quaker be allowed to affirm, and the Agnostic forbidden? Surely this is essentially unjust. But will the State cease to be Christian, because certain avowed Atheists or Agnostics find a place in the House of Commons, as they do already in the House of Lords? Surely the idea is preposterous. It is the moral sense of the majority which makes a country Christian or un-Christian. Thank God, the majority of our educated and thoughtful classes would rank themselves as Christians, and I almost think, I might add, as Churchmen. The chief danger to our institutions lies in the direction of well-intentioned narrowness; and this is true of the theological, as of the political questions of the hour.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE DUTY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

SIR,—I have never hitherto taken part in political controversy, oral or written, but I can no longer refrain from expressing a very earnest hope that, as you urge in last number, the Government may be able to face the situation without flinching. The mass of intelligent voters cannot constantly show in a palpable form the emotions by which they are animated. But I am confident I utter the feelings of very many quiet, educated men, when I say that I look on the present condition of Parliament with "silent ferocity."

Let the Government stick to their Queen's Speech, and—avoiding, if flesh and blood can, any heated words which might give a handle to bitter enemies—let them hold on like grim death, till they fulfil its promises. And yet, while writing thus, I am conscious how hard that may be. Three years of baffled efforts will try the temper and shake the pertinacity of any man, or group of men. And when I think of the treatment in store for the Prime Minister during such a Session of determined effort, I do so with a sense of pain and shame which words cannot express.—I am, Sir, &c.,

EMIGRATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I shall feel obliged if you will allow me to place a few facts before intending emigrants, in order that they may be able to leave their native homes with something like a feeling of security for the future. You may probably have heard that amongst the adjuncts of the London Samaritan Society we have separate means of having personally conducted parties taken to Canada, and thus, while adding nothing to the ordinary emigrant fares, securing to them a comfortable passage, conveniences on landing, an immunity from the "sharks" always attendant upon the unwary, and in most cases employment on landing. During the year 1882, we took over about 1,500 emigrants, chiefly mechanics, general and agricultural labourers, and domestic servants, I myself crossing the Atlantic half-a-dozen times, and in no instance have we heard anything but good report, alike from the emigrant and also from the employer. Our modus operandi is to meet the emigrants at London, or at the various stations between here and Liverpool, to see them and their luggage safely on board the steamers, and by special arrangements with the Dominion and other lines we have increased advantages in regard to berths, &c. For the comfort and safety of the domestic servant and governess class, a lady has kindly consented to accompany the parties gratuitously. My first personally-conducted party this year will be on May 3rd, and I shall be glad to give all information to intending emigrants, as to their prospects of success, &c. The advantages we offer are merely security of person and belongings en route, through and inclusive fares, reduced railway rates, and negotiations as to employment prior to and on arrival; but this has been vastly appreciated, as testified by the hundreds already taken out under our auspices. Our engagements up to the present are,—a party for Canada on March 29th, and every Thursday up to end of July, and on May 3rd and June 28th to be accompanied by myself. The object of the London Samaritan Society is to supply information and to make it safe and easy for those seeking new homes, and consequently your kind assistance is asked on behalf of those interested.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE CONNAUGHT EMIGRATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your very interesting article of March 24th on the question of emigration from the West of Ireland, you refer to an offer made to the Government to remove 50,000 persons from thence, and to settle them on railway lots in the North-West of Canada. Will you allow me, as the author of the proposal, to correct some misapprehensions you appear to be under as to the exact nature of my proposal?

I did not propose to take 50,000 persons "at once"—it would be physically impossible to arrange for their transport—but I am confident I could create an organisation which could arrange for their transport to, and settlement in, the North-West in two years, and on terms satisfactory to her Majesty's Government. Nor do I wish to settle these emigrants on "railway lots," but upon the 160 acres of free land granted by the Dominion Government to each able-bodied emigrant.

I do not expect each emigrant to cultivate at first anything like the whole of his allotment; but it is easy for any man to till enough land of his own to supply his family with food, and then, in the great amount of spare time he will have on his hands, to earn handsome wages, either as a railway labourer, or by hiring himself out to work on some of the large wheat farms which are springing up with incredible rapidity throughout the North-West territory.—I am, Sir, &c.,

GEORGE STEPHEN,

QUEEN VICTORIA AS GODDESS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—My attention has only to-day been directed to the article in your issue of March 17th on "Queen Victoria as Goddess." Your notice of the addition to the Pantheon may tend to produce the good results upon "even English electors" which you indicate, but, if it is worth mentioning, I may say that the wonder you express that this recognition of the Queen as a goddess has never occurred before is somewhat misplaced, for the deification is nothing new; indeed, I am inclined to think that we should not have heard of it now, if Serjeant Atkinson had not been greatly impressed by hearing for the first time what has been a frequent experience to many, though possibly among the tribe in Orissa referred to the veneration may have taken a more tangible form than elsewhere. Further south and west, I have frequently had occasion to enlighten the good people as to the mortality of their Sovereign; one instance particularly occurs to mind. Coming across a town of no little importance on the borders of Hyderabad, rather more than six years ago, the regard of the people for the Queen as a Devi (or goddess) was expressed to me by one of the most intelligent and respectable of the inhabitants, and the apprehensions that were entertained respecting the then recent visit of the Prince of Wales. Strange imaginings had got abroad, and I was not allowed to leave until I had left in this man's hand some little account in the vernacular of the district, correcting the prevalent ideas, and allaying their fears.

How the Queen will feel when acquainted with the honour done her depends entirely upon her knowledge of Hindu ways, and if she understands how readily a new god or goddess is added to existing ones, she will not feel very much exercised; the likelihood of the worship, if so we may speak, of the ignorant but profound veneration producing any political effect seems to me to be very remote, or, indeed, to misrepresent the attitude of the great unreasoning masses of the people to practical politics. There is a possibility of people at home connecting the veneration as goddess with the conferring of the title of "Empress;" I may add that the two things have no connection, indeed I doubt whether any, except a very few here and there, know that a more honorific title has been assumed who do not read English papers, and certainly the fact that our Queen is their Empress is not appreciated by those who regard her as a goddess. —I am, Sir, &c.,

THE DYNAMITE DANGER.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Within an hour of reading the article with this title in the last number of the Spectator, I have come across a passage in Dante (Inferno, c. xxi., ls. 55-57.), which seems so felicitous an illustration of the line of thought which you have taken, that it is, I think, worth while sending it on to you:—

"Chè dove l'argomento della mente
Si giunge al mal volere ed alla possa, Nessun riparo vi può far la gente;"

which I render thus,—

"For where the mind's clear faculty to see
With power and evil purpose doth combine,
No bulwark can from them a people free."

DIARIES AND LETTERS OF PHILIP HENRY.*

As to the value and interest of this rude but graphic self-portraiture of a man learned and able above the average, of exemplary life and devotion to principle, who lived through the Puritan Revolution, and, a Cavalier by birth and associations, lived and died a strict Presbyterian, there cannot be two opinions. It is singularly difficult for us, in whose days "no altar standeth whole," to put ourselves in his place, to see ecclesiastical matters and the relative importance of the greater and minor doctrines of the Christian creed as he saw them; but we can at least do honour to his consistency. In the maintenance of his principles he took joyfully the spoiling of his goods, he suffered gladly bonds and imprisonment, he sacrificed not only the hope of promotion—that he valued little—but also, what he valued very much, the official charge of the souls of those among whom he lived, and the privilege of attending to their spiritual needs. He was a favourite pupil of Busby, the foster-father of so many Cavaliers and High Churchmen, and, on his visiting his former master, after refusing to comply with the Act of Uniformity, the Doctor asked him, "Prythee, child, what made thee a Nonconformist?" "Truly, Sir," was the answer, "you made me one; for you taught me those things that hindered me from conforming." His account of his conversion is so characteristic, and the glimpse it gives of the great pedagogue so novel, that it deserves to be quoted verbatim:—

"April 14 (or yer-about), 1617. The Lord was graciously pleased to bring me home effectually to himself by ye meanes of my Schoole-master, Mr. Richard Busby, at the time of ye solemne preparation for ye Communion then observ'd. The Lord recompense it a thousandfold into his bosome. I hope I shal never forget. There had been Treatyes before between my soul and Jesus, with some weak overtures towards him, but then, then I think it was that the match was made."

In 1643, he became a student of Christ Church, but the Parliamentary Visitation speedily removed Hammond, Sanderson, Morley, and others, who would doubtless have greatly influenced the lad's theological development. In a vacation visit to London, he stayed with his father, who had an official post and lodgings in Whitehall, and was present at the execution of the King, "at the instant whereof there was such a groane by the thousands then present as I never heard before, and desire I may never hear again." His views of the Regicide may be gathered, among other passages, from the entry in his Diary on the anniversary of that event, in 1680:—

"My opinion is, with all due reverence to the law-makers, that there is no warrant or precedent for such an observation in the Word of God; there is of Thanksgiving days for mercies received, as those of Parim, but not of Humiliation days for sin committed, especially not after the judgment caused by that sin is at an end.—Zech. viii, 19; Heb. x., 2, 3. I saw the blow given, but abhor the fact upon every remembrance, yet like not the annual commemoration of it, though perhaps many good men do."

Philip Henry, it will be seen, shared to the full the over-

scrupulosity of the Puritans as a body. He might almost be described as a "Bible-intoxicated" man. He seems to need a Scripture ground to show that it is lawful to sing psalms in families. In the spirit of Bishop Bailey's Practice of Piety, he hints that the Great Fire was a judgment for the desecration of Sunday, too prevalent in the capital. He was once greatly distressed to find that his church had been, according to the precept of George Herbert, decorated with flowers. He observes his birthday as a day of mourning, because "the Scripture mentions but two that observed their birthday with feasting, and they were both wicked men;" but he does not wholly condemn festivities at a christening, because he recollects that "Abraham feasted when he weaned the child." One Sunday, he notes, "Bells rung for pleasure,—a sin." He mourns for the repair of the cross in a village churchyard. He cannot make up his mind as to the use of the font. He considers the rites of the Church of England at the burial of the dead to be but superstitious vanities, though he lends a too willing ear to strange superstitions himself. His attitude towards the arts is far different from that of the enlightened Puritan, John Hutchinson. In 1674, he notes, at all events without disapproval:—"Mr. Richard Hampden, of Hampden, finding a picture of the Trinity among his grandmother's goods, which fell to him and his sister at her death, for which he was bid £500, rather threw it into the fire and burnt it." It is, however, pleasing to find that, in some particulars, Westminster influence prevailed over the extreme rigour of his Puritanism. At Whitechurch, he once saw Heautontimorumenos acted by the children; "It may be some may blame me," he adds, "for being present, but I judged it both lawful and expedient to encourage, being desired." Towards the close of his life, he sends to London for the new edition of the Greek Epigrams, and he certainly kept up his Latin and his love of literature to the end.

As was the case with so many of his party, Philip Henry strikes us as distinctly deficient in a sense of humour. There are but few playful passages throughout the volume, and we cannot help thinking that the editor has robbed him of one of these. In 1685 he is represented as writing to his son Matthew, afterwards the famous commentator, who was then at Gray's Inn:—"I understand not where you dined; if with Dr. Humph., it was not well, for fasting, and especially going so into assemblies, may be very prejudicial to your health, ere you are aware." The passage, as it stands, is pointless, but Philip Henry no doubt alluded to "dining with Duke Humphry," a well-known proverbial phrase for going dinnerless. There are one or two other blemishes in the editing. At p. 243, through wrong punctuation and misplacement of a note, the diarist is represented as laying the scene of the battle of Edge Hill in Ireland! In 1665 he writes, under April 5, "Day of Humiliation for success of Navy against the Dutch;" upon which the editor remarks, "The Dutch had nineteen ships sunk and taken; the victors lost one." It need hardly be pointed out that signal victories are not, as a rule, the occasions of a day of national humiliation, and that this particular fast-day was intended to implore a victory, not to return thanks for it. The remark that "Thistleworth [i.e., Isleworth] has not yet been identified" shows a want of adequate research. Many of the editor's allusions to modern politics and the present posture of ecclesiastical affairs are better suited to a polemical pamphlet than to an edition of an historical document. In some cases, the minute details of the neighbourhood in which Philip Henry's life was spent might have been with advantage reserved for the local history which the editor has in preparation. But after all allowance is made for these flaws, Mr. Lee deserves our thanks for his labour of love in collecting and piecing together these fragments of a good man's autobiography, and for the loving and reverential hand with which he has set before us the picture of his half-forgotten ancestor.

Philip Henry's position often reminds us of that of the more moderate among the Non-jurors. That he had a conscientious desire to conform, and that he entered upon the conferences with Lloyd and Dodwell here described with a mind genuinely open to conviction, is clear from several passages; and by his partial conformity to the Church of England, he offended the extreme members of his own body. He sums up his position thus:—

"I do not conform to the Liturgy, &c., as a minister to read it, that I may bear my testimony against Prelacy. I do conform to the Liturgy as a private person, to hear it in public assembly, that I may bear my testimony against Independency, looking upon both of them as by-paths, the one on the left hand, the other on the right, and the truth between them. Three things I do not like in the Independent way:—(1), That they unchurch the nation; (2), that they pluck up the hedge of parish order; (3), that they throw the Ministry common, and allow persons to preach who are unordained."

* Diaries and Letters of Philip Henry, M.A., of Broad Oak, Flintshire, A.D. 1631-1696. Edited by Matthew Henry Lee, M.A., Vicar of Hanmer. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co. 1882.

Few of our readers will rise from a study of this book without feeling that it was well for the spiritual and temporal interests of England that the Presbyterians did not prevail. In that iron ecclesiastical system there was scant room for toleration, and many a passage in the diaries before us might be quoted in justification of Milton's complaint that "new presbyter is but old priest writ large." In 1670, Henry writes how one Richard Topping, after leaving the Church of England, had become a Quaker, "by whose persuasion or by what temptation I know not, but I imagine it might be through want and by the instigation of Butters." Himself a seceder from the Church of his fathers, he cannot imagine a change in a different direction from that which he had himself taken to be the result of honest conviction. Afterwards, he records Topping's death, "without repentance that I know of for his great apostacy from the truth, denying Baptism and Lord's Supper to be Gospel ordinances, expecting justification by a righteousness within him." Far different from this was the large spirit of toleration which, in their better hours, animated Cromwell and the Independents, and which, though baffled for a while by the combination of Presbyterians and Cavaliers that brought about the Restoration, was finally triumphant in a measure at the Revolution, and has since become a part of the fibre of the English nation.

Many of the chief historical personages of the time pass across the stage. An attempt has recently been made to white-wash Scroggs; and Jeffreys (who, by the way, appears as two distinct persons in the index) is here presented to us in a more favourable light than usual. He seems, at the assizes for Flintshire, to have expressed disapproval of the rigorous execution of the statutes against the Nonconformists, and to have had a particular kindness for Philip Henry. "He spoke with some respect," we are told, "of Mr. Henry, saying he knew him and his character well, and that he was a great friend of his mother's (Mrs. Jeffreys, of Acton, near Wrexham, a very pious, good woman); and that sometimes, at his mother's request, Mr. Henry had examined him in his learning when he was a schoolboy, and had commended his proficiency." A story is told of Monk—surely one of the smallest men whom the irony of fate ever chose to be the arbiter of a nation's destinies—that he died with cards in his hand, and that his last words were, "Who must have the stock?"

It must suffice to say that whoever masters this book will gain more insight into the course of the ecclesiastical and political history of the time than could be earned by the study of many formal treatises. But it is pleasant to turn from the dust and din of theological controversies, where the bandying of texts goes for so much and Christian charity for so little, and from the mire of political intrigue and corruption, to the idyllic picture of a good man's private life, in the sweet English country which our fathers knew, presented to us in Henry's diaries. It is a simple record of a family in which there is no waste and no want, where much joy is chequered with much sorrow, but where domestic purity and the fear of God sanctify alike the sorrow and the joy. It is a country and a life which have passed away for ever; but it is fortunate for England that she possessed, in an age when vice and corruption were rampant in high places, centres of light and virtue such as Philip Henry's household. A more attractive domestic interior it would be difficult to find in any age; and though the sense of beauty and humour, and the cultivation of an Evelyn, throw no glamour upon the page, yet the book that contains the record of Philip Henry's life at Broad Oak will have a singular charm for those who love the past, its pictures and its lessons.

SHANDON BELLS.*

FEW men could write verses more certain to leave echoes in the ear than did Father Prout, and Mr. Black has evoked a host of pleasant associations by the title of his novel, and struck its Irish note most skilfully by the mere mention of—

"Those bells of Shandon,
Which sound so grand on
The pleasant waters of the river Lee."

Master as he is of the charm of Highland life, he treats of Cork, and of all that is distinctively Gaelic in South Ireland, with a sympathy and truth which few, if any, modern and militant Irishmen can equal. He sees Ierne not as the stained field of corrupt and cruel politics and theological battle, but as St. Colomba saw it, when he wrote his beautiful farewell, and grieved to leave its "delightful" shores when he went "traveling over the noble sea to Alba of the ravens." Shandon Bells is essentially an Irish novel, though its two heroines are English maidens with whom Mr. Trollope might have been acquainted; and the hero, Willy Fitzgerald, for all his Norman name, is Gaelic to his finger-tips. The English girls with whom his life is bound up bring him and his temperament and his country within measurable distance of the London apprehension. The story opens at Inisheen, a fishing village, not of County Cork as it actually is, but of that dreamland, that Hy Brasil, or enchanted island visible in the glory of the setting sun, which exists for all true Gaelic hearts, so persistently that at last we strangers are compelled also to believe in it. Mr. Black never was more Gaelic than in this book, which is full of the glamour of style. His hero charms us by his distinction, though he is but a village innkeeper's son, and by his high-bred simplicity and sense of honour. He has the gifts of writing, of sympathy with nature, of sporting, of beauty, and of reverence, gifts ascribed to the legendary hero Cuchullin two thousand years ago. Mr. Black has bravely turned towards us the silver lining of the cloud that overhangs Ireland, and reminds us of qualities the defects of which are all that we have for a long time seen.

Miss Kitty Romayne, who had sung at the Crystal Palace with Tietjens and Santley, arrived during a professional tour at Cork, and by her singing of "The Bells of Shandon" she turned the head of the sub-editor of the Cork Chronicle, a fair-haired Apollo Belvedere, squireen and poet, with a winning voice and ingenuous blush. And Mr. William Fitzgerald and Miss Romayne plight their troth one moonlight night, in a fairy and stream-haunted glen, in a formula of which the Gaelic charm is characteristic, dignifying by a certain nobility of words whatever it touches,—

"Over running water: my love I give you; my life I pledge to you; my heart I take not back from you, while this water runs. Over running water: every seventh year, at this time of the year, at this time of the night, I will meet you at this well, to renew my troth to you; death alone to relieve me from this vow. Over running water: a curse on the one that fails; a curse on any that shall try to come between us two; and grief to be a guest in their house for ever."

Kitty's talk fired her boyish lover with courage and ambition to achieve success as a writer. He had made acquaintance by a salmon stream with Mr. Hilton Clarke, a London critic, who took a fancy to the fine young fellow, and was unduly revered in return as a more real hero of the Press than he proved to be. Reverence is a marked trait in the provincial genius, as indeed it is in most young Irishmen, before they have been driven to brag by English contempt; but Mr. Hilton Clarke must have marvelled at the innkeeper's son, who was equally at home with snipe and Gautier, crag-climbing and Baudelaire. Good-bye, sweetened with tears of love and hope, was said to Kitty, and the Inisheen boy reappears in Mr. Clarke's rooms in the Albany, suffering from a modest sense of his social inadequacies, when he finds that he is to meet a capitalist conscious of his purse, and the editor of the Liberal Review, Mr. Gifford. The dinner is well given, as are also the sparring of Hilton Clarke, whom Mr. Gifford had once described as "a sort of man who writes trios, parts his hair down the middle, and belongs to the Savile Club," and the great editor, whom his host snarls at as "fearfully in earnest." During dinner, in which the Apollo from Cork suffers the pains of education in caviare, olives, and other acquired tastes, Hilton Clarke starts his scheme of a weekly paper, for which he wants Fitzgerald's pen, Mr. Scobell's money, and Mr. Gifford's good word. It should be called Jeshurun, the great editor suggests, not without scorn, as it is to be suited to the use of "those who have waxed fat." It is to lie on the tables of "Sassietty," or Mr. Scobell will have nothing to do with it; and it would not be Hilton Clarke's paper, if it had not a flavour of French novel and neo-pagan art. Mr. Gifford lays lance in rest for each subject that turns up, tilting always on the side of a broader humanity than is conceivable by the cynic Clarke or the Philistine Scobell; and when Fitzgerald walks away in his company, the young man's head is rather turned by the honour, as he listened to the "vehement, combative, and occasionally brilliant and incisive talk" of the Liberal editor. His cup brims over when the great man tells him to try his hand at a review of a novel just then the fashion; and, full of zeal, he shuts himself up in his garret, determined to do or die as was ever knight of the tilting ages. The Scotch "penter," John Ross, who has his studio below, quickly makes his rough presence felt by singing, smoking, and grumbling, till an adventure with a thief, in which Fitzgerald helps him, makes a beginning to a friendship such as Mr. Black loves to describe. Indeed, John Ross is, perhaps, the least original figure in the story, however characteristic of the author. He has a rough exterior, but he is the mouthpiece of Mr. Black's ideas concerning landscape feeling and landscape painting. The rise and fall of Mr. Scobell's magazine are amusingly told. Mr. Hilton Clarke elopes with a fast fine-lady of the newest fashion, and Fitzgerald's unworldly honesty and high spirit leave him, after five months' sub-editing, with an empty purse and enlarged experience of how to cheat his appetite. His contribution to the Liberal Review fails of acceptance, and he is going the way of Chatterton, when John Ross rescues him, and renders to him the services which only natures tuned to the same key can receive from one another. As in all Mr. Black's novels, the moral tone is manly and good, and he is not afraid, in these days of uncertain sentiment, to describe his hero's agony when Kitty throws him over. Struggling as he is to make a place for his wife in the world, Fitzgerald does not and will not see how she is drifting from her first faith. It is not, indeed, till the end of the second volume that she resolves to "marry money" and throw over genius, and the study of her gradual and reluctant treachery is good. She is very feminine, and circumstances were hard on her, we feel, as she slips from the higher to the lower level of life. Meantime, a series of papers in the magazine in which sporting and poetry go hand-in-hand attract the attention of a charming and rich old lady, Mrs. Chetwynd; and notably, a description of a day's cliff shooting in the south of Ireland. Mrs. Chetwynd had lost a nephew, who had been like a most dear son to her; the fancy seized her that if her Frank had ever written, he would have written in the same style, and she had given him a small property on the shores of Bantry Bay, in the very country which had inspired Fitzgerald's eloquence. Though our prose-poet had come to the point of shabby dress, and a diet of cocoanut and new bread, he left a note from Mrs. Chetwynd's niece unanswered; but Mr. Scobell, proud that his writer's work should be appreciated in "Sassietty," insists on introducing him to the little, white-haired lady, who henceforth acts as fairy godmother, by the help and high-bred discretion of her niece Mary, who is tall, handsome, frank, and bright, as, for instance, the "Blessed Damsel" is not. She does battle with White-chapel misery in all its forms, and believes in sanitation, but not that it is the only gospel. Her aunt clings to older fashions, and declares "that a human life laid bare is more interesting than a frog's foot, or the question whether there is bismuth in the moon." With diplomatic art she engages Fitzgerald to read to her for an hour every afternoon, instead of her niece, and insists on making his salary one hundred, and before long two hundred a year. Here we get into regions of such improbable romance, that we can only suppose that there really is a Mrs. Chetwynd in the world; but the romance serves to accent the Irish traits, and to prove Mr. Black's power in catching the best and most poetic aspects of his favourite Gaelic nature. He skillfully contrasts, to their mutual advantage, Fitzgerald's ideas and feelings and the English customs and standards with which he has to deal. The love of dear old Mrs. Chetwynd for Bantry Bay, as the home of her dead nephew, represented somehow to her by Fitzgerald, keeps his sentiment warm, in presence of the masterful science and plain speech of Miss Chetwynd's allies. He has plenty to disenchant him. Never giving himself idleness, he wrote article after article, and found that the contributions best received were "not literature at all." John Ross's society saved him from the curse of disregarding the beauty of things, except as he could make money out of it. He will not "warstle wi' pigments," like his friend, but the poetry in him will out in unsaleable scraps of verse,—sparks of true fire from his heart, not yet heated to the consuming glow, however, in which his genius will be recast and strengthened. He will not see the growing coolness in Kitty's letters, till an Irish follower, Andy the Hopper, arrives, and speaks lightly of her flirtations with other men. Instantly he starts for her lodging at Cork, and only a trusting gentleman as he is could have misinterpreted the presence of her future, Mr. Cobb, of Liverpool. And so, with well-managed irony, Mrs. Chetwynd's offer to Fitzgerald to use her Bantry property as his own happens just when he receives a formal intimation that Kitty, unbelieving in his prospects, has married her commercial admirer:—

* Shandon Bells. A Novel. By William Black. London: Macmillan and Co. 1883.

"And now he had nothing to say about perjured lips, women's deceit, or anything of the kind. The wound had struck deeper than that. It had struck at the very foundations of his faith in human nature. Rather vaguely and thoughtfully, for these pictures of Inisheen were still before his eyes, he got his hat and stick, and went out into the mild, summer air."

It had required all Mary Chetwynd's fine tact to reconcile him to her aunt's plan that he should treat Boat of Garry, its horses, steam launch, and full establishment, as his own; but when he arrived at Glengariff, within a few miles of his new possession, nothing mattered very much. He is haunted by the ghost of his dead passion, which he dare not look at or lay. He reads "human sorrow and the tragedy of human life into every sight and sound that meets him." With a quiver at the heart, he forces himself to seek out the beauty of his surroundings, as John Ross had trained him to do. The sting of prosperous circumstance when the heart is sore is well described when he finds himself at Boat of Garry, thoughtfully welcomed and provided for by Mrs. Chetwynd's orders. An acquaintance made at the bright Eccles hotel gives him a letter of introduction to the editor of a great London paper, but even that fact had grown shadowy to the hard-hit man. Our readers can imagine the skill with which Mr. Black deals with South-Ireland scenery. Little by little, nature did its healing work, and in passages of beautiful description the author makes us understand how the Great Mother ripened the fruits of Fitzgerald's imagination by the storm and sunshine of his life. In a new series of London papers, and in records of sport, made beautiful by pictures of sea and mountain, cloud-land, wild-creature-land, and flower-land, he took all lovers of beauty by storm. By the deep power, not of joy, but of grief, he saw into the "life of things," and even Pall Mall was touched. Mr. Scobell thought he would take an Irish shooting, and men of science envied the gift of accurate observation. The writer was anonymous, but all recognised the genius; and Mary Chetwynd guessed whose it was, and felt, as none of the others did, that Fitzgerald was writing with his heart's blood, and must not be left without kindly companionship. Persuading her aunt to go to Ireland, the English ladies join the recluse at Boat of Garry, and gradually he is reconciled to his brighter fate. Even by admission of Mr. Gifford, his literary career is assured; adventures with a bull and in a steam launch increase his friendly intimacy with Miss Chetwynd, and the last bitter wave of regret is deadened by a struggle with a sea-trout. The example of Mary Chetwynd, who is a lovely sketch of serious girlhood, in Mr. Black's best manner, reminds Fitzgerald that life means work with all our power for good, and he rises from his baptism of pain his eyes cleared of love's mirage, but not insensible to love's truer enchantments. The book would not be rounded without a return to London and a dinner given by Mr. Scobell, at which Mr. Gifford and a popular R.A. who has taken the "penter" by the hand, not to mention seven millions sterling incarnate in six City guests, are collected in true London motley. The millionaires give the party that tint of opulence which leaves a reader gaping, and of which Monte Christo sets the fashion. A scene or two of East-End philanthropy cement the loves of Fitzgerald and Mary Chetwynd, but Mr. Black has painted so well the running water over which Kitty pledged her troth, that we do not sympathise with the filtered water and filtered politics which are accessories to Fitzgerald's second betrothal. We are bidden farewell by the London dramatis personæ at a private view in the "Bolsover" Gallery, where Ross's pictures have the place of honour, and are only second to the portrait of Mrs. Fitzgerald, in a "wall-flower and daffodil" gown. That the author's sympathies are with the glen of Inisheen, within sound of Shandon bells, is sufficiently seen in the last word of all by which he takes up the only link missing in his plot. Years pass, and Fitzgerald and his boy are by the fairy glen. While the successful man scrambles down to the place, never quite out of his heart, where he and Kitty had engaged themselves, a lady in mourning came to the carriage and kissed the boy, and hurried away. Fitzgerald knew that it must be his lost love, by the stir of his whole being. Then he turned himself manfully to the gleanings—plentiful, in his case—of that golden promise of his youth which Kitty had so wasted, and yet not wasted, since "knowledge by suffering entereth."

We have the less scrupled to reveal the plot of Shandon Bells, because the grace of its style and the artistically touched sketches of London life will lead the reader from page to page. But probably he will agree with us that Mr. Black's best title to his popularity is his glamour of "natural magic," and that he should find appreciative listeners to his idylls of the western coasts, the lands of sunset, is at least one good sign, in our perplexed generation.

THE EVIDENTIAL VALUE OF THE EUCHARIST.*

THERE is much that is striking in this volume, and there would be still more, if Dr. Maclear did not fall too much into the natural habit of believers,—which ought, however, to be carefully avoided by apologists,—the habit of seeming to be as much gratified at those deficiencies and gaps in the evidence which show that the evidence was not artificially manufactured and welded into a complete demonstrative chain for the purpose of producing conviction, as they are at those aspects of it which are really powerful and unanswerable. Now, it is all very well for one who has finally made up his own mind on the subject, and does not doubt for a moment that Christ is what he proclaimed himself, and what his Apostles thought him, to regard the weaker points in the narrative as helping to show that we have here no carefully got-up case, but simply an inartificially arranged statement of the sources of Christian belief. But that is not the impression which such weaker points can by any possibility make on the minds of sceptics and doubters, and it is for them that the apologist writes. It would, therefore, be far better that in writing for them, the apologist should take care not to be as much disposed to congratulate himself and his readers on the difficulties of the narrative, as he is to congratulate himself and them on those indications of reality and truth which are most impressive, and at the same time most unintentionally indicated. It is quite true that a frank and straightforward way of saying what at first sight seems anything but consistent with other statements, is a proof of the absence of all art, of the absence of all conscious desire to make out a telling case; but then this, of course, must produce a double effect on the mind of a doubter. If it convinces him, on the one hand, that the writer was not trying to make out an effective case, but was just telling what he had seen or heard, even though that should happen to furnish a new difficulty instead of a new proof of the truth of his belief, still, it must also be given its due weight, on the other hand, as introducing elements of inconsistency with the rest of the story which increase the difficulty of accepting that story as it is told. Apologists are too apt to ignore the latter aspect of the matter, and to keep our attention exclusively to the former. And thereby, instead of carrying conviction to the minds of doubters, they inevitably provoke the remark that apologists are never staggered by any difficulty, but take all the apparent inconsistencies as proving only candour, while they take all the evidences of consistency,—of the reciprocal confirmation of one set of facts by another set of facts,—as final grounds of belief. But if apparent inconsistency is to cause no difficulty, why is clear consistency to produce belief? And if clear consistency is to produce belief, why is not the absence of it to suggest doubt? Apologists should not forget that they write for doubters,—that doubters are not convinced, but impressed with the deficiency of the evidence,—and that therefore to take instances where the deficiency of the evidence is admitted, as proving nothing decisively, except that the writer is perfectly ingenuous, is to convey to the minds for which chiefly they write, the notion that they cannot even enter into their difficulties, or appreciate the force of that which staggers them and makes them hesitate on the frontiers of belief. As one illustration of what we mean, Dr. Maclear insists very justly that after the Apostolic account of the Resurrection had become generally known, no one would ever have thought of attributing to our Lord the saying that Jonah's existence for three days and three nights in the sea-monster was an anticipation of his own burial for three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, and for this very sufficient reason, that the Apostolic narrative directly asserts that he was so buried for only two nights and a single complete day. That is, no doubt, a very sufficient proof that the verse in Matthew to which reference is made was not likely to have been invented by an artificial compiler of a life of Christ, after the story of the Resurrection was known. But is it not also a proof that the so-called "sign of the prophet Jonah"—if it really depended on the story of the prophet's existence for a long period in the inside of a sea-monster—was not a sign of the length of our Lord's own interment in the earth at all, and that St. Matthew's language on the subject rather points to an error in the interpretation given to this saying by the first Evangelist (and given by him alone), than to any new evidence of the truth of the revelation? It is the same with other points which present at once, on one side, difficulty, on another side, testimony of importance. Dr. Maclear ignores the difficulty, or treats it only as affording additional proof of the ingenuousness of the narrative (which it does), and yet he rests on the testimony as fully as if there were no difficulty in the matter. Thus, he shows us how early in the narrative of St. John, our Lord anticipates the sacrifice of the Cross, and gives the sign of the brazen serpent in the wilderness as prefiguring his crucifixion, and the healing power it will exert over man; but when insisting, as Dr. Maclear does insist later, on the careful and gradual way in which our Lord prepared his disciples for the suffering and the ignominy awaiting him, he does not help us in the least to understand why that which in the Synoptic Gospels is so cautiously and gradually unfolded, is in the Gospel of St. John assumed, as it were, from the first, as the very basis of our Lord's discourse. Surely, an apologist who avails himself of both these kinds of evidence for his purpose should have at least acknowledged the difficulty of fully reconciling them, even if he could not have helped us to remove it. This is the only fault we have to find with this valuable book. It unquestionably suppresses several of the difficulties with which the sceptic must be beset, instead of frankly confessing them and so far as may be, trying to meet them fairly.

Otherwise, it cannot be denied that Dr. Maclear puts a strong argument with great power. He opens by reminding us of the question put by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, before the destruction of Jerusalem, and while the sacrificial system of the Temple was still in full force, whether if these sacrifices, so punctually made, had answered their purpose, they would not have ceased to be offered, because the worshippers, having been once cleansed, would have had no more consciousness of sin. And then Dr. Maclear remarks that in a thoroughly historical age this, which the author of the Epistle suggested as possible under a certain hypothesis,—that a great system of sacrificial ceremonies which had lasted for ages should cease,—did actually very soon come about. Within a single century, not only had this great ceremonial and sacrificial system ceased among Christians, but the cessation of that sacrificial system had begun to affect the religion of the Roman Empire itself, and on so great a scale that Pliny complains to Trajan of the alarming change:—

"The date of this revolution, I repeat, places us in distinctly historic times and falls within definite historical limits. What was utterly unknown in B.C. 12 had become notorious by A.D. 112. Let us contrast these epochs. i. On the sixth of March, B.C. 12, owing to the death of Lepidus, the Emperor Augustus was elevated to the chief pontificate. Successively emperor, censor, tribune, and consul he now attained the last of the great offices of the Republic, which remained to complete his functions as monarch of Rome. Whatever may have been his religious sentiments in earlier days, he had lately distinguished himself by his zeal for the maintenance of the religious system of the Empire. He had already erected or repaired temples on the most extensive scale, and had instigated others to emulate him in the same career. He had restored the ancient 'supplication' for the safety of the State. He had appointed the high priest of Jupiter. He had revived many solemn festivals. He had celebrated 'the secular games' as a grand sacrifice of prayer and praise to the gods for the welfare of his people. Now, however, he was the highest religious officer of the State, and the first occasion on which he exercised his new functions revealed the carefulness with which he intended to discharge them. A month after his elevation he received intelligence that his faithful minister, Agrippa, had died in Campania. He instantly hurried thither, conveyed the body himself to the city, and pronounced a funeral oration over it in the Forum, with a curtain drawn before his eyes, because the chief pontiff might not look upon a corpse. The punctilious carefulness displayed on this occasion he carried into every department of his office. Invested with the conduct of the whole system of religion, he superintended all the colleges of the pontiffs. He filled up the vacant benefices. He himself named the Vestal Virgins. He was initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries, and was the first to extend the range of his pontifical authority from the Capitol to the provinces of the Empire. As he surveyed the various dependencies of the Roman dominions there was nothing to suggest to him any important changes imminent in the religious system, of which he was the recognised head, least of all in the sacrificial ceremonial universally connected with it. In what quarter could the signs of such a change be discerned? During his eventful career the emperor had visited many lands, and had made himself familiar with the customs of many nations. His wars had brought him to Greece, to Spain, to Asia Minor, to Egypt. But wherever he had been, and whatever province of the Empire he had visited, one feature of religious worship remained uniform and constant. Whether he called to mind the famous temple of the Asiatic Artemis at Ephesus, with its hundred and twenty-seven columns of green jasper, each the gift of a king; or of Cybele, the mother of the gods, at Pessinus in Galatia, whose fame extended over the whole ancient world; or that of the Syrian goddess of nature at Hierapolis, the gold and silver of which Crassus had spent days in weighing; or that of Jerusalem, so lately visited by the deceased Agrippa; or, nearer home, the famous shrines of Greece, and the familiar fanes of his own capital; one feature of the religious rites celebrated from age to age had undergone no change, the ritual of animal sacrifices. In other respects the various nations united under his sway might and did differ as widely as possible. In this habit of sacrifice they were as one, for without sacrifice prayer itself was not considered efficacious. Now, whatever anticipations the new pontiff may have formed as regards the future, it may be taken as certain that he never for a moment anticipated the coming of a day when this feature of religious worship then so universal and so constant would have vanished as a dream. No augur or diviner had ever whispered the possibility of such a revolution of religious thought. No indications could be anywhere detected that such a change was 'in the air,' or that sacrificial observances had lost their hold over the religious instincts of mankind. ii. But from the year B.C. 12 let us transport ourselves to the year A.D. 112. During the interval much has taken place. Augustus himself no longer occupies the imperial throne. His successors have each in turn assumed the sacred title of supreme pontiff, and in respect to religious ceremonies have been careful to follow in his footsteps. The members of the Flavian family have not neglected the worship of their fathers, or ventured on changing any of its characteristic features. Trajan is now clothed in the purple, and the younger Pliny is acting as governor of the province of Pontus and Bithynia. Vigilant, laborious, and conscientious, personally attached to his imperial master, and resolved to govern his province as a philosopher and not as a soldier, he communicates freely with the successor of the Cæsars on such points as appear to call for his attention. Not, as Horace describes himself,

'Heaven's niggard and unfrequent worshipper,' but ever mindful of his religious duties, he had erected more than one temple on his own property in Italy, and in his correspondence with the emperor, we find him consulting his master on various topics of religious interest. Thus in one letter he asks of him the office of augur, that he may have the satisfaction of offering those vows in public for the prosperity of the Empire which he daily prefers to the gods in private. In another he solicits his advice as to the restoration of an ancient temple, and in yet another consults him as to the sacrifices which ought to be offered on the anniversary of the emperor's accession. But in one of these letters there is a complete change from all that has gone before. Instead of asking advice as to the erection of new shrines, he solicits the imperial counsel as to the mode in which he should deal with a new and extravagant 'superstition,' which had already caused many of the temples to be almost deserted, the sacrifices to cease, and the sacrificial victims to find few purchasers."

The explanation of this change is supplied by the rise of the Christian belief that Christ himself had become the sufficient sacrifice for the whole human race,—the sacrifice commemorated in the Eucharist, which was instituted before that sacrifice, in view of that sacrifice, and for the express purpose of reminding all who joined in it that that sacrifice was sufficient to cleanse every one who desired to take the life of that sacrifice into his heart, from all that heavy burden of sin which the sacrificial system had been intended to lighten. Here, then, insists Dr. Maclear, we have the clear evidence that one of the most striking aspects of the ancient world was altogether altered by the introduction of a new creed and a new rite,—which creed and which rite were utterly foreign to the prepossessions of the people amongst whom they were introduced, and could only have been naturalised amongst them by the deepest possible conviction of their supernatural origin, and the supernatural power they conveyed. The popular genius of Judaism was sacrificial, and this rite swept away the whole system of sacrifices. The genius of Judaism was national and exclusive, and this rite professed to be the evidence that a sacrifice had been offered which included all Gentile nations in its scope, no less than the Jews. The genius of Judaism was opposed to all anthropomorphism and to anything savouring of a human sacrifice, yet this rite professed to be the declaration that in the self-sacrifice of one perfect being, both human and divine, for the whole world, and by the purifying influence of his blood, the whole world had gained release from sin, if it would but avail itself of that release:—

"The celebration of this Rite embodied in a palpable form, and in a manner utterly unexampled before, the idea that the blood of the Institutor was effectual to produce consequences of inconceivable moment, even the forgiveness of sins, an attribute regarded as special and peculiar to the Supreme Being alone. Associations, again, the most solemn and august had ever been connected with the act of breaking Bread and drinking Wine at the Passover Eve Service, at the Passover, at the Sabbath Eve Service of the Synagogue, and even at ordinary meals. Uniformly it was accompanied by a solemn commemoration of the Supreme Being as the Creator of 'the fruit of the ground,' and 'the fruit of the Vine.' But the same Elements, which from time immemorial they had blessed and received with thoughts of thankfulness to Him, to whom belonged the 'Ineffable Name,' they ate and drank in memory of One who had passed away on His Cross of shame a 'very scorn of men,' and 'an outcast of the people.' Nay, more, though, as strict Jews, they had ever shrunk from the very idea of drinking blood 'wherein is the life;' though their great Law-giver had even made it a capital offence to do so, yet now they presume to drink wine as symbolical of the blood of a Human Victim, of One who had died not for their own favoured nation only, but in marvellous contrast to the stern exclusiveness of Judaism, for the sins of the whole world! What had the genius of their Religion in common with such a Rite? To what was it more utterly opposed than the idea of human sacrifices?"

Dr. Maclear remarks that such a revolution in one of the most deeply ingrained habits of the ancient world as this, carried out by the agency of a people to whose genius it would seem to have been most alien in its spirit, can only be accounted for by the truth of the story told in the Christian Gospels,—by the truth of the statement that Christ had for two years been preparing his disciples for his suffering and death, had been preparing them to look upon that suffering and death as life-giving, and had taught them, after that suffering and death had taken place, and after his resurrection, that they were actually life-giving. Dr. Maclear enters very carefully into Christ's prophecies of his own suffering and death, and shows that it is simply impossible to explain those prophecies, with all their minute gradation, all their apt framework of circumstance and local colouring, as invented after their fulfilment, except, indeed, by conscious and deliberate fraud, which no one now imputes to the Evangelists. All this, Dr. Maclear puts in a very clear and forcible way, and proves, we think, that the Evangelists reported what they believed to be within their own knowledge and what was in no way short of that which was absolutely essential to convince Jewish disciples of the meaning of the great sacrifice of the Cross. We only regret that Dr. Maclear sometimes takes as much credit for what is difficult and apparently inconsistent in the Gospel narrative as he does for what is convincing and persuasive in it, and thereby seems likely to make sceptics wonder whether there be anything at all in the Christian story which Dr. Maclear would or could regard as a stumbling-block to belief, and for which he would not be thankful as at least an indirect proof of the credibility and truth of Christianity.

CREIGHTON'S HISTORY OF THE PAPACY.*

THE Reformation is a term that may be used in several senses. It may be restricted to the actual revolt against the Papacy which led to the severance of the Teutonic peoples from the Roman Church, and so its history may begin with Luther's defiance of the Pope. A history of the Reformation thus limited might give us an excellent narrative of the great schism of the West, but would afford us no insight into the causes of the movement, or into the growth of the ideas which had been slowly maturing themselves long before they broke forth in action. Or, again, by the Reformation we may mean the great change in thought and feeling which separates the mediæval from the modern; St. Louis and Dante from Henri Quatre and Shakespeare. From this point of view, the revival of letters is but one factor in a great process of evolution, which includes also the whole development of Christian doctrine, and the historian who was determined to go back to the beginning would find himself engaged in an endless succession of causes, unless, perhaps, the conversion of St. Paul offered him a sufficiently marked crisis for a starting-point. We need hardly say that Mr. Creighton's scope comes between these two extremes. Whatever else the Reformation was, it was a revolution by which the ecclesiastical organisation of Western Christendom was broken up, and the central government of the Church lost control over half its subjects.

As his title indicates, he takes the fortunes of this central government for the main thread of his narrative. This method has the advantage of being at once more definite and less broken than any attempt to follow the development of doctrines or ideas. It places the historian at the centre of affairs, and enables him to direct his attention in various ways without shifting his position. He must, however, beware not to forget the main current of events, while engaged on the study of personal aims and diplomatic contrivances.

Mr. Creighton has chosen to start from the great schism of

* History of the Papacy during the Period of the Reformation. By M. Creighton, M.A. London: Longman and Co. 1892.

1378, which is a marked epoch both in the political relations of the Papacy and in the spiritual or intellectual revolt that was preparing. Of this latter movement, the leader and representative at the moment was Wyclif; and all his later biographers are agreed that with the schism began the period of his unrestrained antagonism to the Roman system. It is even more important that within a year or two he made his first direct attack on Church dogma, and by the publication of his heresies on Transubstantiation raised a question which (as Mr. Creighton says) remained the prominent one in the controversies of the Reformation movement. Although Wyclif left behind him no organised sect, nor even a school of disciples upholding his precise views, yet his teaching was a leaven which spread throughout the religious thought of England. Novel ideas often influence profoundly those who most strongly oppose them, and it would not be difficult to show that Wyclifism modified the views of the most orthodox and conservative Englishmen of the fifteenth century. Meanwhile, on the Continent, Wyclif's impulse was shown even more clearly, since Huss and his associates acknowledged the Oxford philosopher as their master. In whatever else they differed, the Hussite and Wyclifite movements were alike in being attempts at a lay reform of ecclesiastical abuses. The leaders of both were convinced that the hierarchy was hopelessly corrupt, and that the only chance of amendment lay in an appeal to secular rulers or to popular pressure. The experience of a century proved that their opinion was correct, but Europe was not yet ready to admit it. Yet the difference between heretics and orthodox showed itself more in the choice of a remedy than in the perception of disease. Nowhere are the abuses of the time exposed more ruthlessly than in the De Ruina Ecclesiae, which, there is little doubt, was written by the Secretary to Benedict XIII. Nor is this an exceptional instance. "Lamentations on the corruption of the Church," says Mr. Creighton, "were not confined to a few enthusiasts; men of high ecclesiastical position and of undoubted orthodoxy spoke openly of the abuses which everywhere prevailed." Indeed, the abuses were so flagrant that no man could shut his eyes to them, and they caused a reaction which was visible in the Parliament of England, as in the University of Paris. The culmination of all scandals was, of course, the double Popedom, and it was to amend this that the first efforts were directed. The attempt was made ineffectually at the Council of Pisa, and when that had only made matters worse, the general demand for a reform in head and members led to the Council of Constance.

When that Council came together, its most active clerical members, no doubt, sincerely hoped, as did King Sigismund, to procure a general purification of the Church, and such a change in the constitution and power of the Curia as would guard against the return of the old evils. Yet practically all that was accomplished was the substitution of one decent Pope for the three rivals who had been contending which should disgrace the Papal Chair. When farther reform was attempted, it became evident that the body of the Council was stirred by no such passionate earnestness for good as could overbear the jealousies and interests of its several members. Some were Cardinals, whose first thought was for the revenues of the Papal See; others, statesmen with political ends to serve; and even the scholars who had been most eager in demanding reformation, began to fear lest a purer system of patronage should lessen the rewards of learning. A few illusory statutes were passed, which would have been unimportant even if they had been observed; and with this lame result of three years' deliberation, the reforming zeal of Churchmen was appeased, if not satisfied. The last chance of any efficient action had been lost, when the election of a Pope was allowed to take precedence of constitutional reform; but there yet remained the possibility that the new Pontiff might share the aspirations of the Church, and might endeavour to carry out the desires which his electors were too weak to formulate. If any such hopes were entertained, they were speedily crushed. Martin V. was a Pope like another, regardless of the rights of National Churches, tenacious of all powers that could increase his income, and, above all, careful of his position as an Italian Prince. Thus men were driven back again upon the idea of Conciliar reformation, and it became impossible to evade the rule which had been made at Constance for the summoning of a fresh Council from time to time. The first, held at Sienna, was burked by the hostility of the Pope. The next, at Basel, seemed to start under more favourable auspices. Summoned unwillingly by the astute Martin V., it met under a new Pope, Eugenius IV., who had already discredited himself by foolish violence. Once more the leaders of National Churches had an opportunity which they failed to seize, for want of the wisdom that attends on a sincere endeavour to accomplish high and unselfish ends. It soon became clear that the Council cared more for asserting its own dignity and humiliating the Pope, than for any really efficient reform. Its best members lost faith in its action, and withdrew, rather than incur responsibility for proceedings which they could neither approve nor control. Only a rump of violent partisans was left, and the Council was utterly discredited. Its last resource, the election of an anti-Pope, served only to prove its weakness, and alienated more than ever the mind of Europe, which was not willing to see the one good work of Constance undone by the renewal of the schism. Henceforth, all hope of a peaceful and constitutional reformation was gone. A General Council, to which all had looked as the one instrument for amending the evils of the Church, had been tried, and had failed completely. The spiritual rule of Christendom was settled more firmly than ever in the hands of the Pope and his Court, and the only check upon them was the occasional self-assertion of the secular Prince. As is usual with unquestioned power, it was directed more and more to selfish aims; and the Popes, regardless of their high responsibilities, employed the revenues of the Church in extending their dominions or aggrandising their families.

For a moment, the fall of Constantinople thrilled the pulse of Europe, and it seemed as if a Pope might hurl the force of united Christendom against the unbeliever; but the faith which moved men to crusades was dead. Statesmen and monarchs had other preoccupations, and though we may allow that Pius II. was sincere in his advocacy of the enterprise, yet he was but a clever worldling, without a touch of the consuming enthusiasm which alone gives a chance of achieving impossibilities.

With the death of Pius II., this instalment of Mr. Creighton's work ends. In the slight sketch we have given of its subject, we have necessarily left unnoticed much that is of first-rate importance, as, for example, the war in Bohemia, and the attempt at union between the Eastern and Western Churches. Throughout, Mr. Creighton shows that he has had not only the courage to undertake an important work, but the capacity to qualify himself for its execution. Every page bears evidence to his command of his subject, and we see that without neglecting the older collections of materials, he has kept himself abreast of modern historical study, and taken advantage of recent researches, both at home and abroad. Moreover, he has not only read his authorities, but digested them, and the result is a book well and carefully planned, not a mere chronological arrangement of notes. In his judgment of persons, he is singularly impartial and tolerant—we may even say sympathetic—regarding his characters as far as possible from their own point of view, and always taking note of the better side even of his villains.

He has, perhaps, confined himself too closely to the actions of political leaders, and has dwelt too little on the waves of popular opinion or sentiment by which they were urged or controlled. Probably this is due to intentional self-restraint, and it may justly be said that an historian's business is with facts that he can verify, and not with ideas that may be the offspring of his fancy. Still, in a history of this sort we need some suggestion of the drift of popular feeling, and of the general tendency of affairs, or we are apt to be wearied and perplexed by the continual shiftings of political intrigue. We do not say that such suggestion is altogether wanting here, but it is on this side that Mr. Creighton's treatment of his subject seems to us defective. His style is generally clear and adequate, though with occasional blots which we would gladly see removed. These are most frequent in the introduction, where the author seems hardly to have settled properly to his work, but even elsewhere we occasionally get such vulgarisms as that Eugenius IV. was "a martyr to gout." Such slight blemishes, however, even if they were more frequent, could not seriously detract from our debt of gratitude to Mr. Creighton for a work which is a real gain to English historical literature.

SEVEN YEARS AT ETON.*

THE writer of this volume tells us that he will be "no moralist;" his book is to be "a holiday book." This it certainly is, if gaiety, good-humour, and liveliness are "holiday" qualities. We may say at once that a better book of its kind we have never seen. We have no knowledge of Eton beyond what has been gained by a pretty attentive study of its history during the last twenty years, but we recognise at once a picture which is as veracious as it is vivid. The Eton of the author's recollection is not the Eton of a remote past. Not twenty years have passed since he left it. The time has been just enough to mellow his judgments, without producing that strange haze, half-sentiment, half-forgetfulness, which often blurs the memories of our early days. A moralist he certainly is, even in spite of himself. He speaks his mind freely of men and things, and is quite the ideal friend of the Psalmist, who "smites friendly and reproves."

Now for some of the subjects of these recollections. Even at Eton, the work of the school must be allowed the first place. "To enjoy respectability," says our author, "a boy had need to follow one of the three recognised professions of dry-bob, wet-bob, or sap." This is putting the matter a little too favourably, if it is meant to imply that the third of these professions was on anything like an equality with the other two. The evidence which a well-known Etonian, by common consent a most competent witness, gave before the Public Schools Committee tended to show that "sapping" was looked down upon by the public opinion of the school. It might be the proper business of a Colleger, but an Oppidan who followed it was lowering himself. Doubtless, there was a minority that approved the better things which they did not follow, and our author, who does not pretend that he worked, except under compulsion, was probably one of them. Anyhow, he gives a prominent place to the school work, describing with much force and liveliness the actual operation of the system. It is a satisfaction to find that even at Eton there were masters who could make their forms do their proper work. The author had the unspeakable advantage—appreciated vaguely at first, but very distinctly afterwards—of being under such a master for a year. But it is abundantly clear that an exceptional skill in teaching and strength of character were required to make such a master, and that to these had to be added an uncommon steadfastness of principle, making him stick to his point in face of the odious comparison of his strictness with the prevailing laxity. Such paragons are not to be found every day, and no school can be in a sound condition where teachers of average ability and constancy of purpose cannot achieve a fairly satisfying success.

The subject of work naturally suggests the subject of punishment, and punishment at Eton very often meant flogging. Of this theme, we have copious and amusing illustrations. One admirable story, of which every one must wish that it were true, relates how a young fellow, just about to join his regiment, was condemned to the birch. His pride rebelled, and he left the school. But his father sent him back. When he arrived, he found the Head Master had started for Switzerland. He bought two birches, packed them in his portmanteau, and followed him; missed him at Geneva, and again at Lausanne, and finally, after an exciting chase, came up with him at the monastery of Mount St. Bernard. Touched by this persistence, the Head Master consented to his request, flogged him in the refectory, in the sight of the monks, received the customary bank-note, and presented him with Murray's Guide to the Alps as a leaving-book. Another good story has already been in print; nevertheless—or perhaps we should say, therefore—we venture to repeat it. A youngster (our curiosity is whetted by being told that he sits in Parliament) was told by his friends that fresh walnut-juice would render the skin insensible to pain. He followed the prescription, and anointed himself, ignorant till too late of its better known power of dyeing. But it worked in a quite unexpected way the predicted effect. Dr. Goodford "fairly recoiled" from the sight, when the boy was prepared for punishment, and was so overcome with laughter when the phenomenon was explained, that he could not or would not proceed.

Flogging naturally suggests the name of Dr. Keate, for whose memory, at least in the capacity of a Head Master, the author entertains but little respect. The punishment which he wielded with a brutal want of discrimination confused, as the writer truly says, his pupil's notions of right and wrong. Serious moral offences and venial offences against a discipline which was as arbitrary in some respects as it was lax in others, met with the same retribution, which became so common as to lose even its vulgar attribute of terror. In other respects, he was deplorably deficient. He contributed nothing, except it may be by accident, to form the characters of those who came under his authority. He could not keep decent order, with all his terrorism, even in his own form. Even the narrow scholarship of the school sank, while it was under his care, in a deplorable degree. Yet he contrived to achieve, and still retains, a fame which has been denied to men abler and better in every way. The grim humour which is the easy accomplishment of tyrants associates him with a number of excellent stories. And his name clings like a parasite to great reputations. He will be remembered as having flogged, with shameful injustice, it may be added, one of the greatest of English Missionaries, Bishop Selwyn; and of having come very near to flogging one of the greatest of English statesmen, Mr. Gladstone. On this occasion, the persuasive eloquence which, though the future orator was only fourteen, had begun to develop itself, saved him. Gladstone minor, as he then was, had omitted to mark down, as præpostor, the name of a boy, who happened to be a friend, as having come late into school. Keate upbraided him for a breach of trust. "If you please, sir," was the defence, "my præpostorship would have been an office of trust, if I had sought it of my own accord; but it was forced upon me."

In more than one amusing story, we find the laugh turned against this despotic wielder of the lash. One year, in which the floods were dangerously high, Keate, who was not supposed to know officially that there was such a place as the River, was compelled to acknowledge its existence by forbidding the Eight to go out. He heard that they intended to defy him. They had, in fact, hired a crew of watermen, dressed them up in their uniform, and covered their faces with masks. Keate ran after them, shouting, "I know you!" "I'll flog you all!" The men raised their masks, and the head master retired, not a little out of countenance.

That Eton as it was in the early days of this century, and as it continued to be long after, should have turned out so great a company of illustrious alumni is really much to the credit of the class which frequents it. Boys who found there very little education, even in the lowest sense of the word, contrived to educate themselves and each other; nor did any set themselves to this end with more energy and success than the young Gladstone and his associates. "Mr. Gladstone's Schooldays" is the heading of one of the best chapters of this volume. The writer gives us, indeed, a whole gallery of portraits, touched, for the most part, with uncommon skill, and with an art which contrives to be personal without giving offence. Many readers will be amused by the resuscitation of one of Mr. Gladstone's juvenile poems. It is curious that the author, who is commonly intelligent enough in such matters, does not perceive that it must have had much about the same intention as many of the pieces in the Anti-Jacobin. The last stanza of the poem, which was entitled an "Ode to the Shade of Wat Tyler," runs thus:—

"I hymn the gallant and the good,
From Tyler down to Thistlewood;
My Muse the trophies grateful sings,
The deeds of Miller and of Ings.
She sings of all who, soon or late,
Have burst Subjection's iron chain,
Have sealed the bloody despot's fate,
Or cleft a peer or priest in twain."

Thistlewood and Ings were hanged in 1820 for contriving the Cato-Street plot for assassinating the Ministry. It would be congenial to the good sense of Lord Randolph Churchill to ask the Premier whether he still adheres to these opinions. Lord Randolph, by the way, figures in these pages as an incarnation of riotous mischief, very amusing in a school-boy, but a little out of place in a politician of thirty-five.

The opinions expressed are for the most part so sensible, that we regret an occasional tendency to apologise for the insolence to inferiors which is one of the worst characteristics of Eton manners. Most readers of the story told on pp. 255-7 will sympathise rather with the unlucky tradesman, than with the young patricians who nearly killed him, for presuming to object to their breaking his windows. Of other fault we have little to find with a book which is uniformly entertaining, and often instructive. Before we take our respectful leave of the author, we would invite him or his editor to reconsider a very curious foot-note on p. 362:—

"Lord Francis [Hervey] gave promise of becoming a poet. In the Final Schools at Oxford, having to translate a difficult passage in Greek, he did it in verse. He had not time to do much, but what he did was so good, that he got full marks, and obtained his First Class."

If the examiners in the Final Schools, where no poets are taken up, can be so effectually propitiated by a poetical rendering of a passage, say, in the Ethics or the Politics, tutors and students had better alter their method of preparation without delay.

MR. WHITELAW'S SOPHOCLES.*

We have willingly given to Mr. Whitelaw's volume the careful attention which is the due of a conscientious and reverent effort to render worthily into English a great classic. The leisure which a schoolmaster's life affords might indeed—so small is the public to which such books appeal—be more lucratively employed, but scarcely more honourably or usefully. There is no such effective way of becoming thoroughly acquainted with any great masterpiece of language as by editing or translating it. The reader may be content if he comprehends his author, but the editor or translator must put this comprehension into a practical shape. We do not doubt that any class which may have the advantage of reading Sophocles with Mr. Whitelaw will reap the greatest benefit from his labours as a translator.

We find little or nothing to criticise, so far as scholarship is concerned, in Mr. Whitelaw's renderings. This is not the occasion to discuss passages of disputed meaning. We may find ourselves differing now and then from the translator, but he is perfectly competent to form and to defend his own opinions. The only positive mistake that we have found is evidently due, not to any defect in the Greek, but to his ignorance of the practice of horsemanship (an imputation, by the way, which most Englishmen will judge far the more serious of the two). It occurs in the account of the imaginary chariot race in which Orestes is said to have been killed. The original runs thus:—

“Κείνος δ' ἐπ' αὐτὴν ἐσχάτην στήλην ἔχων
Ἐχρυσέει δ' αἰὲν σύριγγα, δεξιὸν τ' ἄνελ
Ξειραῖον ἵππον εἴργε τὸν προσκείμενον.”

This Mr. Whitelaw translates:—

“And ever, against the pillar where they turned, Orestes grazed his axle, and his traces

The turning was evidently from right to left. To effect this, the charioteer, says the teller of the tale, slackened the pull on the right horse, and tightened it on the left or near horse. But the effect of this action would be to curve the near horse's body, and with it to curve, that is, to slacken, the trace, while the outside trace would be simultaneously tightened. The translator has, in fact, wrongly substituted “trace” for “rein.”

Of the blank verse into which Mr. Whitelaw has rendered the dialogue of the plays, we have to complain that it is unnecessarily rugged and harsh. Here is a specimen, from the Electra (766-787). Clytaemnestra has just heard the false tidings of her son's death, and cries,— “Zeus, what shall I say,—this is glad news to me,

Or dire news, and yet good news? Oh, 'tis bitter
That by my own calamities I live.”

Pedagogue. Lady, why does thy heart fail for this hearing?

Clyt. 'Tis dire to be a mother. Howe'er unkind
The child of one's womb, one cannot learn to hate.

Ped. Then all in vain it seems that we have come.

Clyt. Nay, not in vain. How shouldst thou say in vain?

If hither you bring to me proof of his death,—
His death, whose life from my life sprang, but he Would none of my milk, and from my nursing fled,
And lived an alien, and since he went from hence
Saw me no more; but called me murderess
Of his father, and with dire reckoning menaced me,
So that the kind sleep neither by night nor day
Covered my eyes, but still the tyrannous time
Seemed ever to drag me onward to my doom.
But now, for on this day I am rid of fear
From him and from this maiden, who, worse plague, Dwelt with me, sucking from me day by day
My sheer heart's blood,—now, now, methinks, in peace, Untroubled by his threats, my days shall pass.”

Here are twenty-two lines, and nine of them have eleven syllables (not reckoning those that have a superfluous syllable at the end), and one has twelve. Of course, some of the syllables it would be possible to shorten or elide. An occasional licence of this kind may be granted even to verse that is meant for reading, not for recitation. In genuine dramatic poetry, the poetry of the actual stage, it is still more common. But Mr. Whitelaw has exceeded all bounds, and has consequently made his verse exceedingly unmelodious. It is evident, too, that this has been done, sometimes at least, of set purpose. Why the wholly superfluous article, not at all required by the sense, and a positive offence to the sound, in the line,—

What kind of affectation is this, to spoil a verse by introducing a word which no one would think of using in prose? Must we seek for an explanation in the dedication of the volume, which expresses the writer's obligations to Mr. Browning? No student of the Greek drama, certainly no one who seeks to present it in English form, can afford to neglect Mr. Browning's admirable studies from Euripides. But much as may be learnt from him, he is of all masters the most dangerous for a disciple to imitate, as dangerous as Carlyle would be to a young writer of English prose. Again, even if we allow the dramatic licence to verse never intended for the stage, is this speech of Clytaemnestra's a fit occasion for its use? Can we suppose it to have been broken by passion? Not so. It is a long-meditated defence, for she must have often contemplated the possibility of her son's death, and was prepared to justify the unnatural calm with which she heard it.

We have said “unnecessarily harsh,” for Mr. Whitelaw can give us melody in verse, when he pleases. There is no fault to be found with this, from the opening scene of the Philoctetes:—

“Deeds now, not words; thine, to perform the rest,
And seek, not far from hence, a cave that looks
This way and that, whereof at either mouth
A man may sit, to feel the winter's sun;
And breezes cool in summer, fraught with sleep,
Course through the tunnelled chamber of the rock.
And lower down, a little on the left,
A springing fountain mark, if still it flows.”

Or this, later on in the same play:—

“O two-mouthed aspect of the cave I know,
Robbed, and without the means to live, to thee
I must return, and there beneath thy shade
My lonely life shall waste itself away!
And no winged bird, no mountain-roaming beast,
These shafts shall slay, but I myself shall die
Unhappy, and make a feast for these, whereby
I once was fed; they whom I hunted then Shall make their prey of me, and I shall render
My life a forfeit for the lives of them,—
Slain by this all so guileless-seeming man.”

This is smooth enough; and yet it is a passionate utterance, to which a rougher rhythm might have been appropriate.

The choral odes and recitations have been rendered into unrhymed verse, which follows the strophe and antistrophe of the original. There is much very meritorious work in this part of the translation. The language is often adequate to the beauty of the Greek, and is never quite unworthy of it. Mr. Whitelaw does not reach, indeed—who could hope to reach?—the exquisite music of Mr. Matthew Arnold's unrhymed verse, in his drama of Merope, but he has acquitted himself well; and he is here, as indeed he is everywhere, admirably faithful. Here is part of the joyous song into which, most unreasonably, but to the reader's gain, the chorus breaks forth, when the dark secret of Oedipus' birth is just about to be revealed:—

“Thy mother, O fair son,—
Some mountain nymph was she,
In fadeless beauty clad,
Whom Pan upon the mountain saw and loved?
Or her to his embraces
Did Lycias woo and win?
For well our pastoral lawns he loves!
Or else Kyllene's lord,
Or Bacchus, who delights
The mountain-heights to haunt,
Did some fair nymph of the Heliconian train
(His playmates best-beloved)
Leave on the hills his babe for him to find?”

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Epics and Romances of the Middle Ages. Adapted from the work of Dr. W. Wagner by M. W. Macdowall, and edited by W. S. W. Anson. (Sonnenschein.)—Among the legends collected in this volume, some of the most interesting are those which the great sound-poet whom Germany and the Western world have lately lost chose for the speech-substance of the wonderful creations in which, for the first time in the annals of art, the eye, the ear, and the mind were sought to be moved to simultaneous and adequate comprehension of the beautiful, as perceived by the intellect and the intellectual senses. The legends themselves call for no particular remark. They are fairly well told, and adequately represent the original stories as given by Dr. W. Wagner in the work from which they are adapted. On the whole, they are less interesting than those contained in Mr. Anson's former volume, “Asgard and the Gods,” but the story of the Nibelungs, the tale of Sigurd's daring, of Gudrun's love, and Regin's falsehood, bears repetition, even after the wonderful alliterative and rhymed verse in which Mr. Morris's genius has cast them. Of the Carolinian and Arthurian legends, the treatment is somewhat meagre; and in the version of "Tannhäuser," which closes the volume, we miss much of the intrinsic grace and charm of that poetic myth. The book is well got-up, and amply illustrated; some of the woodcuts are full of spirit, and of the indefinable chill and weird gloom, of the sense of pain and conflict, rather than of joy and hope, characteristic of Northern folk-lore.

Valentina: a Sketch. By E. C. Price. (Chatto and Windus.)—This is a remarkable story, with one great defect, which prevents it from taking the high place among recent works of fiction to which it would otherwise be entitled. This defect is the repetition of the device by which the hero of the story, a very attractive person, in spite of his fatal indecision, twice over loses his chance of marrying Valentina. The strain on probability is too great, especially as the characters and the other incidents are all kept within the bounds of good sense, good taste, and moderation, with truly artistic skill. There is a great deal of merit of a rare and delightful kind in the story, the unfortunate heroine is a charming creature, her gentle waywardness, her sweet impulsiveness, her faultless refinement, combining with her bright originality, to make her fascinating to the reader almost to the point of pain, for one shrinks from contemplating Valentina in the ruthless hands of her tormentor. From the first, we know the end must be tragic; such a girl as the author puts before us with really vital and vivid force is not of the "staying" kind, in the race of life. There is no silliness, no sentimentality, but much feeling and passionate pain in the story; while the pathos and realism of the brief episode of Valentina's first marriage, and poor "Billy's" death, the girl's entire ignorance of her kind and indulgent husband's state, and her unintentional exactingness, are quite admirable. We cannot say anything about Valentina, so well as the author has said the following, putting the words into the mouth of the sister of the poor girl's faithful, unrewarded lover:—"Her story is one of those which people reading it would call unnatural, as well as sad. It is like some of the saddest of the old tales, where a man falls in love with a goddess, or a mermaid, or a fairy, and giving his life up to her who has no use for it, walks on earth as if he was in a dream. From all I have ever heard of her, and all her picture says, this woman must have been like one of those enchanting, irresponsible beings from a borderland."

Snakes: Curiosities and Wonders of Serpent Life. By Catherine C. Hopley. (Griffith and Farran.)—Miss Hopley gives us in her introduction an almost pathetic account of the difficulties which she encountered in inducing the publishers to favour her effort to write about snakes. They represented the prejudices of the public, which was unwilling, they were sure, to read anything about creatures so hideous and alarming. But the tide, it seems, is turning, and we may even expect to find the fancy, once so eccentric, of keeping snakes for pets, becoming general. Miss Hopley's interesting book should certainly recommend the creatures with which it deals to the notice of the curious. She has studied the literature of the subject, and she has watched to good effect the fine collection of ophidians which the London Zoological Society possesses. The skilful illustration of scientific description by these personal experiences is a specially attractive feature of the book. What Miss Hopley has seen herself is naturally supplemented by what she has heard from the intelligent men who act as keepers to the serpents. Very curious things these men sometimes see; as, for instance, the swallowing of a rat-snake, some eight or ten feet long, by a python. The rat-snake fastened on a rabbit which was meant for the python. The python also began to eat, and when he came to the rat-snake, swallowed him also. Fortunately, a keeper observed the transaction before it was completed. Only a foot was left, when the keeper seized the python and made it open its mouth, an assistant pulling meanwhile at the victim. The victim was removed without injury, and immediately showed its vitality by swallowing a rat. We hope that any lingering prejudices on the part of the public will disappear under the influence of this charming volume. People may, at all events, read about snakes, even if they cannot get as far as watching, much less keeping them. We must confess for ourselves that we have not yet reached Miss Hopley's height of philosophy, and could not contemplate the swallowing of singing finches by her favourites.

How to Decorate Our Ceilings, Walls, and Floors. By M. E. James. (George Bell and Sons.)—This useful and tasteful manual of instructions has the merit of proposing "arrangements" which are within the reach of householders of moderate incomes. In the main, we agree with the author's theories, and like his suggestions, but there is always the dreary difficulty of the smoke in the way of the piquant prettiness with which he would invest our sombre houses, and we can hardly help admitting a fatally recurring, despondent conviction that, on the whole, it is better to leave things so that the dirt may show least, and mix most pleasantly with surfaces. To those who can shake off this despondency, we recommend the precepts of Mr. (or Mrs. or Miss) James.

Rebecca; or, a Life's Mistake. By R. Dansey Green Price. (Roworth and Co.)—This is a story of how a Welsh gentleman of blood and estate wooed and wedded a Welsh peasant girl, whose brother was a "Rebecca," and "wanted" for a desperate salmon-poaching affray; how the romantic marriage did not quite "do," on account of the perverse and narrow views of society, so that the pair (to do them both justice, unrepentant) retired to Auckland, New Zealand, there to live happy ever afterwards. The simplicity and good-faith of the writer, whose notions of literary composition are elementary, disarm criticism as much as his humility deprecates it. We do not find it easy to understand why, feeling himself incompetent to write a story, as he freely admits, he should have made the attempt. The only motive that appears on the surface is Mr. Price's desire to dedicate a book to the Rev. Lister Venables, and we can hardly admit this to be an adequate justification.

Political Economy Examined and Explained. By Arthur M. Smith. (Williams and Norgate.)—"The Free-trade theory is constructed upon an egoistic system for producing idleness, instead of being, like Protection, founded upon an altruistic system for increasing labour." This is one of Mr. Smith's most characteristic utterances of the theoretic kind; his practical policy seems to be included in the recommendation to the Conservative party to introduce protection into Ireland. This is a novel panacea, but it is not so amazing as the suggestion of Lord Randolph Churchill posing as an enthusiastic altruist, with his proposition for adding twenty millions or so to the incomes of the landlords by imposing duties on imports.

Handbook of the Jones Collection in the South Kensington Museum. (Chapman and Hall.)—This handbook is a perfect piece of work. It is thoroughly satisfactory, full, agreeably written, instructive without being pedantic, and as pleasant as a story. It is to be regretted that it costs too much to be within the reach of the very class to whom it would be most valuable, the working-men, who might see in the costly and beautiful objects bequeathed by Mr. Jones to the nation what great things have been done by handicraftsmen, as well as designed by artists. There are materials in this very interesting Handbook for a series of popular lectures, to the address of the artisans. Why should not some Jones Collection conferences be given in the course of the summer? We entirely share the view of the accomplished compiler of the Handbook about letting it be known how costly many of the objects were. It may be inelegant, unæsthetic; but it is eminently natural, to like to know what things cost.

This Work-a-Jay World: Thoughts for Busy People. By E. Wordsworth. (Hatchards.)—This sound, excellent little book—a reprint of short lectures to girls in factories and other centres of industry—is described by its author as "a humble attempt to aid those who live in this work-a-day world not merely to look beyond it, but to look into it." The purpose and the execution are alike admirable.

Faithful to the End: the Story of Emil Cook's Life. Adapted from the French by Louise Seymour Houghton. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—There is too much gush about this biography of a good, pious, and eminent man. It has the fault of the French pietistical school,—over-unctuousness. M. Emil Cook was a French Methodist preacher, who led a most useful and exemplary life, underwent many trials, and did a great deal of good, especially during the period of the Commune in Paris in 1871. He appears to have been singularly free from the exaggerated and over-emotional tone which has unfortunately been lent to this memoir of him. The adapter has done her work with better will than judgment, and if the chapter-headings are of her own application, we cannot compliment her on them; we do not think M. Emil Cook would on his own account have borrowed so freely from St. Paul.

Dr. White has added to his series of "Grammar-school Texts" the Epodes and Carmen Seculare of Horace. (Longmans.)—The difficulties of the Epodes can scarcely be met in an adequate way by the vocabulary which Dr. White appends to his editions; nor indeed are they, however presented by an editor, suitable reading for grammar-schools, though they are interesting to older students. Dr. White has expurgated them, but not, in our judgment, sufficiently. The eleventh epode might very well have disappeared, and the fifteenth contains at least one gross passage which offends against the debita pueris reverentia. Familiarity with the Classics seems sometimes to produce a curiously hardening effect on the minds of editors.—We commend to the notice of teachers a very useful little manual, A Select Vocabulary of Latin Etymology, by W. H. Williams, M.A. (T. and T. Clark, Edinburgh.) It is a volume of unpretending size, but full of well chosen and useful information.

Saint and Sybil. By Mrs. Pirkis. (Hurst and Blackett.)—Mrs. Pirkis improves; she writes more carefully, and sees her people more plainly than she did at first. There are fewer violent delights in this novel, and consequently a less imperative demand for violent ends. The story is interesting, and the characters are sympathetic.

NOVELS.—After Long Grief and Pain. By "Rita." 3 vols. (Tinsley Brothers.)—These three volumes contain three tales, a fact of which we have no warning on the title-page. This is better, perhaps, than if the first had been spun out till it filled the three,—a feat quite, we should say, within the writer's capacity. But then the reader should be warned. Everything about the three stories seems very familiar. The ornaments of style may be very fine, but they are certainly not new. Surely we have read before how "the great stars shone above us in the blue width of the stretching heavens, and the white moon hung like a silver lamp in the midst of a cloudless sky"? Then the machinery of the stories is certainly old. How often have we been asked to pity the heroine who is called upon to save a bankrupt father or a felonious brother by marrying the man whom she does not love, while she is separated from the man of her heart by letters intercepted, or even forged! As for the scene, full of passion that does not go beyond the limits of virtue, in which the true lovers bid an eternal farewell, the printers might almost keep it in type. "Rita's" facile pen might, if we remember accurately her previous work, be better employed than in making up again these well-worn materials.—Great Grandmother's Days; a Tale of the Irish Rebellion. By Eleanor L. de Butts. (Remington.)—There is no lack of interest in this story. Such a struggle as that of the Irish Rebellion of 1798 suggests to this tale-writer genuine elements of tragedy. Here we have brothers fighting on different sides, and a woman loving against her will one whom she believes to be an enemy of her country. Miss De Butts makes a skilful use of good materials, and constructs a really interesting tale.—A Noble Name. By B. H. Buxton and W. W. Fenn. 3 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—The longer tale, occupying the first and second of the three volumes, was the joint work of Mrs. Buxton and Mr. Fenn. There is little to be said about it. The surprise which breaks upon us at the end of the first volume is one which practised novel-readers will have anticipated, and the dénouement is according to rule. Meanwhile, the story is worked out with fairly satisfactory skill. There is something pathetic about the helplessness of poor, blind Philip, and the heroine, Lina, is as interesting as the average of her kind. The short tales which occupy the third volume are the work of Mr. Fenn, and do credit to his pen. There is little that is new about them, indeed, we are reminded more than once of well-known narratives; but they are certainly readable, and, now and then, even striking. Of the last, "The Boat-house on the Island," we would remark that the details of a ghost-story ought to be scrupulously exact, and that a dish of trout was not a likely dish to be found on the table of a house on the upper Thames in the month of October. The weirdness of the story "The Whisper in the Wood" is marred by the thought that there was no real necessity for the dead man's spirit to take so much trouble about the missing will. The Courts would certainly have granted probate where there was an existing copy, and the lawyer who drew it still alive to testify how the original had been lost.—The City of Three Spires. (Bemrose and Sons.)—A marriage entered upon otherwise than with the benediction of the Church—resulting in the lack of grace and guidance in fulfilling its duties in the training of a family—is the great lesson of the tale." It turns out that the unlucky couple were not guilty of the enormity of being married in a registry office. The ceremony was performed by a deacon, when it should have been performed by a priest. We cannot recommend the author to persist in the business of tale-writing, but she might compose a successful little book on the Thirty-nine Articles. The twenty-fifth article, "Of the Sacraments," is manipulated in the "non-natural-sense" direction with much courage. (Vol. I., 281-2.)

SPECTACLES V. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection, generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." The Rev. Oscar J. Thorpe, M.A., of Christ's Church, Cambridge, writes:—"Mrs. Thorpe has been greatly benefited from the use of your Spectacles; they cool and rest the eye, and, in consequence, the brain, and thereby the tendency to severe headache from which she has long suffered have been lessened." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age (82). I can now read the smallest type, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. ROWLANDS'

ODONTO.

Has been celebrated for more than half a century as the best, purest, and most fragrant preparation for the teeth ever made; it whitens and preserves the teeth, imparts to them a pearl-like whiteness, strengthens the gums, and gives a pleasing fragrance to the breath. Health depends in a great measure upon the soundness of the teeth, and all dentists will allow that neither washes nor paste can possibly be as efficacious for polishing the teeth, and keeping them sound and white, as a pure and non-gritty tooth powder; such Rowlands' Odonto has always proved itself to be. THE GROCERS' COMPANY.

SCHEME for ENCOURAGEMENT of ORIGINAL RESEARCH in SANITARY SCIENCE.

With a view to encourage the making of exact researches into the Causes of important Diseases, and into the means by which they may be prevented or obviated, the Grocers' Company have adopted a Scheme under which they propose to offer for competition three Research Scholarships, each of the value of £250 per annum, tenable for one year with eligibility for reappointment. The Court of the Company intend to appoint to Two of these Scholarships in May next, and persons who may wish to offer themselves as candidates for appointment at that time are invited to make their applications not later than the last day of April. The Scholarships are open only to British subjects under the age of 35. Applications must be by letter, addressed to the Clerk of the Grocers' Company, Grocers' Hall, London, E.C., from whom in the meantime particulars as to the conditions of the Appointments can be obtained on written application.

Under the same Scheme, and with the same object in view, the Grocers' Company also propose to offer for competition, once in every four years, a Discovery Prize of the value of £1,000. The Prize is to be open to universal competition, British and Foreign. In the month of May next, the Court of the Company will announce the subject proposed for the first competition, which is to terminate at the end of 1883; and at the time of announcing the subject, they will announce the full conditions of the competition. Meanwhile, such of the conditions as are hitherto settled will be communicated by the Clerk of the Company, on request made as above.

So far as the administration of the Scheme will involve scientific considerations, the Court of the Company propose to act with the advice of a Committee of eminent scientific men, and the following gentlemen have kindly consented to form the first Committee:—John Simon, C.B., F.R.S., John Tyndall, F.R.S., John Burdon Sanderson, M.D., F.R.S., and George Buchanan, M.D., F.R.S.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

MR. CHILDERS made a very interesting and clear Budget statement on Thursday night, the first interest of which was in its striking exposition of the remarkable decline in the consumption of alcoholic drinks, of the remarkable growth in the normal expenditure on Army and Navy, and of the relative achievements of the Conservative and Liberal Governments in paying off and contracting Debt. His proposal, which is to involve no immediate burden, for using the £5,000,000 odd of terminable annuities which fall-in in 1885 for the gradual extinction,—when spread over twenty years,—of £172,000,000 of Debt, was the most important feature of his speech. He leaves £800,000, also falling-in in 1885, for the reduction of taxation. Mr. Childers further proposes to take off the additional 1½d. of Income-tax imposed to cover the cost of the Egyptian expedition; he provides the cost of reducing the lowest price of telegraphing to sixpence; he reduces the duty on silver, and makes arrangements for its abolition, by extinguishing gradually the stocks that have paid duty on which a drawback would be demanded; he takes off the railway-passenger duty for all fares under one penny a mile, conditioning in return for accommodation for this class of passengers; and he sacrifices a trifle on tobacco for fiscal objects.

The Revenue accounts for last year, 1882-3, were as follows :—

	Estimates (as modified in July).	Receipts.
Customs	£19,300,000	£19,657,000
Excise	27,230,000	26,930,000
Stamps	11,145,000	11,841,000
Land-tax and House-duty...	2,775,000	2,800,000
Income-tax	11,662,000	11,900,000
Post Office and Telegraphs	8,800,000	9,010,000
Crown Lands	380,000	380,000
Interest on Advances.....	1,180,000	1,218,845
Miscellaneous	4,725,000	5,267,611
Total	£87,197,000	£89,004,456

—showing a surplus of actual over estimated revenue of £1,807,456. The total estimated expenditure (including the Supplementary Estimates) was £89,906,000; but the actual expenditure had fallen short of this, and reached only £88,906,000, and subtracting this from the actual revenue of £89,004,456, the surplus for the year past was £98,456, after paying the whole expense of the Egyptian Expedition out of the revenue of the year.

For the current year, Mr. Childers's estimates were as follows :—

Estimate of Expenditure.—1883-84.		Estimate of Revenue.—1883-84.
Consolidated Fund	£31,319,000	Customs	£19,750,000
Army	15,607,000	Excise	2,400,000
Indian Charges	1,730,000	Stamps	11,510,000
Navy	10,257,000	Land-tax	1,040,000
Civil Service	17,753,000	House-duty	1,785,000
Customs	2,275,000	Income-tax (at 6½d.)	12,400,000
Post Office	4,124,000	Post Office	7,400,000
Telegraphs	1,518,000	Telegraphs	1,750,000
Packet Service	706,000	Crown Lands	380,000
		Interest, &c., on Advances	1,185,000
		Miscellaneous	4,380,000
	£85,789,000		£88,480,000

That would give £2,691,000 surplus, of which Mr. Childers disposes as follows:—

1½d. off the Income-tax	£2,185,000
Extra for Telegraph Service	170,000
Partial Repeal of the Silver Duty	10,000
Railway Passenger Duty	135,000
Tobacco Duty	1,000

—which, deducted from £2,691,000, leaves an estimated surplus of £240,000.

More discoveries of dynamite have been made this week. The police on Thursday arrested a young man, named Norman, at a hotel in the Strand, who had in his possession $1\frac{3}{4}$ cwt. of nitro-glycerine, so pure that its force would be equal to that of a ton and a half of gunpowder. He maintains that he did not even know what the stuff was. They subsequently arrested a second man, named Wilson, in Nelson Square, Blackfriars, and a companion named Gallagher, the two possessing between them some £900, partly in American notes. They also were in possession of the liquid explosive. A fourth, named Dalton, has also been seized, and it is believed that this arrest is of the last importance, and that the police will now be able to track out the whole conspiracy. As a beginning, they have arrested one Whitehead in Birmingham, whose rooms were found to constitute a regular factory of nitro-glycerine. This man is believed not to be a Fenian, but a man who sells his knowledge of chemistry to the Secret Societies. It has been found necessary, among other precautions, to increase the rigour of watchfulness over Windsor Castle, which is threatened. Sir W. Harcourt stated on Thursday that the newspaper accounts were correct, and that he intended at once to propose alterations in the law affecting explosives. Not the least alarming part of the affair is the entire recklessness with which the accused appear to carry their explosives about. Wilson's stock would have laid Nelson Square in ruins. The accused are of superior education.

There has been a great deal of correspondence this week about the Tory leadership,—commencing with a manifesto of Lord Randolph Churchill's in last Monday's Times, in which he bitterly condemns the management of the Tory Party in the House of Commons,—more especially, if we understand him rightly, the action of Sir R. Cross, Mr. W. H. Smith, and such of Sir Stafford Northcote's lieutenants as sometimes take up Sir Stafford's authority when he himself is absent,—and makes a strong appeal for more active leadership, and for leadership conceived in the spirit of Lord Salisbury, to whom he attributes the "English" habits of mind most useful for the Conservative Party. Of Sir Stafford Northcote he speaks as fit only for leadership during a period of neutral politics. Of course, this letter elicited a great many vehement attacks on Lord Randolph, and notably an enthusiastic demonstration on Tuesday, chiefly from the Conservative benches, but taken up also on the Liberal side of the House, in favour of Sir Stafford Northcote, though the wish to snub Lord Randolph was, doubtless, at least as active as the wish to strengthen Sir Stafford. On the whole, the discussion shows that the dispirited Conservatives of the country like a leader who plies them with stimulants, like Lord Salisbury, but that the cautious Conservatives of the House like a leader who does not require them to make themselves needlessly ridiculous by tilting at windmills or crying for the moon.

The Attorney-General's proposal, introduced on Monday, to allow an appeal in criminal cases—though open to some objections, the most serious of which are that juries may rely too much upon the Appellate Court to correct their own errors and that the Crown, with the consent of the Judge, should have an appeal against perverse acquittals—is, we think, in principle sound. The power of pardon, which is valuable, is still retained ; and there can be no doubt that innocent men are sometimes condemned, or that an acquittal on appeal rehabilitates the accused better than a pardon. Sir H. James's statement that in those trials which, though nominally civil, are really criminal, character being gravely involved, forty-seven per cent. of decisions are reversed on appeal, is a startling argument in favour of the change. He has, however, limited his reform till it is scarcely possible to discuss it. Upon the ground that it is necessary to proceed cautiously, and that the Judges must not be crushed with appeals, he confines the right to capital cases, calculates the appeals at twelve a year, and says three Judges may settle them, by sitting together four days a year. What is the use of disturbing a system for which much may be said, especially on the ground of the cheapness of procedure, for the sake of a dozen capital cases, which are notoriously more carefully tried by the counsel and judges, as well as by juries, than any other? The injustice which the Attorney-General thinks so serious is done in the cases sentenced to penal servitude, yet Sir H. James refuses criminals so sentenced their right of appeal. We trust the Grand Committee will either extend the Bill, or drop it, till opinion is ripe for a more complete one. To secure to murderers a special justice refused to other criminals is a jest of the grimmest type.

Although the operation of the Bill is limited to capital cases, Sir H. James admitted that he hoped to proceed much further by degrees, and the debate turned almost exclusively upon the general principle. The Tory lawyers contended that appeal would be mischievous, as it would so greatly increase the expenses of defence; but the general sense of the House was clearly that the present risk of wrongful conviction was too great. Mr. Hopwood, who closely expresses the popular mind on the subject, made this his chief point; and Mr. C. Russell, by no means a sentimentalist, urged the same plea, alleging that in civil applications for new trials twenty-five per cent. were granted, and that the Courts, so often wrong in questions of money, could not be always right on questions of crime. Sir W. Harcourt also declared himself greatly impressed with this danger, and related one frightful case. He had seen reason to inquire into the appeals of two men convicted of burglary, and condemned to fifteen years' penal servitude. He found that both were innocent, and, moreover, that one of them had been previously convicted of the same crime, had been sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment, had served his time, and was innocent all the while. The man had been robbed of his whole active life by unjust sentences. The accidental suppression of essential evidence on a trial, said the Home Secretary, was very frequent, one man in particular having been condemned to death for arson, because circumstances indicated that he wished the death which had incidentally occurred. The chief witness, however, went to Sir W. Harcourt, and stated that he had forgotten to mention in Court that the accused brought up the escape-ladder. On the other hand, it is to be noted, the Parnellites are eager for the Bill.

Mr. Chamberlain moved on Tuesday that a Committee of five Members should be appointed to form, with five Peers, a Joint Committee of both Houses to inquire into the expediency of sanctioning the Channel Tunnel. Mr. Gladstone explained that this course was necessary, because only Parliament could now resist the Tunnel. Former Governments had so committed the Executive to an international agreement on the subject, that the present Government, though it could submit to Parliament, could not proprio motu forbid the project. We presume there are members of the Government who favour it, though not, we trust, because they secretly hope for the conscription, which the Tunnel will render indispensable. Fortunately, neither the Joint Committee nor any other Committee can do much harm. Parliament and the people have decided that Great Britain shall not be a peninsula hanging on to the Continent, and with its trade at the mercy of any Fenian with a gallon of nitro-glycerine; and if both the Front Benches joined to support the Bill, they could not carry it. It is, indeed, difficult to conceive how sane men can support a project which will so increase all the foreign embarrassments of the Government, and render panics so incessant.

After the oratory of Lord Salisbury and Mr. Gibson, Birmingham plunged yesterday week into that of Lord Rosebery and Mr. Chamberlain. Their addresses took the form of speeches to the Birmingham Junior Liberal Association, delivered in the Birmingham Town Hall,—the object being, we suppose, truly described by Lord Rosebery as analogous with that of the roll in the snow with which the Russian bather sometimes concludes the violent perspirations of the hot-air bath, and the flagellations which accompany it. Both speakers spoke well, but there is necessarily a good deal of confutation to be done in such cases, which though not superfluous considered in relation to the audience addressed, is entirely superfluous for the careful student of politics. Lord Rosebery made a clever hit, when he said that even though David made mistakes, Israel preferred to be ruled by David to being ruled by Shimei, for Lord Salisbury has certainly railed somewhat in the style of Shimei. The future of this country, said Lord Rosebery, pithily, rests "not with the wasps, but with the bees." Nor could a better description of Lord Salisbury's policy in general have been suggested than that. A waspish policy it has ever been, and if ever Lord Salisbury returned to power, a waspish policy it would certainly be again.

Mr. Chamberlain congratulated the Conservative banqueters on their beefeaters, their trumpeters, and, above all, on their peacocks,—and generally on "the mediæval mummeries which formed the fitting reception for a statesman who was two hundred years behind his time." He illustrated Lord Rosebery's remark on the waspish character of Lord Salisbury's policy by enumerating the wars of which Lord Salisbury had been an advocate,—the Afghan war, the proposed raid against Russia in Asia, the African wars, and finally, the Irish civil war, which he virtually favours. "May we not say, with Shakespeare," said Mr. Chamberlain, "'See what a desperate homicide this Salisbury is?' I say that Lord Salisbury constitutes himself the spokesman of a class; of the class to which he himself belongs, who toil not, neither do they spin; whose fortunes, as in his case, have originated in grants, made in times long gone by, for the services which courtiers rendered kings, and have since grown and increased by levying an unearned share on all that other men have done by toil and labour to add to the general wealth and prosperity of the country of which they form a part." He rather unkindly spoke of Mr. Gibson as the Sancho Panza to Lord Salisbury's Don Quixote; and taking up Mr. Gibson's challenge, said that the Tory Party had been labouring for a policy of Obstruction, and had thrown their whole influence in favour of that terrible waste of time before Easter which resulted in the Government's having but one out of twenty-five days of session at its own disposal,—the one in which the Bankruptcy Bill was read a second time. Mr. Chamberlain appealed very emphatically to the country to support the Government, in insisting on passing the few important measures which they have this year introduced. We believe that that appeal will receive something more than a cordial,—a thoroughly enthusiastic answer.

The Ameer of Afghanistan is very anxious to visit Lord Ripon, and the Times contends strenuously that the visit should be allowed, and that the Ameer's requests should be heard in a "sympathetic" spirit. The Ameer, it is alleged, wants "countenance and encouragement," in order to strengthen him to keep Herat. It might be discourteous to refuse the proffered visit, and Abdurrahman Khan may be assumed to know his own business; but we, nevertheless, question if the project should be encouraged. The Ameer is certain to ask something which cannot be granted, and to go away irritated by the refusal. Moreover, the Times forgets one cardinal point in the situation,—the uneasy suspicion with which Afghans regard any "colloguing" between their ruler and the powerful white Infidels to the south. They believe, just as Greeks would have done, that he is plotting to increase his ascendancy by the aid of the barbarians, and just so far as he is "countenanced and encouraged" by the Indian Viceroy he is distrusted by his own people. From the days of Runjeet Singh, interviews between an independent sovereign and a Viceroy have been followed by demands from Calcutta, and the Afghans are not likely to regard a renewal of the old fatal policy with approval. The seldom the iron pot and the earthen pot touch in mid-stream, the safer for the weaker vessel.

A serious debate on foreign policy was raised on Tuesday by Mr. Jacob Bright. He objected to a design attributed to the Foreign Office of recognising Portugal as Sovereign on the Congo, the giant river which it is now known flows from Lake Tanganyika to the West Coast of Africa. We have explained the facts elsewhere. Mr. Jacob Bright proposed to forbid the Government to recognise any European Power upon the Congo. The Government refused to accept this, but acceded to an amendment proposed by Mr. Wodehouse, which binds them to make no treaty inconsistent with existing engagements, and with the security of the civilising and commercial agencies at work on the Congo. Lord E. Fitzmaurice, moreover, promised that the treaty, if made, should protect commerce and the natives, and Mr. Gladstone pledged himself that the previous concurrence of Parliament should be obtained. The debate was remarkable for a kind of explosion of horror against Portugal from all sides. The cruelties tolerated by the Agents of that Power, and their contempt for treaties, whether of civilisation or commerce, are better known in the House than we had imagined. Even Lord E. Fitzmaurice justified some of the most serious charges, and we should not wonder if Sir R. B. Morier found his position very uncomfortable.

A dispute has broken out in the French Cabinet which is not without significance. General Gallifet, who suppressed the Commune with such severity, had been appointed to command the cavalry manœuvres of the year on the eastern frontier. The Radicals fancied that the General might use his extensive command to make a demonstration against the Republic, and induced the Minister at War to order that the command should be entrusted to the senior General present. General Gallifet protested, and General Thibaudin found himself in the Cabinet in a minority of one. He thereupon withdrew his order, but did not resign, and reduced the force to be manœuvred to two Divisions. General Gallifet will still command, but the reduced force will not be massed upon the eastern border. The incident reveals the sleepless dread of the Army entertained by the advanced Republicans, who have no General, except General Thibaudin. They may have reason, but their mode of showing their fears is fatal to the Army. A General who is publicly declared suspect, yet retained in his command, is a General who is wilfully made dangerous to the State.

The Pall Mall Gazette of Monday virtually withdraws what it did say on the subject of the representation of minorities, and says something very different. What it asserted was that the battle would have to be fought against the principles of representing minorities, and not merely on the anomalies of any particular scheme; and that it would be a test of true Liberalism to repudiate the very attempt, as one certain to result "in strengthening all those anti-popular interests which are always too strong by their intrinsic position." What the Pall Mall now says is that it is impossible to hope for an exact mirror of public opinion, and undesirable, in aiming at what is beyond reach, to establish so exact a balance of political forces that nothing can ever get itself done. That is a very different matter, indeed. We are, however, by no means prepared to admit that the most exact mirror of the public mind which we could attain would result in any such balance. As a rule, public opinion is very clearly in favour of one particular policy or party and against the other, and a House of Commons that represented it truly, would not be in a state of see-saw at all, but in an attitude of clear and vigorous resolution.

The General Synod of the Church of Ireland has adopted, —not, however, without opposition,—a resolution petitioning Parliament against any Bill which will have the effect of admitting Atheists to either House. Why, then, do they not accept the logic of their position, and ask at once for a Theistic test to be imposed on Members, one defining the sense in which the word "God" is used, and pledging the Member taking it to a belief in God in that sense? The present oath no more excludes Atheists from Parliament, than it excludes Agnostics or Pantheists. It does not even exclude avowed Atheists from Parliament. It excludes only Atheists who happen to have avowed their Atheism to either House. In other words, it is a premium on hypocrisy, not a prohibition of unbelief. Which is it most un-Christian to do, to put a premium on hypocrisy, or to remove a barrier against unbelief?

A very able Royal Commission has reported that scarlet is not a good colour for Army uniforms. It is unusually visible to the enemy, as are also black and white. The Commission, therefore, recommend that either mud-colour, the well-known khakee of the Indian Service, should be adopted, or that a grey believed to be unusually durable should be selected. The white facings and belts will be made umber, and the metal will be bronze, instead of brass. They suggest, however, that scarlet may be retained for full dress. The argument looks strong, and has apparently been accepted by Lord Hartington, but is the Commission quite certain that comparative invisibility at a certain distance signifies much, at a time when field-glasses are so efficient? The Prussians do not think so, or that pickelhaube would be doomed; nor do the Austrians, with their white uniforms. If the necessity is not strong, it is a pity to abolish "the hue of England's war," the thin red line, whose visibility does not increase the enemy's readiness to charge. We had much rather hear, if we are to have a new dress, that it was to be one which left the men their fullest powers. No gamekeeper would put on those tight things.

In the exhibition of inventions at the Inventors' Institute, Dashwood House, New Broad Street, there is a smokeless fire-place which is worth notice. We know nothing of its merits, but it is said to succeed, and the inventor, named Moerath, deserves the credit of having understood English conditions. We, being sentimental idiots, do not want a close stove, but an open fireplace, which will burn up its smoke. Mr. Moerath, therefore, places a quantity of asbestos and tubing eighteen inches above the fire. The smoke goes up the tubes, the asbestos heats the carbon till it is consumed, and the residuum, gas, is conveyed away through a pipe, and may, we presume, be utilised. That is not quite a perfect arrangement, for we want the smoke-burner to be out of sight, above the fireplace, in the entrance to the chimney, but the principle is there. If the English would agree to close stoves, the smoke nuisance could be abolished in a year or two; but this is precisely what they will not do.

We are glad to see that the emigration experiment in the West of Ireland is succeeding admirably, not only in its practical working, but in the popular favour it commands. Yesterday week, 350 souls were embarked from Belmullet, County Mayo, under the personal supervision of Mr. Sydney Buxton, one of Mr. Tuke's ablest lieutenants, for Boston, Massachusetts. The 'Nestorian' came into Blacksod Bay for the purpose,—two gunboats, the 'Seahorse' and the 'Orwell,' with a much less draught of water, conveying the poor emigrants to the steamer, after they had been rowed in the boats of these vessels to the gunboats. The whole scene seems to have been a thoroughly cheerful one, in consequence of the non-separation of the families; nor can there be any doubt that emigration thus supervised is extremely popular in Mayo, in spite of the violent efforts of the Connaught priests and Bishops to discredit it. The reporter of the Irish Times speaks very strongly on this point, and of the admirable character of the arrangements made.

Mr. Reid, the Member for Hereford, moved on Wednesday a Bill for the total abolition of vivisection, from which he would have done well, we think, to exclude all the ordinary experiments on inoculation intended for the benefit of the animals inoculated, which the House would never consent to prohibit. Indeed, if the licences granted under the existing Act were but more stringent, specifying the number of individual creatures to be experimented on under them, and if the licences were refused,—which they have not been,—for every experiment savouring of true torture, such as Professor Rutherford's on the biliary secretion of dogs, there would have been no good case as yet for fresh legislation. Mr. Reid, however, was able to show, in his admirable speech, that the Act of 1876 is very inadequately administered, nor did Mr. Cartwright or Dr. Playfair break down his case. Dr. Playfair's statement, often repeated, that the successful killing of mice by inoculating them with the virus of cholera, gives you fresh knowledge as to how the population of London might have been saved from cholera, is one of those wild statements on which physiologists would never rely, if they did not give average men credit for jumping to just such conclusions as their prompters desire. Sir William Harcourt made a speech chiefly memorable as proving that he does not understand at all how the Act actually works. And Mr. G. Russell, the Member for Aylesbury, made an admirable speech in favour of further restrictions, after which the debate was interrupted by the clock, so that it comes to an end without a division for this Session.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE BUDGET.

MR. CHILDERS made a much greater impression by his Budget speech than he had led his audience at its commencement to expect. There was visible throughout it the genuine financial mind,—the mind which occupies itself naturally with these subjects, to which financial considerations are not mere burdens of official duty, but matters of something like personal fascination. You could see this in the care with which Mr. Childers, in comparing the finance of one year with the finance of another, made allowance for all those smaller considerations which really affect the meaning of the figures. For example, in his comparison to show how the consumption of alcoholic liquors had diminished of late years, nothing could exceed the care with which he made, not only, of course, the due allowance for increase of population, but the allowance to be made, as regards the consumption of beer, for the change of the malt duty into the beer duty. The same elaborate care pervaded his discussion,—otherwise perhaps somewhat too militant in tone for a Budget speech, though we fully acknowledge the provocation he had received,—of the amounts of debt imposed and paid off by the two Administrations during the various years which he included in his survey. Everywhere you saw evidence not merely of the accurate financier, but of the financier who is so absolutely determined not to be misled by accurate figures into an inaccurate reconstruction of the facts behind the figures, that he is always on the look-out for possible causes of fallacy in comparing one year's figures with the apparent return for another year. That, however, was but a small part of the interest of Mr. Childers's Budget. Its chief interest was the comparative weight he laid on the different elements of his statement,—the stress with which he insisted on the reduction of Debt, and the arrangements for a serious enterprise in that direction,—the prospect which he held out of taxing the property of Corporations so as to make it yield a fair equivalent for the Succession duties paid by private individuals whose death transfers property from one to another,—and the anxiety he showed to diminish the cost of the poor man's journeys, rather than to increase the gains of the Railway Companies which carry him. In all these respects, Mr. Childers showed that he had fixed his mind on critical and permanent financial considerations, and that he was actuated by no caprice. Even in his proposition for the abolition of the duty on silver, he was no doubt actuated by the conviction that the ultimate abolition of this duty will be of infinitely greater importance to India than it will ever be to England. There was no vestige of caprice in his statement. Nothing could be more unfair than to call his main proposal—the taking-off of the 1½d. income-tax imposed last year—the proposal of “a rich man's Budget.” If so, then the putting-on of that 1½d. should have been called the proposal of a poor man's Budget. In point of fact, it is only fair that those who can best bear the burden of war should be the first to feel it. But then, if that is to be so, they should also be the first to feel the relief from it. The State which has taken the cost of a small war out of the pockets of the middle class, clearly cannot be reproached with class-favouritism when it refuses to continue that special imposition on the middle class after the expense of the war has been paid. To call that favouritism to the rich, is like calling it favouritism to the rich to cease extracting from them subscriptions for a charity which has learnt to pay its own way. Mr. Childers was bound almost in honesty to restore to the well-to-do what Mr. Gladstone had extracted from them in order to prevent any sudden pressure on the poor.

Much the most important feature of the speech was that part of it which entails no burden on the finances of the year,—the proposal to pledge the country at once to the disposition of the large resources falling-in in 1885, for the reduction of Debt. To this proposal Mr. Childers led up with great skill. Indeed, we are disposed to think that what Sir Stafford Northcote and Sir R. Cross complained of as the vehemently partisan character of the Budget was due much less to Mr. Childers's wish to vindicate the Government from the perfectly baseless assertions of the Tories, than from his desire to preclude any danger of their objecting to those dispositions of future resources which he was about to make. By showing how little in comparison the Tories had done for the reduction of Debt, he almost shut off the possibility of their objecting to what he was about to do for the reduction of Debt during the next twenty years. Any such objection would at once give rise to the cry that they were hoping to return to office before 1885, and desired in that case to make a more immediately popular use of the financial resources at their disposal than any the benefit of which would be reaped chiefly by our posterity. Mr. Childers is so little of a militant politician, that we do not believe he could have administered the various raps and pricks which seem to have told so powerfully on the Front Opposition Bench, if he had not had some object in doing so by no means partisan in character. That object we suspect to have been to estop the Tories by anticipation from any attempt to remonstrate against his proposal of committing the nation at once to the right use of the financial resources of 1885, before they shall fall in. To stimulate their pride in Sir Stafford Northcote's honest attempt in the same direction, and to pique them by showing how much less Sir Stafford had been able to do in furtherance of his own policy than Mr. Gladstone had done for that policy, was the very best security Mr. Childers could have taken against any obstructive move. The proposal to extinguish at once seventy millions of Debt by borrowing from the Chancery Suits Fund and the Savings Bank Fund, and to replace these funds within twenty years, besides further extinguishing within that time 102 millions of Debt more, through the agency of the terminable annuities which Mr. Childers proposes to create, is, if we may not exactly call it a great policy, at least a strenuous and worthy policy in the right direction, to which the Tories, stung by the comparison between their financial achievements and ours, will hardly find it feasible to object.

Mr. Childers's proof that between the year 1875-76 and the year 1882-3 the people of the United Kingdom have diminished their consumption of alcoholic liquors by an amount the duty on which alone amounts to £5,000,000 a year, is, in our opinion, a very remarkable evidence of the result of compulsory education. It was not till 1875-6 that the first-fruits of the Education Bill were becoming visible, and the seven years of Mr. Childers's comparison are the first seven years in which we could have expected that policy to have affected at all the adult population. We only wish Mr. Childers had shown how far the change in the latter of these years has or has not been progressive, as compared with the change in the earlier years. It would have been a very encouraging thing to be told that it is progressive, and that we may expect this progress to continue. It is clear, at all events, that the change is not due to bad times, for the progress in the consumption of tea shows that it is not want of means which prevents the increased consumption of spirits and beer. Mr. Childers showed how truly he understood the meaning of this change, when he devoted £135,000 of his surplus to the abolition of the railway-passenger duty on third-class fares. This is a reduction of duty conceived with the view of encouraging and promoting the very class of social changes which the rapid progress of temperance favours. To make it easier for our poorer class to travel,—whether in pursuit of work or in pursuit of pleasure,—is to give them the means of spending with the greatest profit to themselves all that they save by their more temperate habits of life. And we believe that this change will have a very great effect on the policy of our great Railway Companies, which must, from this time forth, consider the convenience of their poorest passengers as the most important of all the conditions of their own success. We congratulate Mr. Childers heartily on having proved,—and this in a year when he had no opportunity of producing a brilliant Budget,—that he knows exactly the critical parts of our finance, that he is prepared to accept all the best precedents of his predecessors; and most of all, that he is determined, whenever it is possible rightly to reduce taxation, to do justice, first, by taking off the burdens specially imposed for a special purpose, and then by relieving as much as is in his power, the financial pressure which arrests the social progress of the poor.

THE CONSERVATIVE LEADERSHIP.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL'S trumpet-call to the Conservative party, delivered on Monday, has not been without result. It produced the most emphatic demonstration of enthusiastic support which the Conservative party have yet rendered to the leader at whose power Lord Randolph Churchill struck that ostentatious but weak and ill-directed blow. And, further, it induced apparently one-third of Lord Randolph's following,—in the person of Mr. Gorst,—to desert to the enemy, by claiming publicly to have acted in the House of Commons in the way best fitted to win the approval, not of Lord Randolph Churchill, but of Sir Stafford Northcote. It must have been humiliating enough to Lord Randolph to hear the deafening cheers which greeted Sir Stafford Northcote on Tuesday night, but it must have been still more humiliating to find Mr. Gorst on Wednesday morning positively whining that it should have been imputed to him that he had thrown off the authority of his official leader, and quoting testimonials from that official leader to prove that he (Mr. Gorst) was really in favour with him, and not regarded at all in the light of a secret or open enemy, like Lord Randolph Churchill. "Such a series of neglected opportunities, pusillanimity, combativeness at wrong moments, vacillation, dread of responsibility, repression and discouragement of hard-working followers, collusions with the Government, hankerings after coalitions, jealousies, common-places, want of perception on the part of the former lieutenants of Lord Beaconsfield, no one but he who has watched carefully and intelligently the course of affairs in Parliament can adequately realise or sufficiently express;" to all which the Conservatives answer by deafening cheers for the man who is mainly responsible, if Lord Randolph be right, for this dismal blundering, while one of his own three followers boasts loudly to the country at large of possessing a certificate to character from the very leader at whom that futile thunderbolt was launched. We sympathise most sincerely with Lord Salisbury. It is a hard thing for him to be patronised openly by Lord Randolph Churchill,—harder almost, we should think, than finding all the Tory Lords deserting to the Duke of Richmond and Gordon's view of the Arrears Bill. For while the loneliness of Lord Salisbury's attitude in relation to Ireland had in it something dignified and almost tragic, to have the impotent aegis of Lord Randolph Churchill flourished over him, and flourished over him with this absurd result, makes him the mere laughing-stock of a political farce. And indeed there is something most ridiculous in declarations delivered urbi et orbi by Lord Randolph Churchill, that the only leader who can rescue the Conservative Party from the mire is the one who cannot carry with him even the pure Tories of the House of Lords,—who has no following at all except Lord Randolph and Mr. Balfour in the House of Commons,—and who sensibly wanes in favour with every effort made by these most unsuccessful of panegyrists to bid the welkin ring with Lord Salisbury's name. Lord Salisbury has always shown force enough in dealing with his foes, but he must indeed pray Heaven to save him from such extremely discrediting friends as Lord Randolph Churchill.

Lord Randolph's impotent flourish of trumpets gives rise to many thoughts as to the decomposing elements in the Tory party, and we cannot help thinking that thoughtful foreigners might fancy that they find in "the Fourth Party" a group of Conservative germs—or bacteria, as they are called—of an attenuated character, such as M. Pasteur and Herr Koch are said to use for the purposes of preservative inoculation. Lord Randolph Churchill himself is obviously a germ attenuated—very much attenuated, indeed, in the energy of its life—from the type of Mr. Disraeli,—the Tory Democrat whose political tendency it is to indulge in insolence and braggadocio proceeding from the notion that there is something in insolence and braggadocio specially stimulating to the imagination of the people, and specially characteristic of the aristocracy who are best able to lead them. So, too, Mr. Arthur Balfour might be regarded as a still more highly attenuated Tory germ of the type of Lord John Manners, professing high doctrines of English honour, and supporting them with a certain lackadaisical feebleness of sentiment that brings them into discredit. Mr. Gorst is an attenuated Tory germ of the old-fashioned Roebuck or "Tear 'em" type,—a mixture of lawyer-like astuteness and somewhat bullying defiance, a type that finds its Toryism in a bulldog temper, and its Conservatism in a chronic discontent with modern life. And Sir H. Drummond Wolff is, perhaps, an attenuated germ of Lord Salisbury's own type, with a taste for training the Turks to fight the Christians, and using the Atheists to scatter the believers. Thus, at least, a foreign student of the Tory party, in its evident decomposition, might fancy; but his reflections would, we think, go on to suggest that these attenuated germs of Toryism, far from so inoculating the Tory party as to preserve it from the more dangerous virus, appear to produce a condition of general debility and morbidness, worse by far than any of the stronger forms of Toryism itself. Just as, for anything we can see, the theory of M. Pasteur and Herr Koch should lead to giving sheep and cattle such a frightful number of preservative diseases that the poor creatures are sure to perish under the profuse generosity of their vaccinating friends, so it seems to us that the Tory party is getting so thoroughly inoculated with such very weak forms of Tory virus, that the result is political decomposition of the whole body. Instead of a few master-minds, strong in their way, and guiding by their influence a considerable section of the nation, we now get, both on the Tory and the Liberal side, but especially on the Tory, a number of very inferior minds, still more representative, perhaps, of the average ability and taste of the party, but for that very reason possessing much less than the old kind of influence over the party. It was possible to be led by Mr. Disraeli, for the genius and passion of the man were conspicuous, however defective were his principles; but who can be led by such a man as Lord Randolph Churchill, who has changed Mr. Disraeli's gold for brass, and the genius of defiance for the shrill chatter of a scold? It might still be possible to be led by Lord Salisbury, so long as he keeps his passions within reasonable control of his judgment, for the man has undoubtedly a deep spring of wrath in him, and even wrath may be, as Carlyle would say, "nobly human;" but who can be led by Sir H. Drummond Wolff, who has all Lord Salisbury's slipperiness, without any share of his wrath? It seems to us that the great mischief of the day is the number of pretentious and second-rate politicians, who influence hardly anybody, while they take up a very large proportion of the public time and public attention, and definitely lower the interest of the public in politics by the petty tone which they give to the struggles of the day. We recognise fully, as the House of Commons recognise, that Sir Stafford Northcote is far better entitled to lead the Conservatives than any of these pretentious rivals. But even in him there is a great deficiency. Sir Stafford Northcote himself might truly be described as an attenuated form of customary Conservatism,—Conservatism without its depth of affection for the past, without its profound faith in the genius of the nation, without its pride, and without its stubbornness. The consequence is that Sir Stafford Northcote does not and cannot lead his party as Mr. Gladstone leads his; he cannot command its confidence by the great weight and deep significance of his own convictions, as compared with the lighter weight and less significance of the average Member's convictions. The political evil of the day on both sides of the House,—though it is much further developed among the Conservatives than among the Liberals,—is the deficiency of strong leaders and the multiplication of weak leaders—the deficiency of guidance and the multiplication of counsellors. It is this which is decomposing the House of Commons. That assembly is rapidly succumbing to the large number of individually insignificant morbid influences with which it is being inoculated.

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE CONGO.

THE Debate on the Sovereignty of the Congo on Monday was really a very important one, and thirty years ago would have excited as keen an interest throughout the country as it now does in the manufacturing towns. Recent travellers have revealed to the world the great importance of this river, which cleaves the ponderous mass of South-western Africa as the Ganges cleaves the mass of the Indian Peninsula, or the Yangtse Kiang the huge bulk of Eastern China. The river reaches, under the name of the "Lualaba"—which, now that the facts are known, should be disused—up to the lacustrine system on the east, 1,800 miles away in a direct line, and it is perfectly possible, in the distant future, when it has become worth while to blast away the rapids, that a steamer may travel straight from the South-west Coast to Lake Tanganyika. The volume of water poured down is prodigious, the banks are fertile beyond belief, and the most tameable of the negro tribes tend to collect upon the river banks. Even as it is, on the magnificent debouchure of the river, 350 miles long, and at its narrowest part two miles wide, the negro tribes have begun to cultivate and trade, purchase English goods to the amount of £500,000 a year, and export produce estimated at two millions sterling. If England controlled the Valley, and kept order with five or six negro regiments organised like those of the West Indies, and a flotilla of small armed steamers, the population would soon grow dense and the country rich, and thirty years ago Great Britain would have been eager for the enterprise. It had then a desire for territory, which satiety has blunted, and realised far more fully than it does now that there are races which, until they have been conquered, never develop their full strength, from inability to establish the first condition of progress, order sufficient to allow accumulation to commence. At present, however, the British people is either disinclined for enterprise, or is supposed to be so; and the Foreign Office, aware of the growing importance of the Congo Valley, of the trade it may develop, and of the anarchy which irresponsible Europeans create along its borders, has looked round for an alternative.

We do not think it has found a good one. Practically, four courses were open to Lord Granville. He might have hoisted the British flag, declared the Valley for 350 miles a Crown Colony, and have awaited an attack, which would hardly have arrived. That course would, however, have been unpopular with a section of the Radicals, would have irritated France, which is hankering for the Valley, and would have involved a further strain upon an overburdened Naval establishment. He might, secondly, have prohibited any advance from any European Power, leaving things as they are; but that would have involved a nominal Protectorate, a continuance of the present atrocities—which are bad, negroes being drowned and flogged ad libitum—and a running contest of years with the adventurers, French, American, Belgian, Portuguese, and English, who see their way to carve out principalities in the Valley. It was, again, open to him to favour French pretensions, or to recognise the vague claim of Portugal, which has already a colony, Angola, 150 miles to the south, with 500,000 inhabitants, to be supreme upon the Congo. In this dilemma, after a great deal of hesitation, faithfully reflected in the speech of Lord E. Fitzmaurice, his lieutenant in the Commons, the Foreign Secretary fixed upon Portugal; and though he has not explained his reasons, and probably will not explain them, they are not far to seek. Lord Granville does not date politics from 1870, he knows perfectly well that in a very short time France will again be a great, possibly an aggressive Power, and he is disinclined to place in her hands interests so large as those which may grow up upon the Congo. She might found an empire there, and shut out Britain for ever. Portugal, though inferior in energy, would be much more manageable, and might, if she misused her new authority, be deprived of it altogether. Moreover, Lord Granville, who watches the new tone of Republican France attentively, was not unwilling to give M. Challemeil-Lacour a hint, which that gentleman greatly needs, that if France is about to embark on a policy of expansion beyond seas, English acquiescence is of the last importance, and that the perpetual worry kept up about Egypt impedes the prospect of that acquiescence. He took steps, therefore, which were not, perhaps, quite so definite or irreversible as they seemed, but which raised an impression that he intended to acknowledge Portuguese sovereignty on the Congo.

Lord Granville's course, judged as it would be judged by other diplomatists, was an able and even astute one; but there was an impediment in the way on which he had scarcely reckoned, and that was the horror with which the Portuguese dominion in Africa is regarded by the trading classes and the philanthropists of Great Britain. The Portuguese statesmen, who in home affairs are fairly reasonable, are the worst colonial administrators in the world. In Goa, Macao, Angola, Mozambique, their course is always the same. They not only regard their colonies as estates—which is true of French statesmen also—but as estates to be managed with a single view to the extraction of immediate gain. They therefore crush trade with taxes, which, as English traders aver, are often not only too heavy, but are treacheries. Lisbon will agree with perfect readiness to limit herself to customs-duties of ten per cent. ad valorem, and then, when goods begin to arrive, will demand 50s. a ton, or some preposterous sum of that kind, for harbour-dues. The Governors—possibly without orders—are always playing tricks of that kind, and have irritated English exporters, till they say they would rather deal with any Power in the world than Portugal, and till their mouthpiece for the hour, Mr. Jacob Bright, certainly no Chauvinist, denounces Portugal with injudicious violence as “that rotten Power.” The philanthropists, on their part, agree with Mr. Jacob Bright. They say, and say truly, that whatever the Portuguese may be at home, they tolerate abroad cruelty and misgovernment which are a discredit to European mankind. They have allowed Goa to die of atrophy. They have possessed Angola for centuries, and have never cut a road. They evade all the anti-slave-trade treaties. They wink at slavery in a horrible form as hard as the Brazilian coffee-growers do. Lord E. Fitzmaurice, with all his official responsibility, was compelled to make the following statement:—

“He would lay briefly before the House the statements made upon this painful subject by a gentleman whose name was familiar to many Honourable Members. Mr. David Hopkins, her Majesty's Consul at Loanda, in a despatch, dated May 1st, 1877, to the Governor-General of Angola, informed him of the abominable excesses practised by some Europeans on the Zaire. Mr. Hopkins especially denounced the assassination of about thirty negroes, including women and children, who, having been more or less justifiably accused of having taken part in the burning of the properties belonging to the Portuguese subject, Manoel Joaquim Oliveira, were, by the latter's orders, and with the connivance of other Europeans and some natives, among the former being a British subject, bound hand and foot and thrown into the river, some of them at Boma and others at Port Lenha. As a climax of monstrosity, the presumed accomplices or witnesses, the victims, as they were called, were put to torture by him. According to the information of Mr. Hopkins, similar atrocities were frequently perpetrated in the region under notice; and the same Consul specially named the Spanish subject José del Valle, better known as Don Pope, as the person who inflicted frequent cruelties on his black labourers, and who had even caused the death of some of them, whom he ordered to be drowned. Mr. Hopkins added that slavery was, in fact, reinstated on the Zaire; and that the black labourers in the service of Europeans were literally sold to these by the native chiefs.”

Mr. Jacob Bright added that, “In Portuguese Africa, many of the inhabitants were transported convicts; in Angola, the army was largely composed of the worst kind of convicts, that is, of murderers. This he was told by a Portuguese merchant, on the authority of Mr. Watson, late her Majesty's Consul at Loanda. What were the relations between the Portuguese colonists and the natives? In Mozambique and Delagoa Bay, the Portuguese officials did not dare to venture on the mainland for fear of the revenge of the natives; and in Angola, no Portuguese could travel between Loanda and Ambriz for the same reason.” That last statement has possibly an exaggerative effect, as we also populated Tasmania with convicts, and sent convicts—though not murderers—to swell Clive's ranks; but there can be no doubt that the Portuguese have, of all European peoples, the least respect for the lives, property, or natural rights of dark-coloured Pagans, and that to those who know the facts of their history in Africa, the transfer of such a territory to them as the Valley of the Congo, with its endless potentialities, is impossible. The Foreign Office, it is quite clear from Lord E. Fitzmaurice's speech—a most creditable speech, the circumstances being considered—has been seriously doubtful of its own course, the House was manifestly opposed to the plan, and Mr. Gladstone finally gave what was understood to be the coup de grace to the whole project. There should, he promised, be no Treaty without Free-trade and without protection for the natives, and no treaty whatever without the special sanction of Parliament previously obtained. Mr. Gladstone even rose a second time to pledge himself that the crowded condition of public business should not be pleaded in bar of full discussion. As the Portuguese do not care for the Congo, unless they can tax as they please and wink at slavery, the project is at an end.

It would be best, perhaps, if some decent third-rate European Power, like Belgium or Holland could be trusted for a time with the Valley of the Congo; but if it must fall either to France or to filibusters, we do not see why France should not have it. She will, at any rate, not re-establish slavery, and would probably agree, in consideration of our acquiescence, not to make the Valley a convict settlement, and not to embarrass trade with crushing duties. Her statesmen know how to introduce order of a kind, her capital is eagerly pressing towards new outlets, and she has plenty of gunboats and marines. As to any danger from her expansion, that is a dream which even Lord Palmerston pooh-poohed. Colonies are only safe when the mother-country rules the seas. Every possession France obtains beyond seas is a pledge that she will not fight Great Britain, which, though powerless to march to Paris, could in six weeks deprive her of every dependency, Algeria included. England herself would govern the Congo Valley much better and more leniently, but she is just now overloaded, and in no mood to take on herself more of the work, the vivifying government of dark races, in which, of all her works, she probably succeeds the best.

LORD DUNRAVEN ON THE HOUSE OF PEERS.

WE have no desire to gain victories on false pretences, and therefore decline Lord Dunraven's assistance in abolishing or transforming the House of Lords. He is a man who, though not a statesman, knows the world well, has seen more than most men of two continents, and has much of the quickness of understanding natural to an Irishman, and his view of the position of the House of Lords, when obviously a product of his own mind, and not a conventional utterance, is worth more than a moment's study. It is, however, we are convinced, essentially wrong. Lord Dunraven, himself a Conservative, and on Irish questions a rather bitter one, holds that the Conservative party lacks alike "vitality, vigour, and the principle of growth," and that one main reason of its "partial paralysis" is the "anomalous position of the House of Lords in the Constitution." That House now represents nobody not represented in the Commons, and its power is without any constitutional check, it is dominated by "a permanent and overwhelming majority of one party," and consequently it is "constantly obliged to efface and stultify itself." It "must agree to legislation it disagrees with, or cause a complete deadlock in our whole system of government." It "must discredit itself, or disgrace the Constitution." That position is of itself degrading, but it produces, in Lord Dunraven's judgment, an evil not confined to the House of Peers. "The people govern," but the representation in the Upper House of one dominant party compels the majority, "aware that the sanction of Parliament to measures approved of by their elected representatives" cannot be obtained, to resort to agitation. "Popular agitation is a threat of appeal to physical force, and the knowledge that agitation has become an essential element in our system of government, and that in it, and not in any Constitutional check, lies the only check upon the absolute power of the Upper House and of one of the great political parties, is not calculated to form a law-abiding national character, to engender reverence and love for our ancient Constitution, or to create respect for our system of government by party." Hence the strength of Mr. Chamberlain and his caucus, and hence also much of the inability of Conservatives to compel appeal to the nation for a revision of its judgment. They are weighted by the public dislike of the Upper House, which, if elected or full of senators of both parties, would not be disliked; and they can, therefore, never obtain the immense advantage of showing the people that Conservatives have resisted an injurious measure to "the bitter end," viz., appeal to the country. The Irish Land Act, for instance, in Lord Dunraven's opinion, will produce great disasters. The Upper House, but that it is a House of Lords, would have braved a dissolution to defeat it; and even if it had passed, Conservatism would have had all the credit of resistance, when the eyes of the people were at last opened. Moreover, the grand Conservative interest, "the land," is becoming unpopular, not from its own fault, so much as because it shares in the unpopularity of the House of Lords, which, composed as it is almost exclusively of large owners, is supposed to be swayed by landlord feeling. Conservatism, therefore, loses heavily by the position of the Upper House; and Lord Dunraven would replace it by a new body, apparently either a body of elected Peers, or a body of Peers and experienced men, selected at the beginning of each Parliament by the Crown.

This is an attack on the Lords from an entirely new quarter, directed by a Peer, Lord Dunraven, who claims, in Burke, fifteen centuries of nobility, and is described in the recently compiled Domesday Book as receiving a first-class income from land, and we are not disposed to deny that it is in part a just one. It is quite true that the unalterable majority in the House of Lords fosters "agitation," quite true that the Peers have less power to reject measures than an elected Upper House would have, quite true that if the Lords force a dissolution, the Liberals go to the country with all the advantages derivable from the fact that a few hundred wealthy gentlemen with no moral claim to rule have set themselves, in appearance at all events, to defy the national will. And we need not, we suppose, say that in Lord Dunraven's conclusion we heartily agree. The House of Lords as at present constituted is a mischievous anachronism, which in small matters constantly prevents improvement, and in great matters dams up the current of reform and swells the waters till, when the dyke yields, their overflow often destroys as much as it fertilises. But for the perfectly accidental circumstance that the obstinate old sailor on the Throne in 1831 at heart disliked the great Peers, and, being Sovereign of Hanover, was not carried away by dread of a democracy which in the last resort he could abandon to itself, the Lords in 1831 would, with their want of imagination, have brought on a Democratic Revolution. The Peers—apart from the Law Lords—amend the laws very little, they spoil the laws a good deal, and they do not check, but increase the rush of the Democracy. So far we are with Lord Dunraven, yet we cannot honestly accept his assistance, for we do not honestly believe that Conservatism in the habitual English sense—and, we suppose, also in his sense, though he has learned much in America—is impaired by the existence of the House of Lords. Lord Dunraven has forgotten the social side of his problem altogether. That hierarchy of deferences, that fundamental inequality of conditions which is the essence of English Conservatism, and the principle for which most of the party would make sacrifices, is dependent to an immense extent on the House of Lords. Without that institution to protect and, as it were, consecrate their present system, by making the existence of a social hierarchy visibly part of the Constitution, the British people would obey their second instinct, reverence for utility, and sweep away everything that could not clearly justify itself. They would make the Premier of the time—not of the day, for it is not, though the Tories think so, a light-minded people, but one obstinate in its likes and dislikes—the Head of the State, and insist on laws which, in the long-run, would produce much greater equality. The effect of that change could not be "Conservative," in the sense in which English gentlemen now understand the word; and we doubt if it would be Conservative in any sense. Lord Dunraven does not perceive the strength which the liking for the hierarchical system, for ornament in general, for gratification to the special British imagination—which is not pensive, like the Highland imagination, or melancholy, like the Irish, but concrete in its tendencies—lends to the Conservative party. He probably despises the villa population, the new wealthy, the lower middle class, and all the multitudes they influence, because they "look up" to the aristocracy, and respect wealth, and vote, as Charles Dickens put it, "for the Gentlemanly Interest;" but these men make up the solid core of the English Conservative party. He ignores a cardinal fact of our history, that Englishmen and Scotchmen have most of the vices, but have not that one of social envy, and are attracted, not repelled, by those who are legally allowed to be above them. They like "betters" to exist, and will follow them, while the bettership has in it any remnant of real force. When that is gone, when, with the House of Peers, the legal stronghold of the aristocratic sentiment disappears, they will either sulk, as the same class is said to do in America, or gratify their secondary instinct, which is for reality, by approving changes more sweeping than Radicals now formulate. So far from believing that Conservatism, in Lord Dunraven's sense, would be benefited by the "reformation" of the House of Lords, we believe that the number of Conservative voters would instantly decline, that strong Radicalism would be triumphant for a time, and that the Conservative Party of the future would defend other things than those which the present party is anxious to protect. "Individualism," as opposed to "Socialism" in its better sense, would much more closely describe the two ultimate parties that would arise than Conservatism and Liberalism. That, however, is only an ultimate thought. Taking short views, as politicians should, we believe that with the House of Lords much of the English ingrained respect for the hierarchical organisation of society would disappear, and with it much, if not most, of modern Conservatism. We do not share that respect, holding it to be merely a form of the worship of clothes, of artificial forces instead of real forces, and inconsistent, moreover, with the broad tendency, though not exactly with the peremptory laws of Christianity, and therefore have, as moralists, no sympathy with a House which, as politicians, we believe to be mischievous; but those are not Lord Dunraven's ideas. He wants just what we deprecate, and we cannot, therefore, accept his aid, which is offered, as we believe, under the influence of a hopeless misreading of the situation. Lord Dunraven is disinterested in sawing away at the bough he sits on, in order to preserve the tree, and does not see that but for the attraction of the shade, the owners would cut away the trunk, to grow more wheat.

ITALIAN POLITICS.

THE great experiment lately made by the Italian Government, the introduction of a low suffrage, together with scrutin de liste, has, we fear, failed, and the circumstances of the failure are worth attention. Italy, after she had been formed, started on the constitutional career with what may be called a Ten-pound franchise. The electoral right was not based, as in England, upon rental, but the payment of direct taxes to the amount of forty francs a year had an exactly similar effect; and the 600,000 electors were mostly officials, landlords, rich peasants, shopkeepers, professional persons, and rentiers, the idle men who have saved or inherited small fortunes, and who in Italy, as in France, form a much more numerous class than they do in England. This electoral body sent up Members who, on the whole, did their practical work fairly well, that is, they made an Army and a Navy, organised decent municipalities, sanctioned codes of law, and taxed themselves with a patriotism such as our own Ten-pounders displayed when they put on the Income-tax. They brought up Italian credit, till the Roman Government could raise money at four and a half per cent.; they provided for a specie currency; and they got rid entirely of the bad old system of deficits supplied by loans. Within the limits of business the Deputies worked well, and showed considerable sense; but beyond them, they shrank from action. They slurred over "the social question,"—that is, the horrible poverty of a fifth of the population, which is worse off than the people of Mayo; they refused to touch tenure, which in the old kingdom of Naples is as ill suited to national wants as that of Ireland was in 1869; and they neglected the severe supervision which alone makes an over-numerous and powerful bureaucracy beneficial to the people. Finally, as external dangers died away, they split into groups, deeply separated by personal questions, very reluctant to support any Ministry whatever, and over-greedy of patronage, and but for the peculiar ability of S. Depretis, whose genius is that of an acrobat able to ride upon four horses at once, they would have rendered government impossible. He holds the groups in a leash, making concessions to each in turn, and so, in a way, continues to get along. The groups, however, take all steadiness out of government, make initiative too difficult, and forbid statesmen to rise, unless they belong to the class which can "manage" men by appeals to their interests, prejudices, or fears.

The few men who in the last resort govern Italy, among whom the King is the central figure, grew alarmed at the situation, and true to the policy of the House of Savoy, which has always sought support in the people, they resolved to strengthen Parliament by a large reduction in the electoral qualification. They desired, what Governments so seldom desire, more "go" in the representative body. We have an impression, which we cannot prove, that some of them would have sought their end in a daring way, by openly adopting universal suffrage, but for the impossibility of passing the Bill, an impossibility produced by the dread of clerical influence entertained by the middle-class. This was not a dread felt by the democracy, which never fears itself, but it was overwhelming among the professionals, littérateurs, and wealthy men who in Italy are the active politicians. Consequently, a moderate Bill was proposed, conceding the franchise to all who paid any direct taxes, and who could read and write, a franchise often talked of, though, we think, never proposed in this country. This would have doubled the electors, and, probably, have worked like our own Five-pound Bill, but the managers of the change were not content. They either secretly suggested, or accepted with suspicious readiness, a second Bill, declaring that for two years every adult male should be legally a voter, if he demanded the privilege in the presence of three witnesses and a notary. This law granted the suffrage to every man who demanded it, if only a complaisant notary could be found, and, as S. Villari informs us in the Contemporary Review, no less than 2,125,000 persons immediately registered themselves. The suffrage was not made universal, and therefore irresistible, but it was quadrupled at a blow, and, of course, the Deputies elected under it were certain to extend the ad interim law. Considering the keenness of Italian politicians, the certainty that Deputies would not disfranchise those who had chosen them, the hold S. Depretis had over the House, and the dread of a dissolution on the old basis, it is very hard to doubt that the Italian Premier, like Mr. Disraeli on a similar occasion, was at least quite willing to accept the result, and was a consenting party to the Parliamentary "dodge." At all events, he introduced in addition the Scrutin de Liste, which he, and all Italians, taking their cue from M. Gambetta, believed to be the necessary supplement of a wide suffrage. The new Parliament was, therefore, elected by new electors in the new manner, and it is already recognised that the experiment in great part has failed. The people were not really interested. As we imagine, they care for the present only about the social question, and do not believe that Parliament, which for nearly twenty years has avoided social reform, will now buckle to the work, and in their disbelief betake themselves to individual efforts to make money. A certain distrust of legislators, too, is always noticeable among Italians, as well as a disposition to allow certain representative classes to do the work they should do for themselves. At all events, though under the pressure of the local wirepullers one adult in every four or five registered his name as an elector, only one in two electors went up to the poll. With the exception of a few districts which sent up Reds, the old constituency remained master of the situation, and, for the most part, sent up the same men. Moreover, scrutin de liste broke down. The grand justification for that system of election is that, whatever its defects, it must produce a "strong" Chamber,—that is, a large, homogeneous, and determined majority, the "lists" being accepted or rejected en bloc, and every man fearing that his name will be left out of the next list by the Central Committee. In Italy, however, localism is very strong, and politicians are not very scrupulous. The Committees of each Department arranged their lists for themselves, and, whenever there was danger of defeat, consulted their opponents, and arranged joint lists which crushed fresh opposition, and left the representation where it was. The new Chamber, therefore, is no more united than the old. S. Depretis has still to waste his great powers on the management of groups, and no new men are thrown up fit for governing work. There is a scarcity of ability, and especially of ability of the first order, which is unusual in Italy, a land where genius is endemic, but which is visible at this moment in all the three Latin countries. In them all the Parliamentary system evolves astute managers, but not men who will even try to cope with the social evils which in all three are becoming of paramount importance. With the exception of S. Minghetti, an able financier whose influence has waned, S. Depretis is the only man well in front; while a certain timidity, as of men who must conceal their real opinions, has infected all aspirants for office. They are, in fact, afraid of being crushed by the selfish action of the groups, before the body of the people have time to recognise them. A leader will, perhaps, arise, but, meanwhile, the Government is dully bourgeois, and the only party which increases is the Republican, which may yet take up the social question as the lever of power. The national freedom from impatience and the common sense about concrete affairs which mark Italians will probably save the peninsula from great misfortunes, but the lowered tone of statesmanship interferes with all progress except in the material direction. This, however, is great, more especially in the towns, although in some districts positive want, permanent want, producing the terrible disorder known as the pellagra, seems incurable, even by the emigration which has assumed such large proportions. The Government endeavour indirectly to check this, but it goes on, and is probably an evil, not from the loss of population, which increases quite fast enough, but from the subtraction from among the Italian people of the most energetic spirits. Italy wants all the men she can keep who are detached enough and instructed enough to dream of a home in a foreign land. The kind of men who made the Revolution, or swarmed in 1866 into the National Guard, or gave Garibaldi a voluntary Army, are now pouring by thousands a year into the valley of the River Plate, where they will eat out the Spaniards, as in the Italian Tyrol they eat out the Germans.

FRENCH SCHOOLBOYS.

THE Times of Wednesday contained a curious and suggestive account of the rival systems of education under which French boys of the middle and upper classes are brought up. Neither of them promises well for the national future, though both are strangely characteristic of French ways of thinking and acting. The occasion which has suggested the article is the epidemic of insubordination that has lately broken out in the Lycées, or State schools. The first symptom of this was a mutiny, some eighteen months ago, at the Lycée Henri IV.; and the latest, the outbreak the other day at the Lycée Louis le Grand. Between these two there have been riots in the lycées of Toulouse, Valenciennes, and Montpellier, and a schoolboys' congress at Bordeaux, which was attended by delegates from the upper forms of twenty-seven lycées, and ended in a series of resolutions condemning every detail of school management and discipline. The mutiny at the Lycée Henri IV. took the form of resistance to the rule which obliges the Catholic boys in the State schools to hear Mass and to go to Confession. In other cases, the badness of the dietary was the excuse. The boys asked for a dish of roast meat, in addition to the bouillon and haricot beans which form the staple of their dinners. The real cause probably of all the outbreaks is the intolerable dullness of life in a lycée. The boys have only their work to interest them, and to a large proportion in every school this is tantamount to saying that they have nothing to interest them. Before the Revolution, the Lycées had large playgrounds, and it is only since these were sold by the Revolutionary Government that French boys have been characterised by their present total ignorance of games. Everything in a lycée has to be calculated closely, and the item on which money has been most consistently saved is space. Consequently, the hours when the boys are not at work are not play-hours. They are spent in dusty, crowded yards, in which games are impossible. Their only real amusement is found in visits to the cafés, when they can get leave to go into the town; and reading bad novels, when they are kept within the school bound. It is, perhaps, from a consciousness how little else there is for them to do, that the authorities take no notice of the manner in which the boys spend their holidays. If a master sees a boy drinking absinthe in a café, he regards it as no business of his.

These defects in the Lycées give the Church an opportunity of which she has made liberal use. The collège, which is the general name for a school conducted by the Clergy, is in many ways a marked contrast to the Lycée. The discipline is more human, and less military; the buildings are more like a home, and less like a barrack; the boys are treated as though they possessed bodies and souls, as well as minds; they have ample playgrounds, and abundance of games. In no point is this superiority more conspicuous than in the quality of the Ushers. In the Lycées, they are regarded by the boys as so many spies, and despised and hated accordingly. In the Collèges "the usher is a young priest or religious brother, perhaps a future Bishop and Cardinal. He is always young, active, and intelligent, else he would not be selected for the post. He mixes with the boys in all their games; he strives to make himself popular with them; he becomes their confidant and monitor." So far, the Church seems to be fully alive to the policy of making the Collèges popular. In other ways, however, she uses her advantage strangely. Even as it is, there are Republicans who, for one reason or another, send their sons to a collège rather than to a lycée. They think the education better; or they are not quite easy at the thought of the moral training a boy is likely to get at a lycée; or they like the better manners which are taught at the Collèges, or the higher social standing which belongs to them; or they wish to please their wives, or, perhaps, the boy himself. It might have been thought that the Clergy would lay themselves out to make things additionally smooth for men of this type; that they would minimise the political and religious distinctions between the Collèges and the Lycées, so far as these distinctions do not involve admitted questions of principle; that they would do their best to deprive the act of sending a son to a collège, instead of to a lycée, of some, at least, of the compromising significance which now belongs to it, and rather increase than diminish the freedom enjoyed by the boys. As a matter of fact, they have done none of these things. It is a much more marked thing for a Frenchman to send his son to a collège now than it was a few years ago, because the Collèges have "grown to be centres of opposition to the Government of the day, very hot-beds of anti-Republican propaganda." The Clergy set more store by the impression they make upon the boys entrusted to them, than they do by the number of boys whom they have the opportunity of impressing. They would rather, apparently, make ten violent anti-Republicans than twenty Moderates, who, so long as they have the kind of Government they like, do not care what it is called. This preference deserves to be noted, because it shows how the French Clergy read the signs of the times. If they thought that the Republic would last, they would, no doubt, take a different line; they identify themselves so frankly with its bitterest opponents, because they think that by so doing they can contribute effectually to its downfall. They have shown themselves on many occasions so destitute of political foresight, that we are not at all sure that their taking this view is not a good sign for the stability of the Republic; still, that they take it, is worthy of remark. If they were all Legitimists, it would mean nothing, because the Legitimists have not given up the hope that a miracle may yet be worked in the Comte de Chambord's favour. But the French Clergy are by no means politicians first and Clerics afterwards; on the contrary, their politics are very apt to be kept in strict subjection to their theories of what is best for the Church. Their attitude towards the Republic at least testifies to two things,—their conviction that the Republic will never be anything but an enemy, and their belief that it is not an enemy whom it will long be necessary to conciliate.

Besides the strong political colour which the Clergy are more and more giving to the Collèges, we learn from the writer in the Times that their internal discipline has been made much stricter. They require that day boarders up to the age of eighteen shall daily be brought to the collège and fetched away from it, and that they shall come to the collège on Sunday mornings, for Mass and instruction. They stipulate that their pupils during the holidays, or when they are on leave, shall never enter a café, except in charge of some person; and shall not read prohibited books, or associate with unbelievers. They expect that the parents shall take care that their sons say their prayers regularly, when they are at home or when they are at school. And to ensure obedience to these directions, they require the boys, when the school meets again after the holidays, to make a full confession of all that they have done since they went home, in order that they may know what warning to give their parents before the next holidays. This seems a very strange way of making the Collèges popular, either with parents or children. Probably it is not, like the political tone given to the Collèges, a piece of deliberate calculation, but merely an example of a kind of precise Puritanism which seems to be a characteristic of the French Clergy,—of the feeling which leads them, in the books of devotion they put into the hands of their flocks, to put going to balls or to the theatre under the head of sins to be confessed and repented of. They must know perfectly well that the laity will continue to go to balls and to the theatre; but they seem to derive an inconsistent satisfaction from the contemplation of this useless prohibition.

MRS. CARLYLE.

IF Mrs. Carlyle married for ambition, as Mr. Froude reports, it is probable that she has gained what most ambitious people hope to gain,—whether they ultimately value what they have gained or not,—a name of her own in literature, and not merely the name of a faithful companion to her famous husband. Never were letters, unless they were the letters of Cowper, so full of fascination as Mrs. Carlyle's. Her letters surpass those of her husband in every quality which letters should have except vividness,—in variety, naturalness, lightness of touch; in the rapid, but never abrupt, change from tender to satirical, from satirical to imaginative, and from imaginative, again, to the keen, shrewd, matter-of-fact of mother-wit; while in a few of them there is a wild gipsy kind of waywardness which is of course entirely foreign to Mr. Carlyle's sphere. But we are not going to discuss Mrs. Carlyle's letters, but to attempt to reconstruct, so far as it is possible, from the insight they give, the figure of the author of the letters, who, while linked with a man of marvellous, though narrow genius, made for herself,—quite unconsciously too,—a fame which shines distinctly enough even in the immediate neighbourhood of his; and which shines by no reflected light.

We are told in these volumes that Mrs. Carlyle's grandmother was grandniece of a notable gipsy, Matthew Baillie, who came to be hanged, and whose wife was the original of Scott's "Meg Merrilies." Mr. W. E. Forster, to whom Mrs. Carlyle mentioned this gipsy descent, is said to have replied that this information was the first thing to make her mind intelligible to him as a cross between that of a gipsy and that of John Knox (from whom also she was descended). But, so far as we can see, there was but little of John Knox in Mrs. Carlyle. She had no taste for abstract doctrine, or, indeed, for the abstract in any shape. Nor was she didactic. The gipsy clearly predominated in her over the Calvinist divine. Like the gipsies, she loved a certain wilful order, an order improvised out of chaos; and one great source of her suffering in the extreme repression of her life with Carlyle was that he had no love for these snatches of fitful and changeful energy, and wanted nothing so much as constant protection against surprise. A brother of General Cavaignac, who was intimate with the Carlyles, used to say of Mrs. Carlyle that hers was a genius for "detail"; and so it was,—as well for the imagination as for the execution of detail. She could always see how much really skilful detail could effect; and to this, we believe, she owed much of her extraordinary power of managing others,—ranging from the power of pacifying Carlyle to the power of "writing-down a parrot." Considering how wonderfully tender and accessible were her sympathies,—at one time she, justly enough, called her head "a perfect chaos of other people's disasters and despairs,"—her answer to the question, "Why do women marry?"—because, "like the great Wallenstein, they do not find scope enough for their genius and qualities in an easy life," would scarcely have been a sufficient one, for she could have found scope for her genius and qualities in almost any life. But undoubtedly the enormous difficulties of engineering Carlyle's life for him, did make an impression on her ambitious imagination, and launched her into the pursuit of an ideal which she often found quite too hard for her. Perhaps the reason why it was often too hard for her was her gipsy pride. As a Haddington cooper told her twenty years after her departure from Haddington, she had been even as a girl "not just to call proud,—very reserved in her company," and it was this proud and reserved side of her which rendered her life with Carlyle often so much more unhappy than it otherwise need have been. For though she was sweet, pitiful, and fascinating to those who leaned on her, she had a keen sense of her own dignity, and could not endure to be herself treated as a mere detail of life; and this was how Carlyle not unfrequently treated her. What she loved best was to queen it over men, and Carlyle was not the man to let his wife queen it over him. And how she could queen it! Long after she was a middle-aged woman, she could pick up chance acquaintances in a coach, and so fascinate them, that when she left her parasol in that coach, one would compete eagerly and secretly against the other for the chance of recovering and restoring it to her. In her old age,—indeed, a year or two before her death,—when she had partially recovered from a most dangerous illness, middle-aged men of the world burst into tears at the sight of her whom they had never hoped to see again, and quivered all over with the joy of recovering her. She owed this power of fascination, no doubt, partly to her ready tenderness of sympathy, partly to her volleys of gentle scorn. It is clear that women who cannot make themselves feared, seldom gain the same empire as those who can make themselves feared as well as loved. It was this double power obviously which gave Lady Harriet Baring, afterwards Lady Ashburton, that victory over Mrs. Carlyle which embittered some eight years or so of Mrs. Carlyle's life. Lady Harriet, though she can hardly have had Mrs. Carlyle's literary power,—otherwise some of her letters at least would surely have been preserved,—combined with her intellectual brightness and wit the great advantage of genuine high-breeding, an advantage which Mr. Carlyle, with his vivid perceptions and his own peasant-breeding, was the first to perceive and enjoy. That was how Lady Harriet placed Mrs. Carlyle at a disadvantage, for Mrs. Carlyle, thorough lady as she was, had never queened it over the kind of men who were at Lady Harriet's feet, and had, in spite of that pride and reserve which distinguished her as a middle-class woman, nothing like the distinction which marked her rival. And bitterly did Mrs. Carlyle feel the defeat. It is obvious that she, who never fretted over the most homely tasks before, chafed passionately against having—for example—to mend Mr. Carlyle's trowsers at the very time when Mr. Carlyle wanted to go and worship a woman to whom servile domestic tasks were things of little meaning,—rumours of the servants' hall. For, we do not believe that the sore heart which Mrs. Carlyle bore about with her through some seven or eight years of her married life, would have been anything like as sore as it was through jealousy alone. She was not a jealous woman, and we should doubt if she had any of that passionate feeling for her husband which stirs jealousy to its depths. But she was a very proud woman, and it crushed and humiliated her to be slaving for the man who was so captivated by the air of royalty borne by one who had never thus slaved for him. It is the queen trodden under the foot of a conquering queen, who groans so bitterly in Mrs. Carlyle's diary of 1855. And she groans, as she is well aware, not as that conquering queen, if she in her turn had been trodden down, would groan, but with less scorn for herself and more of middle-class self-pity, and more, too, of those feminine consolations which she derived from dwelling on her own power of painting her misery. Mrs. Carlyle never succumbs to her misery. She fights it vindictively. Throughout it you see that it is Mr. Carlyle's indifference to her, his scorn, as she understood it, his cool exactingness when she felt that the right to exact was hers rather than his, that stung her to the quick. Had anything but her personal pride been wounded, she would hardly have suffered so much. As it was, she never fathomed the deepest depth of wretchedness, for she never quite lost the pleasure of painting vividly the inward wrath with which she was overflowing at this preference of the aristocratic queen to the gipsy queen of Carlyle's earlier life. And evidently, too, she frequently met Carlyle's imperious exigence with rapier thrusts that wounded him keenly.

We have said that Mrs. Carlyle had little conversance with dogma or creed of any kind, but she had imagination enough and critical faculty enough to let in gleams of speculative wonder on her life, and some of these sceptical touches have a marvellous force of their own. In the dialogue between her watch and her canary, she makes the watch reprove the canary for complaining of its prison. "Alas, my bird! here sit prisoners. There, also, do prisoners sit. This world is all prison, the only difference for those who inhabit it being in the size and aspect of the cells; while some of these stand revealed in cold, strong nakedness for what they really are, others are painted to look like sky overhead and open country all around, but the bare and the painted walls are alike impassable, and fall away only at the coming of the Angel of Death." Nothing could better present her impression of the Universe, for while Mrs. Carlyle had apparently no faith but an imaginative one, she had imagination enough to paint the bare walls of her universe for herself, and with a fresco of no mean beauty. She was keen enough to see through the hollowness of false creeds, and to penetrate now and then to some of the more beautiful aspects of true creeds; but even while she could appreciate the dreariness of a Church of which she could say, "Anything so like the burial-place of revealed religion you have never seen, nor a rector more fit to read the burial service," she was quite unprepared to contend that there should not be a burial-place prepared for revealed religion, and that the time for reading its burial service had not arrived. Her religion consisted in glimpses of noble ideals, and in the gracious human charities for which, when her pride was not touched, she was always more than ready. She had a humour, too, that combined with her natural tenderness to make life, by fitful gleams, radiant as well as interesting. But on the whole, it is the gipsy queen whom we see in her,—the wild lively queen whose mission it was to bring order out of chaos by the help of her fine genius for "details,"—who fascinated most men's hearts but smarted under her inferiority to a choicer type of queenhood, and who chafed bitterly against the sense of imprisonment which the constant society of such a man as Carlyle necessarily imposed on a character so full of vivacity, and so eager to feel the consciousness of its own power. Such is the picture impressed on the mind by the perusal of Mrs. Carlyle's frank, charming, playful, and bitter letters, eloquent now with tenderness, and now, again, with impatient wrath and a mortification hardly rising to the point of scorn.

A GLIMPSE INTO RUSSIAN CHARACTER.

THOSE who believe that the suppression of self is in and by itself a great virtue, or as some of the more fanatical "altruists" say, is the sum and substance of Christianity, should read "Underground Russia," by "Stepniak," the former editor of the Russian Terrorist paper Land and Liberty. They will find it full, for them especially, of material for thought. It is full of interest for everybody, for if we could all comprehend clearly the Slav nature, we should understand what will one day be a tremendous factor in the world's history, and there has hitherto been no glimpse into that nature so instructive as that afforded by the Nihilist movement. If we could only get at the secret hearts of the few hundred men—we doubt if there are a thousand in all—directly affiliated to the Revolutionary conspiracy, the ringleaders, as we may call them, we should perceive more alike of the merits and defects of the Russian character than reams of despatches, or volumes of travels, or even a careful study of Russian novels will ever teach us. These men are by the necessity of their position mentally without clothes. They have no inclination, and very little power to conceal anything. Utterly at war with the past and present, with the system of society and the religious idea, with all habits, all conventions, and nearly all accepted moralities, they are compelled to fall back on instincts; and if those are separate, we may be pretty sure that the something separate which makes the essence of national character, round which institutions, manners, and history gather like clothes, lies revealed before us. We are bound to say that we see this separateness displayed in "Underground Russia," and that, despite a certain contempt for the intellectual views of the Terrorists as revealed by themselves, and an abhorrence of their perverted morality, we find in the revelations of the book, ground for belief that the Russian character has in it some traits of a quite peculiar nobleness and charm. A writer in the Revue des Deux Mondes recently said that whenever the Slavonic race had spoken its "great word," it would be found to be a "religious one," and there is a sense in which that apophthegm is, to those who know Nihilism, beyond dispute. It is not the true sense, for "religion" should mean not the effacement of self in itself, but the effacement of self before a power recognised to be nobler than self; and that is not the Nihilist impulse. But if by religion we understand, as all Hindoos, for example, do, a capacity for faith so strong that action follows of necessity, and that when the faith demands it, self is crushed down till it is paralysed, hardly perceptible, or even dead, then the French essayist is justified. The Russian people is one which, if Stepniak is not a mere romancer—and the book, for all its adjectives, strikes us as true—if it accepted obedience to the Czar as the dominant idea, the true expression of faith, would hurl itself into the Neva without a thought, that he might pass over dry-shod. One can understand as one reads "Underground Russia," and especially when pondering the unconscious evidence it affords, how a sect like the Skoptzi, the Self-mutilators, has grown to a large community, how Russians have been found to die on the gallows for the right to spell "Jesus" with two j's; how there once arose in the South a sect with suicide for creed, which actually alarmed the authorities by the increase it made in local mortality. The Russian, as portrayed here, has two instinctive specialties. The relation between thought and action is in him terribly close, so close that thought is usually immature, and when a thought has possession of him, self is totally suppressed. These Nihilists, for example, having forgotten God—all educated Russians, says Stepniak, are Materialists, and certainly all Nihilists are—have accepted as their dominant idea or faith that, to bring happiness or even endurable existence to the Russian millions, the existing method of government must be swept totally away. That state of opinion is, of course, quite conceivable, and should lead, like any other new faith, to relentless intellectual propaganda, as, indeed, in Belgium, France, and Germany it does. Being Russians, however, the Nihilists are impelled instantly to correlate thought and action, and propagation by teaching being slow, they spring on the quickest and strongest instrument they can find, which is necessarily Terror. The faith may be made quickly executive through destruction, therefore destruction must for the time be part of the faith. It becomes part of it, and in a moment, as it were, all who hold it, who just before were virtuous and unpractical professors rather than politicians, become ruthless assassins, incendiaries, conspirators laying the axe alike to evil and good, because it exists. Murder—plain murder, and not only the assassination of Kings—becomes for them only an act, and, being required by their belief, is acted. The right of arson is not one they discuss even in thought, they assume it; and though we see no plain reference to it, we do not doubt, from the facts at Odessa and Kief, that Stepniak, if money needful for the cause were wanting, would admit that he approved theft or forgery to obtain it, at least if the victim were a Department of the State. Even this state of mind is not without examples. We do not suppose that Philip II. of Spain, with Catholicism at stake, would have hesitated at murder, or fire-raising, or forgery, and, in fact, he did not hesitate at the two first. But here comes in the strange peculiarity of the case. These Nihilists are not in the least like Philip II. They are men who possess in a degree almost unparalleled that power of self-abnegation, of suppressing the carnal man, as Christian doctors say, which seems to many men, not unreasonably, the perfection of virtue. They are murderers who go to the gallows smiling and gentle; fire-raisers who would jump into the blazing houses, if that would help; thieves who would regard the abstraction of a copper coin from the stolen money for their own indulgence as a disgraceful crime. All of them hold the doctrine of free-love, most of them find female companions essential to their plans, but many of them, if not all, in order to devote themselves more exclusively to their work, treat them as their sisters. Imagine a millionaire who would sanction and help a murder, approve fire-raising, and not condemn theft from a Treasury, and who, holding and acting on those opinions, practises for years the most relentless parsimony towards himself, in order that all he possesses may go in furtherance of an idea which he hopes will bring good to men whom he thinks oppressed. Such

"His determination not to spend a single farthing of the money with which he could serve the cause, was such, that he never indulged in an omnibus, to say nothing of a cab, which costs so little with us that every workman takes one on Sunday. I remember that one day he showed us two articles, forming part of his dress-suit, which he wore when, owing to his position, he was compelled to pay a visit to the Governor of Cernigov, or to one of the heads of the Superior Police. They were a pair of gloves and an opera-hat. The gloves were of a very delicate ash-colour, and seemed just purchased. He, however, told us that he had already had them for three years, and smilingly explained to us the little artifices he adopted to keep them always new. The hat was a much more serious matter, for its spring had been broken a whole year, and he put off the expense of purchasing a new one from day to day, because he always found that he could employ his money better. Meanwhile, to keep up his dignity, he entered the drawing-room holding his opera-hat under his arm, his eternal leather cap, which he wore summer and winter alike, being in his pocket. When he passed into the street, he advanced a few steps with his head uncovered, as though he had to smooth his disarranged hair, until, being assured that he was not observed, he drew the famous cap from his pocket."

And Demetrius is by no means the most extraordinary example. The Terrorist Nihilists have sympathisers in all ranks, and among them men who, unable from one cause or another to take any active part, devote themselves to "concealing" the executive agents of the Revolutionary Committee. One of these was Tarakanoff—the names are false—an officer in the Ministry of the Interior, who was constitutionally so cowardly that he never rode or crossed the Neva, or could keep from trembling when in the slightest danger; yet this man, with the scaffold or Siberia full before him, steadily made of his apartment a refuge for the Terrorists. Stepniak, who was once sheltered by him, noticed that Tarakanoff never slept, and on the second day asked him the cause:—

"He had, in fact, a woeful aspect. He was pale, almost yellowish; his eyes were sunken; his look was dejected. 'What is the matter with you?' I asked.—'Nothing.' 'Nothing! Why, you have the face of a corpse, and you did not sleep before four o'clock.'—'Say rather that I did not sleep all night.' 'But you must be ill, then?'—'No; I can never sleep when there is any one with me.' Then I understood all. I took his hand and shook it warmly. 'I thank you with all my heart,' I said; 'but I will not cause you so much trouble, and at the very first moment I will go away.'—'No, no! certainly not; certainly not. If I had imagined what you were going to say, I would have concealed it. You must remain. It is nothing.' 'But you may fall ill.'—'Don't give it a thought. I can sleep by day, or, better still, take some medicine.' I learnt afterwards, in fact, that in such cases he took chloral, when he could bear up no longer."

This was no isolated instance. Tarakanoff received all refugees who applied, sometimes kept them weeks, during which he never slept, and was known by all Nihilists to be the most devoted of adherents. Casabianca did nothing nobler, yet the self-denial was displayed to shelter men who, judged not by human laws, but by the human conscience, were all criminals, though among them were men who for years threw aside all hopes and all comforts to live among the peasants and artisans, and so win them to the cause. We need not say such men were not informers, or that they rejected life when offered them on condition of petitioning the Emperor for pardon. That would have been to acknowledge the Emperor's authority. In fact, with the Russian Nihilists selfishness disappears.

That self-suppression so complete should have so little result in virtue, and especially in the virtue of mercy, may seem strange, but after all, it is not beyond explanation. The mere suppression of self, if it be not performed in obedience to a nature loftier than our own, can produce little good result, for it must then be performed in obedience to self of another kind, which may not be good at all. The Russian Nihilist, in starving for years, or ascending the scaffold, or coldly facing Siberia, does but compel himself to obey himself, and has no proof whatever that the self which commands is any better than the self coerced into obedience. He assumes that the instinct of pity for the millions which dominates him is nobler than the instinct which forbids murder; and the assumption has, upon his theory of the universe, as well as upon ours, absolutely no ground. There is no evidence for it in human experience, no proof of it in success, no consensus in favour of it on the part of the wise. It is simply an idea, as self-generated as the idea of a man without food that he may take it; and in yielding to it the Nihilist suppresses not himself, but only a bit of himself,—and that bit which, being the uniform outcome of good training continued through ages, is presumably the best bit. We do not think persistent parsimony in buying food in order to buy fine ribbons a noble virtue, and we do not see why —religion being a fable—the sacrifice of one set of aspirations for the sake of gratifying another set should be noble either. It is true the Nihilist says and thinks that he is acting for the benefit of the community, but that is only an opinion, in proof of which he can produce no evidence, and which may be, and probably is entirely imaginary. The mere disinterestedness displayed is no evidence, for if it were, the Hindoo faquir who holds up his arm till it withers, in order that flesh may not rule spirit, or still more, the contemplative nun who lies daily for hours stretched before the Cross in order to help towards the expiation of human sin, is as noble as the Nihilist. He would reject that last comparison with scorn, because he would say the nun is only dreaming; but why, evidence other than supernatural being absent in both cases, are her dreams less realities than his? Prima facie, they are more so, for he is suppressing, and knows he is suppressing, the good self as well as the bad self, the instinct which forbids murder, as well as the instinct which induces the timid to save themselves from pain. That instinct the Nihilist ought to respect, for if such instincts are nullities, why pity the poor?—who, again, if their humanity, of which conscience is a part, is valueless, are not worth all this trouble. That many of the Russian Terrorists are among the moral enigmas of the age, and widely distinguished from any other Anarchists, we frankly acknowledge, but why they are to be admired on their own theory we do not see. On ours, they are men who suppress their own best instincts and do positive evil, in order that problematical good may come.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE PAYMENT OF AUTHORS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Mr. Kegan Paul, in his article in the Fortnightly Review on "The Production and Life of Books," tells us many things which will interest, in the first place, writers of books, in themselves no inconsiderable public, and, in the second, readers generally. He devotes one paragraph to the payment of authors, or rather to the methods of payment. On this subject I should like, with your leave, to say something, which shall be, in part, drawn from my own experiences.

The quarrel of authors against publishers is, I suppose, only one form of the complaint, which must be almost as old as society itself, of labour against capital. If authors have contrived to accentuate it, to make it seem more piteous, more intense, it is because whatever else they may have lacked, they have not lacked the power of expression. But it really comes to the old story. Labour cannot wait, must have something on which to live from day to day, and capital takes advantage of its necessities. The author is worse off than some of those who live by the work of the brain, but not than all. He is certainly more favourably situated than the inventor. His stock-in-trade is of the simplest and most inexpensive kind. If he does not always know whether his work is valuable, he certainly knows whether it is original, and is spared the bitter disappointment of finding that a discovery, genuine as far as he himself is concerned, has been long since anticipated. And he can protect his property without a cumbrous and costly machinery. But he certainly suffers from having to wait longer than those who follow other professions. The barrister sometimes, I suppose, gets his fees in ready money, and generally receives them, if he receives them at all, within a year. Solicitors are supposed to have means at hand for securing the payment of their services, and not to suffer seriously from delay. If the rank and file of the medical profession have to wait sometimes a long time for their earnings, and it is to be feared that some of them wait very long indeed, the chiefs, the consulting surgeons and physicians, receive a payment which is enviably ample, speedy, and safe. But an author, if he publishes on the system of "half-profits," which, notwithstanding Mr. Kegan Paul's emphatic condemnation of it, is still very common, cannot possibly have a speedy return. I will suppose myself to be devoting the first half of 1883 to the production of a book. It will issue from the press about October, and if the subject be one of general and immediate interest, will meet with a remunerative sale within the six months following. In October, 1884, I shall receive from the publisher my account, made up to the end of June, and may look for payment in December or, it may be, January, 1885. Possibly the book, though one of real worth, may be of a kind that makes its way into circulation but slowly. In this case, the remunerative sale will be postponed till June, 1885, and the payment till January, 1886. I have actually published a book which, though successful, brought me no return for five years.

Mr. Paul, as I have said, condemns the system of "half-profit." It is, he says, "misleading and unsatisfactory." It must entail upon the publisher a great amount of trouble, and the author, apart from the long delay which it aggravates, if it does not cause, has no reason to love it. An account of items which there are no possible means of checking is an obvious absurdity. It is only natural to vaguely suspect the charges which it is impossible to verify. Are these prices for printing, for paper, for binding, real or nominal, as nominal as the "publishing price" of a book? And this charge for advertising, how is it made up? Do not the newspapers allow a considerable "commission," of which the publisher, not the author, gets the benefit? Why should I be debited, as I remember I once was, with a "share of a trade dinner," or with "trade expenses," surely the concern of the publisher only?

The "royalty" system which Mr. Paul advocates has the merit of simplicity and economy of trouble. The publisher has only, as regards the author, to keep an account of the copies sold. Payment might be made, I suppose, within a short time of a certain number having been reached, in the case of a first edition, or within a stipulated time after the publication of a second or subsequent edition. My own experience of the royalty system has been perfectly satisfactory.

But either the "half-profit" or the "royalty" system is to be chosen, rather than the "sale of copyright." Mr. Paul prefers this for a certain class of books, as, for instance, for the "ordinary novel." Possibly he is right, though what may seem at the time to be an "ordinary" novel may turn out in the end to be something very extraordinary. If "Jane Eyre" or the "Scenes of Clerical Life" had been sold for a lump sum, the arrangement would not have been by any means "good for the author," to use Mr. Paul's expression. My own experience on this point is so striking, that I give it in some detail, though I cannot hope that experience will avail much, in the face of necessity. Something like a quarter of a century ago, I published a volume which achieved a considerable success, and still holds its ground. My name was then unknown, and I had to pay the publisher a certain sum by way of guarantee against loss. Four years afterwards I sold the copyright, receiving for it and for other work done just as much as I had advanced, the advance being repaid at the same time. I was very poor in those days; I wanted very much to take my wife and children into the country, but had not the means. Then, on a day when we were all wearying for fresh air, came the cheque. I had not asked for it; it was offered by the publisher. I do not blame him; he took the legitimate advantage which every trader takes of his own means and the workman's wants. But it was a good bargain for him, and a bad one for me. I know this to a certainty, because I have since published a precisely similar volume, which had had about the same measure of success. Of this I have retained the copyright, and I receive from it annually nearly as much as I got for the fee-simple of the other.

I can give, again from my own experience, another instance to the same effect. Some years ago, I wrote or compiled sundry small books. Other gentlemen who were associated with me did the same. They sold their copyrights for, say, £20 a piece (I do not give the true figures, not wishing my good friend the publisher to identify me, but I guarantee their proportional accuracy). I retained mine; and I now annually receive for some of these volumes more than the total sum paid to my colleagues, while in one case the income has amounted to nearly three times as much.

Let me say, then, to my brother-authors, with all possible emphasis, don't sell your copyright!—I am, Sir, &c.,

AN AUTHOR.

M. DE CYON ON VIVISECTION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—From the discourteous and thoughtless nature of Dr. Cyon's article in the Contemporary Review of this month, and the naïveté of the doctor's statements, it will probably, on the whole, prove more injurious to his friends than his enemies. There are, however, some misrepresentations in it which I think ought not to pass unnoticed by the Anti-vivisectionists.

Firstly, with regard to the plates in his work, which he says have been reproduced on a placard. When he tells us that these plates are, "of course, drawn from the dead body of the animals,"

He probably is speaking the literal truth as regards the plates, but in as far as he wishes us to infer that the operations they represent were done on the dead body, he is saying what his book shows to be untrue. For, concerning one of the plates (No. xv.), I find on p. 264 of the work the following paragraph:—

"If the experiment is made only for demonstration, one can drug the animal beforehand with chloral, chloroform, or curari; and if the last-named poison is applied, artificial respiration must be used. If, on the other hand, one wishes to use the experiment for purposes of observation, particularly if the investigation concerns the influence of the circulation on the activity of the glands, it is better to avoid these drugs, on account of their influence on the circulation. One should choose for the experiment strong, lively animals, which have been well-fed for a few days previously."

Can our innocent Professor understand that it is not the pictures that we object to, but the experiments which they illustrate?

Again, as regards the rules for the guidance of vivisectioners, which he quotes from his work as follows:—

"If, then, all discussion of the legitimacy of vivisection is idle, on the other hand the experimenter must never lose sight of [the original is 'nicht ganz ausser Acht lassen'] these two points:—1. Never to attempt a vivisection without having first tried to attain by other means the object in view. This holds good especially in the case of mere demonstration. 2. Wherever the nature of the experiment admits of it, always to use anaesthetics, such as chloral, chloroform, opium, &c."

Dr. de Cyon is particular to inform us that these words were written "long before the agitation against vivisection sprang up in England." This may or may not be true, according to the date which one fixes for the commencement of the agitation. That they were not written before "discussion" on the subject had sprung up, his own words show, and the juxtaposition of the two ideas in his book more than implies that the "discussion" and the insertion of these two rules were not unconnected in his mind.

With reference to the rules themselves, the first, holding good especially in the case of demonstration, presumably applies less to original research, and, taken with the other, may even signify that, where the nature of the experiment requires it, vivisection may be made without anaesthetics, even for mere demonstration, in which opinion Dr. Cyon will find himself in opposition to all his English brethren, who were, I believe, unanimous before the Royal Commission in condemning such a practice.

The second rule, too, brings little satisfaction to those who know, from these and other similar books, how numerous are the experiments—including many of the most painful on record, and all of long duration—in which anaesthetics cannot be used, and how trivial are the objects which are considered by physiologists sufficient to justify these painful experiments.

If any other evidence than his own article is needed of the spirit in which Dr. de Cyon approaches the subject—a spirit not necessarily of intentional cruelty, but of great indifference to the interests, not only of animals, but also of human beings, when they clash with a scientific object—it can be found in the words immediately preceding these two "humane" rules, of which I give the following translation:—

"The medical man, who speaks with horror of the torture of animals in physiological experiments, will do well to remember how often he has prescribed most repulsive, and not always safe, treatment for a patient, in order to obtain some insight into its effect. Many a surgical operation is performed less for the benefit of the patient than for the service of science; and the utility of the knowledge aimed at thereby is often much more trifling than that attained by vivisection of an animal."

ERNEST BELL, (M.A., Camb.)

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—That secrets which have been whispered in the ear should be "proclaimed on the housetops" has, no doubt, always been an unpleasing prophecy for guilty consciences. It was reserved, however, I think for Vivisectioners to entertain the liveliest aversion to finding their operations, performed in closed laboratories, discussed in Parliament, and diagrams intended to illustrate sumptuous manuals for fellow-physiologists posted life-size over the hoardings of London. Professor Owen was so impressed by the disagreeability of this kind of thing, that he wrote last year a vivid, albeit fanciful, description of a certain "Vision of Judgment" which he experienced in Seven Dials, where the opinion of the inhabitants on experimental physiology was expressed with a candour which obviously startled their venerable auditor. Now, we find Professor de Cyon, in the Contemporary Review, still suffering, after five years, from the same short burst of street celebrity; and as his statements on the matter require some little correction, and were the only ones left unanswered in the second article in the same review, I will beg your kind permission to reply to them in the Spectator.

The great importance of the distinction between an "illustrous" and an "illustrated" physiologist must be keenly felt by M. de Cyon, since he dedicates, first, half a page (p. 500), and then a whole page (p. 502-3) to his wrongs in the matter, and tells us frankly he "shall never forget the painful impression" he received some years ago, when one of his most eminent fellow-labourers in London sent him a letter in which he excused himself for keeping silence about his book, much as he wished to speak of it, on the ground that he was afraid of exasperating public opinion." And yet while Professor de Cyon was thus snuffed out by his "eminent fellow-labourer," he was, oh, cruel fate! denied the benefit of this "modest effacement," for his book did not escape the Anti-Vivisectionists, who utilised the plates, which they got up after a fashion of their own, and placarded in all the railway stations, with the taking title, "The Horrors of Vivisection!"

I must here remark that if the "eminent fellow-labourers" in England with whom M. de Cyon is in such close communication told him that "The Horrors of Vivisection" were placarded in the railway stations, they must have treated him even as they are wont to treat the profane and vulgar public, with statements "accurate enough for scientific purposes," but for no other. I happen to know that no illustrations of vivisection, good, bad, or indifferent, were ever admitted for exhibition at the railway stations.

But to proceed. M. de Cyon next tells us, in the following page, returning to the painful subject, that some years ago "his English friends," (how many friends has not a Continental vivisectioner, even the worst in England, so that, like Goltz, he may even dedicate a book to them?) sent him a placard purporting "to contain drawings from his Physiologische Methodik, as they had appeared in certain illustrated papers. These placards had been posted up by hundreds of thousands in every corner of the kingdom."

Now, Sir, whether the circulation of the Police News reaches "hundreds of thousands," or extends to every "corner of the kingdom," I am not competent to affirm; but it was, to the best of my knowledge and belief, exclusively in that "certain illustrated paper" that there appeared the clever though somewhat rough sketches of supposed scenes in a vivisectioner's laboratory. The Professors and students were depicted (of course out of the moral consciousness of the Police News artist) decidedly in an unflattering manner; but the condition of their victims was copied fairly enough from M. de Cyon's work. I regret that at this distant date I do not know where to lay my hand on these now historical woodcuts, though at the time I procured a good many clean ones, which afforded delight to our Central and East-London allies, in whose shop windows, I believe, they occasionally formed an attraction. Little did I imagine that the illustrious—and illustrated—Professor would ever come forward, and in the pages of the great Contemporary Review pen such a complaint against them as this delicious morçeau,—"The Professor who is supposed to represent me," says M. de Cyon, "is a shabby old man, with a pimpled face and spectacles. I was thirty-two when my book appeared!" Alas! poor injured M. de Cyon! Not only presented to the English public in "hundreds of thousands" of pictures, engaged in his favourite occupation of cutting up living animals—bad as this would be, divine philosophy might help him to bear it—but to be represented as a "shabby old man, with pimpled face and spectacles," and this when he was only thirty-two! It really was more than French physiological nature would be expected to bear. But then, likenesses of the characters who usually figure in the Police News are, I fear, seldom appreciated by their originals.

Seriously, the real blow struck at M. de Cyon, and through him at Vivisection, was the exhibition in February, 1877, of three hundred large posters over the hoardings of London. These posters were life-sized transcripts, carefully made under the supervision of an experienced physiologist, of the plates in M. de Cyon's great "Methodik." When a writer in the Globe newspaper ventured to describe them disparagingly, I publicly offered him in the same journal £10 from my own pocket to point out a single line exaggerated or altered in any way from the original. Needless to say, the challenge was never accepted.

It is enough to look at the plates (which we retain, for possible future use) to be quite sure that they, at all events, do not, as M. de Cyon would have his readers believe, merely reproduce diagrams of dead animals intended for anatomical study. Even vivisectionists, I presume, do not muzzle with elaborate apparatus, or continue to pump air into the lungs of dogs and rabbits whose agonies are over for ever. The experiments in question are, moreover, altogether familiar things; for it must be remembered that these hideous operations are not the exceptional and casual resource of a baffled physiologist, but the regular stock studies, which each tyro in succession, as he takes up one branch or other of the subject, goes through, just as a student of music plays his scales and exercises.—I am, Sir, &c.,

MR. RUSSELL ON VIVISECTION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The Times of yesterday, in an article on the Vivisection debate, had these words:—"Mr. George Russell 'maintained that a man in whom the moral sense had so far decayed as to bring himself to perform excruciating operations on defenceless creatures, could not be expected to show an acute sensibility as to the lesser faults of evasion and equivocation.' It is no extenuation of this injurious and baseless charge that Mr. Russell's psychology is as crude as his misstatement of the facts is glaring." In reply, I wrote the following letter, which the Times has characteristically failed to publish. Perhaps you will kindly insert it.—I am, Sir, &c., G. W. E. RUSSELL.

2 Morpeth Terrace, Victoria Street, S.W., April 6th.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "TIMES."]

SIR,—In commenting on my speech in the Vivisection debate, you are good enough to say that my "psychology is as crude as my misstatement of the facts is glaring." Now, this is very plain language, and demands equal plainness in reply. You would not wish me to take up your space by restating my facts in order, and adducing proof of each. But the task of disproving them rests with you. If you can perform it, I will gladly acknowledge my error. But in the meantime, a mere assertion that I have misstated facts goes for nothing.

As to my "crude psychology," that, of course, is matter not of fact, but of opinion. I need not inform you that eminent casuists have held that not only equivocations and evasions, but actual lies, are allowable, and even necessary, in certain circumstances, and for certain ends. Without accepting this doctrine, I hold that the same casuistic considerations which would justify the worst practices of the Vivisectionists on the ground of scientific necessity, would justify the concealment or denial of them when the State interrogates with a view to their limitation or prohibition.

Nor, it appears, do I stand alone in this opinion. The champions of the Vivisectionists are with me. In yesterday's debate, you report Mr. Cartwright as having said, "If this Bill passed, experiments would be made upon human beings, instead of animals." And you report Mr. Playfair thus:—"We might retard, but we could not stop, the progress of science. (Hear, hear.) If, at the instance of the greatest physiologists of the country, they were not going to allow these experiments to be made, they would relegate those experiments to foreign lands, or they would do what was much worse—they would create a criminal class among the highest professional men, in order to evade an unjust law. (Opposition cheers.)"

Now, it is not to be supposed that our men of science will experiment upon human beings openly and avowedly. Such experiments would surely require concealment or evasion for their safe performance. And Mr. Playfair goes further, and uses the very word which, in my mouth, so excites your ire, for he foretells the formation of "a criminal class among the highest professional men, in order to evade an unjust law."

Now, Sir, the mental and moral qualities in men of science which would reconcile them to this concealment and this evasion cannot be created by the passing of any Act of Parliament. Men who, on the showing of their friends and champions, would, if this Bill passed, be ready to experiment surreptitiously on human beings, and to form themselves into "a criminal class," in order to evade the law, must be regarded as not keenly sensitive to the moral heinousness of evasion or equivocation in the cause of science. Thus it would seem that Mr. Cartwright and Mr. Playfair are equally responsible with myself for the "injurious and baseless charge" which so disturbs you, and that my psychology is not so crude as your criticism.

It only remains that I should say one word with reference to a point on which some confusion seems to exist. My charges were against vivisectionists as such, not against doctors. I, for one, most gladly acknowledge the abounding tenderness and humanity of our great physicians. But it must be borne in mind that they, as a rule, are only theoretical advocates of vivisection. They have no personal acquaintance with its horrors, least of all do they themselves actually vivisect. This makes all the difference between them and the "practical biologists."—I am, Sir, &c.,

House of Commons, April 5th, 1883.

GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.

OBSTRUCTION AND THE PUBLIC.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you allow me to remind "A Scotchman," whose letter on "The Duty of the Government" appeared in your last issue, of what is the duty of that part of the public who are of the same opinion as himself on the subject of Obstruction,—that is, to strengthen the hands of the Government, by holding public meetings, and passing resolutions calling upon them to take whatever steps are necessary to put Obstruction down, not only effectually, but in such a manner that their own health and capacity for work will remain unimpaired? It is not fair to our public servants that they should be expected, or be obliged, to prolong sittings beyond a limited period, in which work is done in the most exhausting manner,—namely, past midnight. As to the same thing repeated again in the autumn, when statesmen ought to be taking restorative rest, it is simply ruinous. The results of it last year on Mr. Gladstone and others should be a warning.—I am, Sir, &c., Amroth, April 3rd.

ANIMAL INTELLIGENCE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I was surprised to see it stated some weeks ago, in a review of Mr. Romanes' book on "Animal Intelligence," that the female ostrich takes no part in the duty of incubation. And I am still more surprised to see the assertion repeated in a long note, in answer to Mr. Romanes' letter on the subject. Here, in South Africa, there are opportunities in abundance for observations on this disputed point, and as there are some three or four pairs of breeding ostriches at the present moment about one hundred yards away from the spot where I am writing, I may be allowed to assert positively, in opposition to your reviewer, that the female ostrich does take part in the duty of incubation. The facts of the case, so far as I have observed myself and learned from ostrich-farmers, are these:—(1.) The male takes the greater share in the duty of incubation, and is the more careful in regard to the eggs. (2.) The female sits usually during the day more, the male more during the night. (3.) The case which may have misled your reviewer,—it sometimes happens that the female is very careless, and then the male does double duty. I have been assured by people here familiar with ostriches that the male occasionally uses gentle persuasion, in the form of vigorous kicks, in order to induce his indolent mate to take a fair share of the common work.

The above assertions are founded on observations of the ostriches which are kept here in thousands on farms, for the sake of their feathers. Whether or not the absolutely wild ostriches differ at all in their customs, I cannot say, but as the ostriches kept by farmers are to all intents and purposes wild (and very dangerous customers, as a rule, to encounter when breeding), I should suppose that the same assertions would be true regarding them also.—I am, Sir, &c.,

"BROAD PRESBYTERIANISM."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—At St. Giles's, Edinburgh, on July 23rd, 1837 (as Carlyle tells us), when "Laud's pretended Bishop" tried to read the Collect for the day, Jenny Geddes' stool and shriek, "Deil colic the wame of thee, thou foul thief! Wilt thou say Mass at my lug?" silenced him, and with him all read prayers in Scotland, even in Episcopacy, for fully a century. At the Settlement after the Revolution, the Cathedral received a Presbyterian minister. It is now being restored by Dr. W. Chambers, and its rebuilding seems synchronous with happier spirit and utterances. A few years ago, Dr. Cameron Lees, its minister, asked an Episcopal clergyman—Dr. Ross, of Stepney—to preach in its pulpit, and bade him before the sermon use the Collect (the one for the Seventh Sunday after Trinity) which “the pretended Bishop from his tippets” could not out with:—

“Lord of all power and might, who art the author and giver of all good things; Graft in our hearts the love of thy Name, increase in us true religion, nourish us with all goodness, and of thy great mercy keep us in the same; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.”

A fortnight ago, the tenth of a series of lectures on “Scottish Divines” was given by Dr. Lees. The subject was “Bishop Ewing.” I commend to your readers the report of the lecture (too long to ask you to insert in your columns), given in the Scotsman of March 26th. The evident sympathy of Dr. Lees with the Bishop’s views as to the Fatherhood of God, as opposed to Imperialism, the nature of the Atonement as different from the “forensic” scheme, inspiration, and the destiny of the unsaved in this world, is a sign of how much liberality and breadth of hope and faith those who are bound by the Confession of Faith (even as those bound by the Athanasian Creed) may exercise. Would that both they and we were “well rid of” such sham and hideous ligatures!—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE “ENTHRONISATION.”

SIR,—Will you allow one who has a natural distaste for much ceremonial, and who rather prides himself upon being a “bus Bishop,” to make two remarks upon your article of last Saturday upon the Canterbury “Enthronisation”?

1. Is it true, that “here is a ceremony as elaborate, as scenic, as pompous, to use the plainest word, as a coronation”? It appeared to me, on the contrary, that the actual ceremony, described though it be by so “mouth-filling” a name, was simple enough, and, except for its repetition in respect of the threefold relation to the Church of England, the See of Canterbury, and the Diocesan Chapter, little more than takes place whenever an Honorary Canon is installed by the Dean of his Cathedral.

2. Was not the real pomp and display caused by the large number both of clergy and laity anxious to show that respect to the Primate which you rightly suggest would be his truest dignity? Had but few clergy swelled the procession, and but a meagre congregation assembled in the Cathedral, such an article as yours could not have been written, for there would have been no splendour and no pageantry to call for remark. The grandeur of the spectacle was surely in a large degree the measure and the witness of the popularity won for his high office by the late Primate, and of the high hopes entertained of the present.—I am, Sir, &c.,

BOOKS.

TEN YEARS ON A GEORGIA PLANTATION.*

THE South has never failed to attract champions of her cause from without; but her own sons and daughters have seldom been gifted with the power of literary expression. We welcome, therefore, the more heartily this volume, written, as it is, by a genuine Southerner, and recording experiences of life acquired during that critical period which followed immediately on the cessation of the Civil War. Mrs. Leigh, then Miss Butler, accompanied her father to Georgia in the early spring of 1866. They went, she tells us, to look after their property in Georgia, and see what could be done with it. Circumstances which she does not explain had kept them in the North during the conflict, and their situation was more hopeful than that of others who were going on the same errand, because they had property in the North, on which they could draw for help. It took the travellers a week, a week of no little hardship, to get from Washington to Savannah. The railroads had been broken down during the war, and were not yet repaired, the towns were more than half destroyed; even food could only be procured at two places on the road. Arrived at the plantation, they found the outlook anything but promising. The most hopeful sign for the future was the evident joy of the negroes at their return. Many of them had refused work elsewhere; some “had spent their all to get back.” And they had substantial proofs of their affection to give. “Everything that was left in charge of the negroes has been taken care of, and given back to us without hope or wish of reward.” One old couple brought ten silver half-dollars which had been paid them for some chickens by a Northern officer, in the second year of the war. But this loyalty and honesty did not imply a readiness for hard work. Miss Butler’s first impression was that no crop could be raised by such labour as the negroes were willing to give. This impression was afterwards corrected. The labourers of whose capacity for profitable industry she had doubted, raised considerable crops of rice, when the plantation had been got into working order. Mrs. Leigh does not give us a balance-sheet, but she certainly leaves the impression that the farming operations of her father and herself were, on the whole, fairly profitable, and this though matters were evidently not managed with the strict economy which is prescribed by the instinct of money-making, or, in default of that, by necessity. A store, for instance, for selling provisions, clothing, &c., at cost price was kept up for some years, at the cost of some thousand dollars, spent, indeed, to little purpose, as the negroes preferred to buy costly and inferior articles in their own way, and at places of their own choice. But profitable farming was, Mrs. Leigh gives us to understand, the exception. The Northerners who brought capital to invest in what seemed a profitable field failed because they could not understand the people. The old planters, who possessed this qualification, failed for want of capital.

Both the attraction and the value of Mrs. Leigh’s book are increased by the fact that it is made up of letters written at the time, and recording with the vividness and freshness of a personal experience the vicissitudes of failure and success. The writer forms opinions which she has afterwards to discard, and expresses both hopes and fears which are not realised. This makes it difficult to gather from her pages what is her precise opinion of the character and value of the negro as a labourer, what prospect there is of his working in such fashion that he may rise himself in the scale of comfort and civilisation, and encourage the investment of capital. We doubt, indeed, whether she has ever formed such an opinion. She lived through a time of great difficulties, and these she had soon to face alone. Her father died in the summer of 1867, and she found herself obliged to conduct a large and complicated business, for the management of which, even under the happiest circumstances, few women, trained as they commonly are, would be found to possess the necessary qualifications. The embarrassments of the situation naturally obscured her judgment at the time, and probably have left behind them an impression which will not be easily effaced. Then it was not easy to put away the prepossessions of the old régime, or to merge completely and absolutely the character of the owner, with his absolute power of command, in that of the employer dealing with men who were free to accept or to refuse. There is a curious instance of this in Mrs. Leigh’s account of her correspondence with General Meade, the military Governor of the district, on the occasion of an election in 1868. She had issued an order to her negroes that they were to do their day’s work first and vote afterwards, and she felt, and, it appears, still feels, great indignation with the General for telling her that she had no right to prescribe the time of voting. As it turned out, the negroes did not vote at the time appointed, but went to the poll early in the morning, though they came back in good time, and did their day’s work. On the whole, she seems to have been satisfied, for on the eve of her departure from Georgia, when she was about to marry Mr. Leigh, she writes, “The negroes are behaving like angels!” Against this, indeed, must be set the less favourable opinion expressed in the chapter entitled “New Times,” and recording the author’s impressions received during a visit to the South made six years later. Curiously enough, the old leaven of slave-holding feeling shows itself here more strongly than elsewhere. Mrs. Leigh is confident that the masters are the better off for abolition, and the slaves the worse. This feeling probably distorts her judgment; but it must be observed that on one matter she emphatically confirms a very unfavourable opinion which has lately been expressed of negro morality. "They have now cast all semblance of chastity to the winds." On another point, the alleged illiterateness of the population, she gives a clear testimony; "with one or two laudable exceptions, no one sends his children to school now."

But if we cannot look to Mrs. Leigh for a definitely-formed judgment on matters social and political in the Southern States, we may certainly find in her books excellent materials for forming one. Neither is there any lack of interest and amusement in its pages. What a curious survival of primitive feeling is this!—Among the many who brought their little gifts to Mr. Butler's grave was an old woman, who brought a basin, water, and towel, saying, "If massa's spirit come, I want him see dat old Nanny not forget how he call every morning for water to wash his hands." "Old John Bub," the plantation preacher, is an amusing sketch. It was one of his functions to marry, and he used the service of the Episcopal Church. Much of this he knew by heart, but the rest he had some difficulty in spelling out. "On one occasion, after he had read the sentence, 'Whereof this ring given and received is a token and pledge,' he said, with much emphasis, 'Yes, children, it is a plague, but you must have patience.'" We have to thank Mrs. Leigh for a book which is full both of information and of entertainment.

A LAYMAN ON ANGLICANISM.*

WE have so much sympathy with a great deal of what is said by the able Oxonian who has recently directed on Ritualism the assault named below, an assault grounded on a thoroughly Protestant creed taken together with Cardinal Newman's view of the Anglican position, that we think there is some call upon us to explain why other laymen who accept many of his premisses differ very widely from his conclusions. That conclusion is very hostile to the Ritualists, and though "Oxoniensis" does not go into the question of comprehension or exclusion, we should gather from his contemptuous tone, in speaking of the Ritualists as "endeavouring to re-establish one by one all the superstitions and abominations which were cast off at the Reformation," that he would throw his influence into the scale of exclusion, rather than of comprehension. No man, we think, could have used the word "abominations" who was not desirous to get rid, in any decent way, of the authors of the abominations. We shall hardly, therefore, be very far wrong in assuming that "Oxoniensis" would like to see all the issues at present in the balance as to our ecclesiastical policy,—all those involved, for instance, in the controversy between Mr. Green and the Bishop of Manchester, or between the Ritualists and Lord Penzance,—settled finally in a manner unfavourable to the Ritualists. We differ entirely from that view of the matter, and agreeing, as we do, very generally with the view taken by "Oxoniensis" of the meaning of the Reformation, we should like to explain why we differ so profoundly from his conclusions.

We hold, then, with him, that it is beyond question that the Reformation was intended to claim, and did effectually claim, for the anti-sacerdotal view of Christianity a recognised place in the Church of England, and that so far as that necessarily implies the exclusion of all who hold indifference to sacerdotalism, or the recognition of unepiscopally ordained presbyters, to be an act of heresy, they were so excluded by the avowed policy and deliberately sanctioned acts of the State at the time of the Reformation. But it is one thing to say this, and quite another to say that any explicit rejection of the sacerdotal view was required from either the clergy-men or the laymen of the Church of England at the time of the Reformation. There is nothing to show that any one was expected to repudiate the Sacerdotal view, and a good deal to show that even those who rejected the sacerdotal view themselves did not at all mean to exclude those who held it. It seems to us simply impossible that the Ordination Service, and the Form of Absolution for the Visitation of the Sick, could have been retained as they were by men desirous of absolutely imposing on the members of the Reformed Church the belief that there is no real significance in "Orders." The wonder is that anti-sacerdotalists could swallow these forms at all. We may say the same of the Sacramental theory of the Eucharist, which "Oxoniensis" regards as bound up with the sacerdotal theory, but which we do not think is so absolutely identified with it as he maintains. It is not credible that the Reformers meant to impose the Zuinglian view of the Lord's Supper on the English Church when they left the Communion Service as it is. What they did mean, doubtless, was to admit, but not to impose, the Puritan view of that service. The difference is, of course, plain enough. Just as the Court of Appeal in the Gorham case declined to exclude either the view taken by Mr. Gorham or the view taken by the Bishop of Exeter of the Baptismal Service, so we feel no doubt that the statesmen and ecclesiastics of the Reformation, in their strong wish not to turn the Church inside out all at once, intended to leave untouched all those who were willing to stay in it after the Puritans had once been included, without requiring from them to abjure any but the most obtrusively Romanist side of their own faith. It may be quite true that it is not very intelligible how believers in Apostolic succession could cling by a Church which had been governed by Archbishops and Bishops who notoriously rejected it, and who had frequently accepted Presbyterian Orders for their own clergy. But that was a difficulty affecting only the Anglican view of Apostolic succession, but not in the least touching the question whether an Anglican who had in his own mind got over this difficulty, had any right to remain in the Anglican Church. We hold, with "Oxoniensis," that an Anglican who holds at once to the doctrine of Apostolic succession, as divine, and to the Anglican Church as free from the guilt of heresy, has an omnivorous faculty of belief. But that is no reason at all why an Anglican who can perform the feat should not reap the advantage of performing it, by remaining quietly in a Church which has retained in its liturgy so much that favours his view, though it has sanctioned by its practice so much which is quite inconsistent with it. When "Oxoniensis" says (p. 48) that there is not a single word about the doctrine of Apostolic succession in the "Formularies" of the Church of England, he surely goes too far. It is quite true that the phrase is not mentioned, but is it at all consistent with any other view to affect to confer the grace given to the Apostles by the laying on of hands at all? The Puritans surely affected no such thing. The laying on of hands was with them a mere symbol of the unction of the Spirit, and not in any way essential to it, quite non-essential indeed. But the Anglican formulary insists everywhere that the Holy Ghost is actually committed to the priest and bishop "by the imposition of hands," and with it the power to forgive sins and to retain them. Now, as that is precisely what was originally committed to the Apostles, it is at least a plausible inference that the like power, if transmitted, or transmissible at all, has been derived step by step from those to whom it was first given. But however doubtful this kind of assumption may be,—and we, of course, do not feel the smallest confidence in its trustworthiness,—the political question is not the question of its validity but of its admissibility, as a part of the Anglican creed. And of this admissibility we feel no manner of doubt.

But there is another and still more important question which "Oxoniensis" discusses, namely, whether the actual tendency to accept views of this kind among the clergy and to listen to them among the laity is a sign of sheer intellectual and moral degeneration, or rather of a variety of mixed influences, some of which are good, and some superstitious. "Oxoniensis" takes the former view, and takes it without any manner of hesitation:—

"It is not too much to say that sixty years ago if an educated Englishman joined the Church of Rome, his doing so would have created more astonishment than would at this moment be excited by a similar person becoming a Mohammedan; and that if at the same date an English clergyman had ventured to preach the doctrine and practise the ritual which may be heard and seen in a hundred English churches next Sunday, he would have had no opportunity of repeating the offence; yet now all these things occur without exciting any surprise, and with scarcely more than a few murmurs of disapproval. To what causes are these vast changes due? and is the state of things which admits of them to be looked upon as an improvement or a deterioration—an advance or a retrogression? We know well the stock answer of the partisan of the change, that it is due to increased zeal and learning on the part of the clergy, bringing once more into the light the almost forgotten claims of the Church to 'teach with authority,' and to the increased humility and teachableness of the laity, corresponding to and educed by this revival of clerical power, and concurring with it to produce the 'improved tone of Church feeling,' on which they are never tired of felicitating the existing generation. But a truer answer, if a less flattering one, would be to say that the causes are to be found in the increased wealth and luxury of the day, and in certain other characteristics—social, moral, and intellectual—more or less connected with this, either as causes or as effects, to wit idleness, cowardice, and religious indifference on the part of the laity, ambition, vanity, and poverty on that of the clergy: and appetite for excitement equally in both. The greatest of all prevalent delusions is the belief that the success of the High-Church movement is any measure of the religious zeal of the day; it is, on the other hand, a very serious indication of the indifferentism of the lay Englishmen of the period. Englishmen, for generations past, when they have had any real care for religion at all, have been before all things Protestants; and so long as they remained really convinced Protestants, the one thing towards which they were a little inclined to be intolerant was that old hierarchical slavery which they believed their fathers had cast off for ever. They are, in feeling and disposition, much what they were, for national characteristics change but slowly; and it is just so far, and so far only, as they have unhappily acquired an indifference and a contempt for religion altogether, that they are induced to admit hierarchical claims again in any degree, as believing that they are too unimportant to call for serious resistance. Again, idleness and cowardice are direct and admitted products of luxury, and they, too, in their turn tend directly to lead men to a sacerdotal religion. Idleness makes a man anxious to get his religion done for him by the parson, just as he gets his law business done for him by his solicitor, and his estate managed by his agent; and cowardice again pulls him in the same direction, by making him hate responsibility, and save his conscience to the best of his ability by trying to shift off some of it on to the shoulders of the priest. Can we 'live for pleasure, and lose nothing by it?' is the question which, consciously or unconsciously, a luxurious age sets before itself, and it is one which a sacerdotal religion, and that alone, seems to answer for a time at least, in the affirmative. Such an answer must be a lie, for it is as contrary to the law of God as the transmutation of metals is to the law of Nature; but, as it ministers to human greed, it may sometimes be long before its falsehood becomes apparent. The discovery will come sooner or later, and the longer it is delayed, the more terrible will be its effects; but in the meantime, we need look no further to account for the favour which High-Churchism notoriously finds among fashionable young ladies and dissipated young Guardsmen, and the rich and luxurious classes generally."

While agreeing heartily in our author's view of the untenability of any high sacerdotal doctrine by the Anglican Church, we differ very widely indeed from this conclusion. In the first place, we should dispute entirely the fact that it is among the rich and luxurious that the more Ritual form of religion has made most way. What we hear of places like St. George's-in-the-East, St. Alban's, Holborn, St. James's, Hatcham, Miles Platting, &c., does not look like it. And, in fact, we are convinced that the ceremonial side of Anglicanism has found at least as much favour with the poor as with the rich, with the toiling as with the luxurious. And we believe that there is a good reason for this. As a matter of fact, whatever the religion of the Primitive Church was, it was certainly not free from those sacramental mysteries which Puritanism abhors. St. Paul's description of the Eucharist is as full of mystical elements as the anticipation of it in the sixth chapter of St. John. Deny sacerdotalism as vehemently as you please, and it remains true all the same that the Primitive Church attached the most mysterious importance to a rite upon which it has been the tendency of modern Puritanism to shower suspicion, as leading to the most dangerous sort of superstition. However successful Cardinal Newman may have been in showing how difficult it is to get at "Primitive" doctrine without including something almost more like Roman Catholic doctrine itself than anything which Anglicanism is disposed to accept, this at least is clear, that if "Oxoniensis" be right,—as we believe he is,—in assuming that the Christian revelation is true, it cannot be denied that what it confers on us is something more than the impress of a divine will and a divine character,—namely, a living belief in the ever revivifying power of the rite by which Christ's self-sacrifice was not only commemorated, but made to feed anew the souls of those who joined in that commemoration. It is as the Sacramental party, not as the Sacerdotal party, that the Anglicans have made good their influence over the modern world. It was as the depreciators of Sacramental ideas, not as the depreciators of Sacerdotal ideas, that the purely Protestant party lost ground in the Anglican Church. "Oxoniensis" himself appears to admit this, only he appears also to deny that there is any excuse for it in the Christianity of Christ and his Apostles:—

"Mankind may be roughly divided into those who are susceptible to religious motives, and those who are not; and if the former division, which is by far the larger, can once be got to look upon the clergyman as the priest, who in some sense differs from other men, and possesses, as they do not, the keys of the kingdom of Heaven, there is no fear that his influence will be slight. Amongst the unthinking portion of mankind, whether belonging to the classes conventionally called ignorant or not, a strong tendency always exists to put superstition and something scarcely distinguishable from magic in the place of religion, to trust in a greater or less degree in rites and ceremonies and forms of words, and this above all in the hour of death, and amid the terrors which belong to such a time. Men seem to long for something which shall save them without any labour of their own, and which, being mysterious and unintelligible, they can accept without the trouble of inquiring into its credentials, and with a kind of half-acknowledged idea that it will serve them as a valid excuse that they knew no better—even though they took no pains to know."

That is very just, only it is an indictment against almost all who are impressed by the Christian revelation itself, and not against those only who are deeply impressed by the sacerdotal idea. The truth is that the very idea of revelation involves the practical communication of a mysterious influence closely connecting the physical with the spiritual world, on the origin of which we cannot impose our petty intellectual conditions, and the nature of which we cannot pretend to analyse. No doubt the sacerdotalist assumes that most of the Sacraments depend exclusively on the Order of men to whom "the custody of the Sacraments" was, in their belief, exclusively committed. But undoubtedly also that view has been very much modified and softened in modern times by the assumption,—which even theologians often concede,—that it is not so much the unbroken material transmission of Orders which is essential, as the believer's sincere desire to submit to the historical conditions first associated with any divine gift, so far as those historical conditions may be within reach, their shortcomings being supplemented whenever the full conditions are not within reach by the freedom of divine grace itself. Thus many Anglicans, who do not deny that there may have been positive breaks-down in the material transmission of the supposed Apostolic powers in more centuries than one, still believe that all these deficiencies are repaired by the divine goodness, which looks only at the wish of men to fulfil the appointed conditions to the utmost of human ability, and not to the mere technical success. That is a view of Apostolic succession which is getting more and more common among the High Anglicans, and it is certainly one which extracts a good deal of the poison from the Sacerdotal view, and brings it much nearer to the Christianity of the Gospels and Apostles.

As a matter of fact, we should deny that High Anglicanism,—including even Ritualism,—is due to increasing ignorance, and an increasing love of pleasure and sensuous enjoyment. No doubt, a good number of the Ritualist Clergy are men of narrow intellects and large pretensions. So, for that matter, are many of the Evangelical Clergy and of the ultra-Protestants. No doubt, a good number of pleasure-lovers are attracted by ceremonialism; and so also are a good number of pleasure-lovers attracted by sensationalism of another kind,—sensational interpretation of prophecy, sensational conversions. But, for the most part, the strength of the High-Anglican section is in the devout Sacramentalism of that section of the Church, and the profound conviction they represent that the reception of the divine influence is not a matter of accurate theology, but of humble submission to the rites prescribed by a divine love. It is not his use of confession and absolution which makes the Ritualist popular; that makes him unpopular. It is the high value attached by him to the Communion Service which makes him popular. To exclude such a party as this from the Church of England,—whatever their superstitions may be,—is to exclude, as we believe, the best teachers, not only of the poor, but of the famished Rationalists of our over-cultivated day. Carlyle's horror of "Shovel-hattery" we heartily share. But "Shovel-hattery" itself, with Sacramentalism,—i.e., the belief in a mystical blending of the material and the spiritual,—is not so poverty-stricken a creed as the Puritanism which abjures sacramental devotion as well as ecclesiastical tyranny.

MR. GODWIN'S "CIVIL WAR IN HAMPSHIRE."*

As an Army chaplain, Mr. Godwin may be able, like Bishop Compton and other ecclesiastics, to "set a squadron in the field." But if he can marshal files, he cannot marshal facts. He has scarcely an inkling of the order which gives all things view, and one could almost wish that he had arranged his materials alphabetically. As it is, he has carted them in heaps like ballast, and his work is not, strictly speaking, a history, any more than a brick-field is a house. The surrender of Portsmouth, for instance, is fully described in chapter iii., and it turns up again at the end of chapter vi., Mr. Godwin tranquilly remarking that "after the capitulation, Colonel Goring, as we already know, took ship for Holland." It is true that the campaigns which he essays to describe are not easy to follow. The fruitless and endless marches and countermarches, the fights, sieges, and "alarms" of the Hoptons and Gorings and Essexes and Wallers, till Cromwell swept down like a flood of fire upon the weltering struggle, are confusing enough. But Mr. Godwin's narrative makes their confusion worse confounded, and may be fairly characterised as a work of paste and scissors, and not good at that. His book, however, may be looked at from another side, and a much more favourable judgment passed upon it. As a history, it may be pronounced worthless sans phrases. As a miscellaneous collection of curious and entertaining illustrations of the Civil War in general, and of its least instructive phase in particular, it is by no means without its value. In this amorphous pudding there are many plums. If it has a hero—not of Mr. Godwin's choosing, be it said, for his proclivities are Royalist—that hero is Sir William Waller. This "valiant soldier and patriot of his country" began his part in the Civil War with a civility, which, so far as he was concerned, leaves an old jest stingless,—

"My affections to you," he writes to Sir Ralph Hopton, "are so unchangeable that hostility itself cannot violate my friendship to your person, but I must be true to the cause wherein I serve. That great God who is the searcher of all hearts knows with what a sad fear I go upon this service, and with what perfect hate I look upon a war without an enemy. But I look upon it as opus Domini. We are both on the stage, and must act those parts that are assigned to us in this tragedy; but let us do it in the way of honour, and without personal animosity."

Sir Ralph Hopton, says Mr. Godwin, was Waller's "constant and able opponent." "Well matched" would be a better second epithet, for neither of these brave officers was, in the true sense of the word, an able commander. The Royalist captain had none of the best of it in their tussle at Landsdown Heath, which Carlyle confounds with Roundway Down; but in the latter fight his "Blacks" broke and dispersed Waller's "Lobsters," as the Puritan cuirassiers were nicknamed. (It is curious, by the way, that English soldiers are on other grounds still called by this cant word.) But it was not till the December of that year (1643), Roundway Down having been fought in July, that Sir Ralph had to admit a defeat. This was at the storming of Alton, and the letter which he wrote to Waller after the fight will bear comparison with the letter quoted above:—

"To Sir W. Waller.—Sir,—This is the first evident ill-success I have had. I must acknowledge that I have lost many brave and gallant men. I desire you, if Colonel Bolles be alive, to propound a fit exchange; if dead, that you will send me his corps. I pray you send me a list of such prisoners as you have, that such choice men as they are may not continue long unredeemed. God give a sudden stop to this issue of English blood, which is the desire, Sir, of your faithful friend to serve you,—RALPH HOPTON."

How Lord Crawford left his sack—his sherris sack, that is—at Alton on this occasion; how that town was taken at the very time when the Cavaliers at Oxford were making "bon-fyers with much triumph" for the death of Pym; and how Lady Butler shot herself with a pistol on hearing that her paramour, Sir Giles Porter, had been wounded at Alton, are all told on the same page with Sir Ralph's letter. And this is a fair sample of the plums already mentioned. But if the reader wishes to feel in what a fog Mr. Godwin's narrative will land him, he may study the description given in chapter xx. of "the great struggle which has been variously styled the Battle of Cheriton, Alresford, Brandon Heath, Brandon, Bramdean, and Winchester, as well as Cheriton Down Fight and Cheriton Fight." It was a victory for Waller, but Mr. Godwin strangely and ludicrously exaggerates its importance, induced to do so apparently by the fact, as he says with solemnity, that the "appellations of that dread and stern reality are truly manifold." This fight took place on March 29th, 1644, and on June 29th, after an unsuccessful skirmish with the King at Cropredy Bridge, Waller was "wandering Londonwards," as Carlyle says, "and gradually 'losing his army by desertion,' as the habit of him was." Poor Waller's "crowning victories" lacked the Cromwell touch; but he has something to say about his deserters, and says it with so much vehemence, that some abatement may be fairly made for the disparaging innuendo of Cromwell's biographer:—

"And for the payment of arrears, I may say I was for it to the uttermost farthing. I may not say who were against it, but those who seemed to be pillars, or somewhat, whatsoever they were it maketh no matter to me, contributed nothing, nay, gave their flat negative to it. And, truly, herein did but discharge my conscience, for I was ever of opinion that a soldier's pay is the justest debt in the world. For if it be a crying sin to keep back the wages of an hireling, that doth but sweat for us, it must needs be a roaring, altitnant sin to detain pay of the soldier that bleeds for us. There is a cry of blood in it, and God will make inquisition for it."

This sounding reclamation moves Mr. Godwin to exclaim, "Well and nobly said, Sir William!" It is easy to read between the lines the soreness of a commander who had no genius like Cromwell's, and no tact like that of Essex, to remedy the eternal want of pence which vexed him.

We often meet in these pages with a personage whom Carlyle would have treated as contemptuously as he treated Frederick William's butt, Gundling, had not Hugh Peters—for he is that personage—prayed, preached, and scribbled under Cromwell's ægis. One trait of this foolish fanatic's buffoonery we may find room for. When the Prince of Orange's troops were marching from the West of England to London, their route, says Macaulay, "lay close by Stonehenge, and regiment after regiment halted to examine that mysterious ruin, celebrated all over the Continent as the greatest wonder of our island." Had the Rev. Hugh Peters been as strong for mischief as he was willing, this halt would not have occurred. For in the July after Naseby he was with Fairfax "at a place called Stonage (Stonehenge)," and piously urged its destruction, as being "one of the monuments of heathenism." Fairfax, whose men were "marching in bat-talia," had no attention to spare for this suggestion; but it classes Hugh Peters as a dolt for ever, after the order of Dogberry. Concerning the dress and accoutrements of the contending forces in the Civil War, Mr. Godwin has many curious particulars to communicate. It would seem from some of these that Macaulay, following the author of Hudibras, rather ante-dated the adoption of red as the colours of the Ironsides' uniforms. It is worth noticing, too, that Cromwell himself was called "Ironsides," before his cuirassiers received that appellation. Heath and Winstanley are the authorities which Mr. Godwin quotes for this statement, and there is nothing intrinsically improbable in it. It appears also that the buff jerkin was far more valuable than the cuirass, for "cavalry corslets, consisting of back, breast, gorget, and head-piece," were valued at 22s. each; and the owner of one of the "most sweet robes of durance" said, just after the Restoration, "I would not have taken £10 for it." It is curious also to read, and throws light upon the origin of the word "clubman," that 1,000 Danish clubs were issued from store to Sir William Waller's army in 1643. Such a penny-wise provision of primitive weapons was, perhaps, a sin not less altitnant than the non-payment of arrears, but was almost inevitable. Civilian soldiers have ere now shown that they can hold their own against professional warriors; but an improvised civilian War Office has a patent of its own for organising defeat.

A considerable portion of Mr. Godwin's book is devoted to Basing House, and its sieges; but this is a subject which has been exhausted by previous writers. Cromwell, resting, if Hugh Peters is to be believed, "upon that blessed Word of God written Psalm, cxv., 8," but quite assured, meanwhile, that his artillery was irresistible, stands out to point the moral of the well-known Hampshire saying, "Clubs are trumps, as when Basing House was taken."

We regret to add that this compilation, which required to be most carefully printed, is printed with an inaccuracy that would indeed be surprising, if the publisher were responsible for it. But Mr. Eliot Stock is otherwise known to us, and Mr. Godwin's sins must rest on his own head. His list of errata resembles one of Sulla's or Napoleon's bulletins, and might be enlarged indefinitely, as will readily be imagined from the fact that, while the book itself is dedicated to the Honourable W. T. Orde Poulett and the Rev. James Elwin Millard, the latter is casually referred to in p. 64 as the Rev. T. Millard, D.D. We should, in conclusion, be glad to know from what writer the author is quoting, when he says that Napoleon's levies at Waterloo proved themselves "small, but biting." Such a description might not be inapplicable to the army with which he won Lützen, but his army at Waterloo was a finer one than any that he had led since the campaign of 1807. Mr. Godwin, we fear, like the most recent historian of Waterloo, has been trusting too implicitly to the guidance of Erckmann and Chatrian.

EGYPT AND HER BURIED RECORDS.*

AFTER a charming introductory chapter, in which the author pictures in the most vivid manner the peculiar features of Egypt as she now lies before us, Mr. Poole resuscitates, as it were, her ancient cities, in the hope of arousing some adventurous spirits to search in earnest for the priceless records of their former history. The moment for this attempt is fitly chosen, while the fate of Egypt is still attracting the attention of the greater part of the civilised world, and it certainly ought to result in vigorous and systematic effort on the part of Biblical students and Egyptologists. Mariette, the persevering explorer who achieved more than any one else in the way of Egyptian exploration, and succumbed at last to overwork and difficulties, has left behind him, in the document published by the French Academy of Inscriptions, precious indications of the spots where his genius led him to suspect the existence of much historic treasure; but until very lately no one had succeeded to his labours, and the subject has been treated with an apathy and an indifference for which it is hard to account.

* The Cities of Egypt. By Reginald S. Poole. London: Smith, Elder, and Co

And yet, as Mr. Poole so justly says, it is only by digging into the mounds, those vast store-houses of lost Egyptian annals, that we can master the story of those Royal lines that stretch away into the shadow-land which the Egyptians called the Reign of the Gods, closing conjecture by coming face to face with actual certainty, as we do when we peruse the engraved tablet or the pictured hieroglyphic. Already, at the bidding of Mariette, "buried cities have thrown off the grave-clothes which had enwrapped them for thousands of years, and risen to tell us their story, and to fill the ages of oblivion once more with the joy of overflowing life;" and did we continue his work, and continue it in the direction he has pointed out, Goshen, Zoan, and Hanes would probably furnish the answer to many a problem, while in the two former, at any rate, we should be almost certain to find contemporary records of the sojourn, the oppression, and the exodus of the Hebrews.

Researches such as these are of European interest, and should not all be left to French enterprise. "Our failure in this duty," says Mr. Poole, "is a disgrace to our love of knowledge, a scandal to our love of the Bible. We have an evil eminence in Europe for our neglect of research in Egypt." The reproach, however, was scarcely uttered, when M. Naville, despatched by the newly-started Society for the furtherance of Egyptian exploration, began his labours at Tel-el-Maskuta, labours which have just been so amply rewarded by the discovery of Pitthom, one of the store cities built by the forced labour of the Hebrews, and its identification also with the Succoth of the Bible. So cheering a success must surely lead to renewed energy and increased liberality on the part of all who take an interest in Egyptian and Biblical history, and this latest discovery lends increasing value to the story of what has been done and what yet remains to do, as we find it in Mr. Poole's fascinating pages. We walk through the vast necropolis of Memphis, visiting the tombs of kings and the humbler sepulchres of their subjects, recalling the great works of Menes, and seeing visibly in the fallen Colossus and the fragments of the Temple of Ptah how, as Ezekiel says, "the false gods have ceased out of Noph." Then we come to Hanes, the site of which, discovered after long speculation, has never yet been explored, though it was the second capital of Egypt during the rule of two ancient dynasties, and, as Heracleopolis, was well known to the Greeks. The mounds of Ahnas-el-Medeenah mark the position of what was once a celebrated city, the seat of the worship of Hershefn, the Egyptian Hercules. No remains of his temple are known to exist, but excavations would probably reveal them to us, as also the ancient necropolis; and in these ruins, as pointed out by Mariette, we may hope to discover such material as would fill up the great gap of four centuries and a half of Egyptian history regarding which we do not possess the smallest fragment.

Of Thebes and its splendid monuments, as being better known, and unfortunately sadly desecrated, Mr. Poole naturally says but little; but it will probably surprise most readers to learn that neither the Ramesseum, nor the hall of columns at Karnak, in which the Cathedral of Notre Dame could stand without touching the walls, at all approach the magnificence of the great Temple of Zoan. This splendid city, the civil capital of Joseph's Pharaoh, and the residence of Menptah, the Pharaoh of the Exodus, which from its position is styled by Mr. Poole the Alexandria of primitive Egypt, was standing in the remote days of the sixth dynasty, and flourishing in the time of Abraham, if not much earlier. At the close of the twelfth dynasty it must have been, says the author, almost the first town to fall under the dominion of the Hyksos, or Shepherd Kings, who left great monuments behind them. Rebuilt by Ramses II., and called Pe-Ramses, "the House of Ramses," the new city attained to a magnificence unknown to its precursor; and we must not forget that this is the other treasure city erected by the Children of Israel, and that this second Ramses was their oppressor, an especial reason for desiring that investigations should be made into a site which promises so rich a harvest. The outline of the vast, monotonous Delta is broken by the lofty mounds of Zoan; a crude brick wall, a massive fort of the same material, alone are now visible, and all around is desolation; but here stood two temples of the red granite of Syene, and numbers of obelisks, the remains of which, thrown down possibly by an earthquake, and bearing marks also of the agency of fire, lie in confused heaps. Yet this was formerly "the best of the land" of Egypt, and we cannot refrain from quoting the vivid description of Zoan in the days of Ramses, by an ancient Egyptian poet, which Mr. Poole has taken from the Mélanges Egyptologiques:—

"I arrived at the city of Ramses-mi-Amen. She is beautiful, beautiful. There is naught like her among the monuments of Thebes, the very secret of the pleasures of life. Her fields are full of lovely places, abounding in the produce of food daily; her pools are full of fish, her ponds of ducks, her meadows are verdant with herbage, the bower with blooming garlands. The garden is perfumed with the odour of honey; the meadow-land steeped in moisture. Her granaries are full of wheat and barley, heaped up as high as heaven; vegetables and reeds (are) in the garden of herbs; flowers for posies in the fruit house; lemons, citrons of two kinds, figs, in the orchard; sweet wine there is which one mixes with honey; fish of various kinds, some from the Euphrates, others such as are presented to the greatest of conquerors. The pond of Har-phra (is there) containing salt, the well containing natron. Her (ships) go and come daily, laden with products for food. The joys have there fixed their seat; there is no word of want; the small are there, as well as the great."

Then follows the invitation to keep the festival of the fourth month. We see the joyous people bearing "branches, posies from the orchard, garlands from the garden, the fowler with his thousands of birds." The "sea brings to the King her tribute of fish, the distant lands their tributes. The people bear on their heads fresh skins of sweet drink. They stand at their doors, waving posies, branches, and garlands, for the King is making his entry in the morning. This was not in spring-time, but in our 'chill October,' when Egypt is awakened by the cool, north breeze, and refreshed with the waters of the widespread inundation."

Goshen, Migdol, Pi-Beseth, and Sin each form the subject of a very interesting chapter; but the account of the city and university of On is especially worthy of the reader's notice, that place having been a celebrated seat of learning from the earliest ages, until its teachers and its obelisks were transferred to Alexandria, the new capital. And here we cannot help sympathising with the author's lament over the change which has come over the pursuit of learning in modern days, as he contrasts the Universities of yore, generously open to rich and poor alike—as, indeed, is still the Azhar of Cairo—with our present seats of learning, where the idea now prevalent is that study is a means to an end, and that end success in life, and where a brain-exhausting competition but too often ends in intellectual incapacity. "The inferior knowledge of the centuries that are gone was," says the author, "better than our higher science, so far as it taught the love of wisdom, and left men thirsting for more learning, not surfeited with 'cram.' Perhaps, in a better time, our children's children may go back to the ancient way, wherein wisdom was a delight, because none thought that she could be bought with money, or that she held in her generous hands the coarse rewards of trade."

IN A VAIN SHADOW.*

THE writer of this clever novel is an apt disciple, if not a master, in the school of "penny dreadful" fiction. We have not passed page 12 of the first volume before we come to a murder, described in the most approved style, a murderer springing with "the appalling bound of an infuriated ape," and the corpse turning over in the pond into which it has been thrown, while "the two empty sockets glare up frightfully at the living man's starting eyes." Then we have a wicked earl, no boisterous, mediæval cut-throat, but a polished and refined gentleman of the nineteenth century, of whose secret load of guilt none but his own conscience, his foster-mother, and the novelist are aware. And there is a still more wicked countess. She is deceased, indeed, before the story begins, but we are not spared the horrors of her deathbed, or even the ghastly sight of her face, as she lies embalmed in her coffin of glass. The scene of the story suits the characters. It is an ancient castle, with all appropriate belongings,—ruinous towers, subterranean passages, and secret dungeons, in one of which the wicked earl keeps the murderer through whose deed he has acquired the title and estates. In one of her most carefully elaborated passages, Miss Evangeline Smith describes how the earl's son, accompanied by a faithful friend, makes a stealthy entrance into the castle. He is persuaded that his father has usurped the dignity and the wealth which he holds, and he is determined to recover the documents which would restore to the true heiress her rights. The two friends make their way by a panel which opens in an altar tomb into the family vault. On the ghastly details of the scene, the writer expends all her powers. It must be allowed that she rises to the very height of her art, when she makes her young hero apostrophise the corpse of his grandmother, visible through the glass, as aforesaid, with "Oh, wicked woman! Must you lie there like a block, and say no word of confession or remorse;" and grasp the coffin, ready, but for his comrade's interposition, to shake it in his anger. From the vault, they find their way by a subway, where "large earthworms [not in the least likely, we should say, to be found in any such place] dragged their fat cold bodies along the broken floor," into the secret dungeon. There the first object that meets their view is the corpse of the concealed murderer, with, by his side, "the thin cat, dead also, for her master, in his impotent fear and envy, had determined that she should not survive him, and had wrung her neck, as a parting salutation." From the dungeon the hero makes his way into his father's bedroom, watches him as he sits up in bed reading "the accursed papers," waits till he falls asleep, snatches them from his side, and escapes from the castle, to find,—that "he has stolen his mother's love-letters."

We should have been content to express our opinion of the absurdity and bad-taste of this and other similar passages in the briefest way, but for the undoubted ability which the author of In a Vain Shadow shows from time to time, and which, notwithstanding all her extravagances, deserves a respectful recognition. She is evidently new to her work. The prodigal liberality with which she treats her readers is proof enough, were other evidence wanting. Instead of the eight hundred pages which, loosely printed, with large margin and thick paper just make up to their barest standard of size and weight the three volumes of the veteran novelist, we have twelve hundred and fifty pages of closely packed type, sufficient to furnish, as we have taken the pains to calculate, at least six volumes of the average capacity. To this inexperience we willingly attribute the crudeness and extravagance of this book. That Miss Evangeline Smith can write well is quite evident. She can even wield the weapon of terror—which we would by no means forbid to the novelist, but which is apt in inexperienced hands to lose its dignity—to good effect. The description of the Earl's dream, in which he sees himself and his bride in the church, with a company of the dead assembled to witness their wedding, is really powerful. Here is a fine touch, not spoilt by being lengthened out with sentiment:—"Further back, in a seat by herself, enveloped in a chilly, death-like vapour, and still and colourless beneath her veil of grey, was his dead wife." In another style, described with genuine beauty of language, which is not marred by excessive ornament, is Geraldine's dream. (Vol. II., pp. 400-1.)

In curious contrast with the absurdity of her melodramatic flights are the shrewdness and good-sense which the author shows in her pictures of ordinary life. Nothing can be more strange than that she should not have applied to her own work the keen feeling for the ridiculous and the lively satire which appear to be at her command. In her portraits of the clergy she is peculiarly happy. They are drawn, for the most part, in a style that reminds us somewhat of Miss Austen. It is hardly needful, therefore, to say that they are entertaining rather than attractive. But the kindly Archdeacon Egerton redeems the character of his cloth. We laugh at his guide-book antiquarianism, but his genial temper, his charity, his liberal faith are represented in attractive colours. Here, certainly, Miss Smith has succeeded in a difficult task, the creation of a character which the reader rejoices to add to the company of his "friends in fiction."

In parting with Miss Smith, we may assure her that we have applied to her book a severe criticism because we have felt that it might bear a good result in the future work which we hope to see from her pen.

THE MAGAZINES.

MR. KNOWLES has induced such a number of known persons to write papers for this month's Nineteenth Century, that it is quite difficult to notice them all. The most interesting paper to politicians is "The Future 'Constitutional Party,'" by Lord Dunraven, which we have noticed elsewhere, but the one which will be most read is Mr. Matthew Arnold's criticism on Isaiah. It is in form a plea against authorising a revised translation, lest in revision the mystical charm of the old words should evaporate, and that singular advantage which Europe has derived from habitual study of a grand poetry which is not its own, or like its own, should be for ever lost. This argument is put with few illustrations, but with a force of expression which, perhaps, only a poet writing of a greater poet could have used. The substance of the article is, however, an effort to state Isaiah's position as a great poet and considerable, perhaps for a time a ruling, politician in Jerusalem, who clearly foresaw that without a thorough cleansing of the society in which he lived the nation could not escape destruction, but foresaw also that, as Immanuel reigns, a remnant must ultimately escape, to commence a nobler dispensation. Mr. Arnold pleads that if Isaiah were rearranged, yet so far as possible left unaltered, we should see this position, and in seeing it, greatly increase our enjoyment of one of the greatest teachers who ever lived. The ordinary student of Scripture will read his paper with a pleasure possibly slightly heightened by the reflection that this is the comment of one who judges the prophet only as a man of admirable genius and mental fire. There should be something of Isaiah in Lord Lytton's poem, "The Land of Promise," for he also denounces the deceits of foolish guides who are leading the people on a vain quest, but there is not. There are two or three lines of glittering, or rather of iridescent, satire; but the fire which should live in a composition of the kind is wholly wanting. You feel that the writer thinks of making a poem, not of denouncing falsity, and does not particularly care, even though, as he concludes, "the Land of Promise rests the Land of Dreams." Politicians will read the paper of the Rev. John McKenzie on South Africa with interest, but not, we think, with adhesion. It is full of instruction lucidly conveyed, a perfect repertory of facts; but its conclusion will not be palatable. It is that England should appoint a Viceroy of South Africa, who should receive from each self-governing colony a part of its revenue, and should expend it in administering the Native "Territories" outside for himself, under British control. We could then, Mr. McKenzie thinks, annex northward in freedom, without fear, until we reached some well-administered kingdom, as the natives under direct British rule would be contented and obedient. In short, South Africa should be an India, with white protected States within it. If England were ready, for the sake of South Africa, to maintain an army of 20,000 Europeans and 30,000 disciplined Kafirs this would be a statesmanlike plan; but it is useless to ask any such effort, and without it the plan must fail. Unless we could finally and effectually compel the Boers to reverse their native policy, we should fail, and we cannot without a large and permanent force compel them. Mr. McKenzie, whoever he is, is, however, a man of thought, whom his superiors should not lose sight of. This is a very different "report" on affairs from the one we usually receive from a South-African clergyman, and we only wish it had been made more complete by a sketch of that southward movement of the great tribes of the African interior which is undoubtedly going on, and which is the ultimate explanation of the new native pressure on the Colonies. "What shall I do with my Son?" is an attractive heading, but we do not see how special education for the Colonies is possible, and must pass on, only sympathising with the writer's wish. Mr. Leslie Stephen finishes his thoughtful monograph on "The Suppression of Poisonous Opinions" with the conclusion that, except conceivably in a few very rare cases, they ought not to be suppressed. His argument is, "Toleration is a necessary correlative of the respect for truthfulness," and includes, ex necessitate, toleration of opinions expressed with brutality. If not, we shall treat want of manners as a criminal offence. That is sound, as a general principle, but Mr. Leslie Stephen rather glides over the exceptions. Apparently, for instance, he would tolerate the preaching of free-love, but punish the reducing of the doctrine to practice. Is not that to punish the ignorant led, while leaving the thinking leader free? We wish all students of politics would read Sir John Lubbock's seemingly very dull paper on the British Balance-sheet. They would, for the most part, gain knowledge, especially of the facts, first, that our taxation is really only £72,000,000, the rest being money expended in purchasing remunerative labour; secondly, that we really pay off nearly £7,000,000 of Debt a year,—in great part by providing for the operation of the Terminable Annuities; and thirdly, that in spite of the great progress of society, only £5,000,000 a year of all we spend directly adds to the comfort of the population. The rest is either penalty for wrong-doing, or insurance against future evil. In other words, if we had no Debt and Europe were civilised, five or six millions would be a sufficient revenue,—a reflection of no practical use, but tending to restrict the worship of that tinselly fetish, the Nineteenth Century. So also will Mr. S. A. Barnett's description of the workmen in his parish, whose condition has made him a Christian Socialist, who would tax all realised property—for that is what he means by his crude suggestion of a land-tax—in order to give the poor free secondary instruction, the free service of medical science, and good lodging. We shall come, perhaps, to something like that, but the poor must bear their share. If there is to be a "Socialist" property-tax, let there also be "Socialist" sugar and beer taxes. Otherwise, men will be fined for money-making, that is, for being intelligent and thrifty. The first is a grace, the second the most doubtful and imperfect of the virtues, but neither deserves punishment.

We do not see that the German Field-Officer's speculation on English military power, which is the first paper in the Contemporary, amounts to more than this,—that a foreign officer who cordially admires the British character and the British Constitution still thinks that the country is endangered by escaping universal compulsory military service. It is useless to argue that. Conscription may be adopted when the nation has felt itself in terrible danger; it will not be adopted before, and Europe will not like the result when it has been secured. The Continent has never stood face to face with 600,000 thoroughly organised English soldiers, or considered the kind of work they might do. We should, however, like to ask this friendly German whether he has ever thought-out the possibility of a conscription for Asiatic service? No nation possesses such an institution, not even Russia. Major-General Hamley evidently thinks the ship canal to Manchester can be made, and as evidently doubts if it will be anything like as cheap as the promoters fancy. We also doubt that, and something else. Has General Hamley ever looked closely into the calculations of those who believe that if the great railway companies built a third and fourth line of rails, heavy goods could be carried over them at low speeds at rates with which canals could not compete? The rates of carriage for goods are now affected, to a degree which only a few statisticians understand, by the permanent necessity of keeping the goods trains from smashing up the passenger trains. Some recent works constructed in America seem to show that a two-storied railway, the upper one for goods, built of iron only, and only twenty feet high, is not the mere dream it would once have been considered. Canalisation is not wholly a question for engineers. There are two papers, answering each other, on Vivisection, one by Dr. E. de Cyon, who writes more argumentatively than most scientific men, though with that undertone of scorn which once on a time was the mark of theological writing; the answer, by Mr. E. Hutton; and there is a valuable account of Italian politics, by Professor Villari, who endeavours to account for the partial failure of Parliamentary government in Italy, which arises, in the main, from want of interest in the electoral body. The leading paper of the Contemporary, however, is M. de Laveleye's, on "The Progress of Socialism," which he believes to be rapid, and to be urged on by the decay of faith. He believes that Socialism will gain serious victories, if it adheres to peaceful methods, but will fail, if it resorts to insurrection.

M. de Laveleye's paper must be read, however, with another of his own in the Fortnightly, called "The European Terror," in which he describes what may be called the executive parties of Socialism. Of these, the Anarchists, whom we all know, form the extreme Left, and though formidable from their unscrupulousness, are not yet numerous. Their creed is substantially that all is evil, and all must be destroyed, in order that a new régime may spontaneously arise. M. de Laveleye thinks the early Christians wished the same thing, which is partly true; but then they expected the "new order" from the direct will of God, and did not assume, as the Anarchists do, that the fruit to be certainly produced by spontaneous generation must be happiness. Far apart from the Anarchists are the Collectivists, who would liquidate society by making the State or Commune all. Their great leader is the Belgian Colins, who maintains that God does not exist, but that man is immortal, possessed of free-will, and bound for his own sake, because of his infinite duration, to obey a moral code. He must, therefore, establish his views, even when demonstrably accurate, by moral means. The view which he ought to establish is that land, originally the only capital, belongs to all, and should be rented by all to the individual. That rent should be expended in securing for all the raw material other than land which they require to expend their labour upon. The method of this labour will be as follows:—

"Society must give theoretical and practical instruction to all minors gratuitously, and children be taught, by physical science, in what manner to act on matter to be able to turn it to the best advantage, and, by moral science, how they must behave to their fellow-men. On leaving the establishments for public education on coming of age, young men will be called upon to serve a sort of apprenticeship for active life in the service of the State, thus paying in a measure the debt incurred during childhood. When of age, each member of society will be given a fixed sum as a dowry to establish himself in life, and this sum will be taken from the surplus of the State receipts. Three different careers are now open to the young man—he can either work alone, or associate himself with others to produce in common, or, if he prefer avoiding all personal risks, he can hire himself to another, who will direct and take the responsibility of all operations."

The money thus made belongs to the individual, but at his death it will be heavily taxed, and if he has no children will return en bloc to society. In fact, Collectivism, according to Colins, only divides the land and capital resulting from the land, and limits taxation to a succession duty, and, as we imagine, though the point is obscure, insists that all men shall be educated alike. It would, if the land were fairly acquired, be little more than a gigantic experiment in co-partnership, and would end infallibly in the industrious whipping the idle, whom on the theory they would have to maintain, till they worked too; or if men were logical, as in China, in the weeding-out by famine of all who would not work. It is not intended to produce equality, and could hardly yield much happiness. In practice, of course, even Colins's Collectivists sympathise with violent attempts to upset Society, though in theory they would not join them. H. Barthélemy, Professor of Military History at St. Cyr, gives a sketch of the French Army, from which it appears that it consists of 1,289,000 trained men, supported by 554,000 more trained men in the Territorial Reserve, and by 2,000,000 more men liable to serve, but untrained. These men are commanded by 27,000 officers and 8,000 officers of reserve, besides the immense numbers of the non-commissioned, who, however, are not very good, and are to be superseded by soldiers' children, thoroughly trained to the work in the military schools. M. Barthélemy points to his figures with great pride, but the new organisation has still to be tried upon the field, and in Tunis it certainly did not succeed. Lord Aberdeen's view on the Affirmation Bill is only noticeable because he advises that it should be allowed to pass, but that its opponents should formally protest by walking out in a body,—a device which strikes us, who approve the Bill, as slightly feeble. If you disapprove it, vote against it; or if you disapprove, but hold it unavoidable, quietly abstain from voting. There can be no solatium offered to God—for that is the real motive pleaded for resistance—by a feeble protest from men who could, if they would, act. Mr. Kegan Paul chats pleasantly about the production of books, suggesting, en passant, that the best way of paying authors is by royalty; and General Sir H. Norman, with intimate knowledge, defends Sir A. Wilson, who took Delhi, from the charges brought against him in the "Life of Lord Lawrence;" while Mr. Sutherland Edwards condenses for us Prince Gortchakoff's testament, an account of the foreign policy of that diplomatist recently published by the Russian Foreign Office. The sketch is interesting reading, and shows that during a quarter of a century Prince Gortchakoff had a single idea,—that of undoing the results of the Treaty of Paris, so far as regarded Russia. He succeeded in this, but, be it noted, at a tremendous price, nothing less than the substitution of the mighty German Empire for a weak confederation of States. Diplomats will find curious morsels in the article, but the public will be most interested in the formal admission that, before the war, Russia held different language to Lord Aberdeen, then Premier, and to Lord Clarendon, then Foreign Secretary. Prince Gortchakoff thought Lord Aberdeen much more easily hoodwinked, or perhaps detected in him a much stronger reluctance to go to war for the Turk. The sketch of "Home and Foreign Affairs" is still determinedly Liberal, the writer in particular calling on the Government to insist that their programme for the Session should either be accepted or rejected.

We see little of much interest in the National Review. Mr. H. E. Hoare, though he has actually lived among the criminal classes, has as yet little to tell us of them, except their tendency to violence; and Mr. A. Tilley's criticism of the "New School of Fiction," the Howell School, is not entertaining; while Mr. Boulger's on Lord Lawrence's masterly inactivity, though most moderate in tone, is only a restatement of the old fallacy that the politics of Afghanistan are important to India. They are not, if we defend the Indus, which was Lord Lawrence's idea. The only political article is Mr. Raikes's, on "The Redistribution of Political Power," and it leaves us with an impression that its writer, for all his experience, does not comprehend the world he is living in. Fancy fighting Democracy with this sort of mop:—"The Inns of Court, the Chambers of Commerce, the learned societies, the Mercantile Marine (which has no local habitation in the constituencies), even the Incorporated Law Society, to say nothing of the great profession of medicine, might each be awarded electoral privileges, which could not be denied a metropolitan character."

In Blackwood, besides a political article, this time in the form of a story of 1950, rather cleverly done, there is the commencement of a new novel, "The Millionaire," not very bright, so far; a story in one number, "Flenrette," so clever and original that we should attribute it to M. Lindau, but that it is not signed; and "The Ladies Lindores," which will prove, we suspect, the most successful of Mrs. Oliphant's novels outside the "Chronicles of Carlingford." If Mrs. Oliphant would only imagine that a man could by possibility be as right-minded and resolute as a woman, her stories would leave a still pleasanter impression; but the sketch of John Erskine's bitterness and Lord Rintoul's weakness is admirably well done. The stronger feelings, and especially tragic feelings, are, of course, reserved for the heroines; who, moreover, as women, and therefore sufferers, escape the gentle and often half-conscious ridicule which Mrs. Oliphant pours on men, when they are not, like old Rolls, in a subordinate position. Then she sees and depicts a vein of heroism in them.

Macmillan, besides "The Wizard's Son," in which the supernatural machinery begins to grow unmanageable—a ghost almost flirting is bathos—there is a bit of biography, "Recollections of Lord Westbury," by "One who knew him," and we may add, like most persons in that position, did not like him. A more candid friend could hardly be found. The only virtue allowed to the Chancellor, who is described as a hopeless coward, a gross debauchee, and a turn-coat, are over-kindness to his family and a certain fidelity to his work. His intellect is not depreciated, but he is denied wit, and we suspect, though we cannot affirm it, his perfect sanity is questioned. At least, the strange trait in his character, his habit of buying houses too big for him, fitting them up, and then suddenly quitting them from some inexplicable aversion, is described in a way which suggests that thought.

The Cornhill has a sympathetic memoir of Crashaw, the pietistic Catholic poet of the seventeenth century, who had in him the true lyric cry, though it was usually wasted in ecstasies which are to northern Protestants almost unintelligible; and the commencement of "By the Gate of the Sea," a new story, with same clever touch-and-go satire in it, but a plot which, so far, disturbs the reader by its violent improbability. "Misunderstanding," as a motif, ought to be discarded from the repertoire of the novelist.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Belgravia has three papers only, besides the monthly instalments of fiction (these latter being contributed by Messrs. Justin McCarthy and Wilkie Collins and Mrs. Alexander), but is none the worse, we think, for that. Mr. J. M. Corban's "The Green Turban: a Mystery," is very ingeniously contrived. We must own to not feeling much interest in this kind of story, except it be a transcript of genuine experiences; but it must be allowed that this example has quite the look of verisimilitude. The "Four Japanese Folk-tales" are interesting, though we cannot see "their dissimilarity from anything in our language." "The Two Bamboos" might, "fir-tree" being put for "bamboo," have been translated from Hans Christian Andersen; and the "Cure for Discontent" reminds us of the prologue of "The Taming of the Shrew."—Time presents us with a great variety of readable articles. We may mention a notice of Professor Palmer's "Poems of Beda'ed-din-Zohair;" a lively sketch of "The Author of 'Vathek,'" by Mr. G. Barnett Smith; and a curious collection of legal curiosities, under the title of "Case Law," by J. Stanley. One remarkable case was that of "Gilbert v. Sykes." Mr. Gilbert, a clergyman, offered to pay one hundred guineas on the last day of May, 1802, if Sir Mark Sykes would pay him a guinea a day as long as Bonaparte, whose assassination was then commonly expected, should live. He got his guinea for more than two years. Then Sir M. Sykes refused to pay, and was upheld by the Courts, which ruled that such a wager was void, as being against public policy. We may mention, à propos of the curious survivals of "Postman" and "Tubman," in the Court of Exchequer, of which Mr. Stanley speaks, that the late Lord Justice Lush was once "Tubman," his accession to that dignity being celebrated by one of the Judges in an epigram which turned upon his name.—The best things in Tinsley's Magazine, not reckoning the current novels, are a curious reminiscence, which must be now not much less than fifty years old, of the Carlist war, entitled "Twenty-four Hours in a Spanish Prison;" and "The Headless Ghost," by Mr. T. F. Thiselton Dyer, which is not, as might be supposed, a ghost-story, but a collection of the various beliefs and legends which have taken this particular form. There is a piteous complaint about "Green Rooms and Dressing Rooms," which will, we hope, touch the hearts of the managers to whom it is addressed.

Readiana: Comments on Current Events. By Charles Reade, D.C.L. (Chatto and Windus.)—To the zeal rather than to the discretion of Mr. Charles Reade's publisher we owe this volume of "personal convictions on various subjects." Collections of this kind are generally a mistake, and frequently just a little of an impertinence; a development of the odious system of interviewing, personal gossip, and vulgar publicity which has crossed the Atlantic, with so many other disturbances. This particular collection we regard as a very special mistake. The simple good-faith of Mr. Charles Reade's self-estimate, the cork-like buoyancy of his egotism, are traits which his contemporaries smile at and pardon in a clever novelist, who is amusing in more ways than he means to be; but it is a pity to set down such utterances as seriously as the truisms of the Prince of Denmark. The inutility of flogging a dead horse is proved to demonstration that might convince her Majesty's Opposition by Mr. Charles Reade's elaborate exposition of why the unfortunate nobleman who has not very much longer to remain at Dartmoor must be Arthur Orton, and the public hardly cares to have its memory refreshed about the Stauntons. Mr. Charles Reade's quarrels with his critics are not the affair of the public, and it is a pity that an author who will always be ranked among "considerable persons" should also present himself in the undignified position of a claqueur at his own plays. A writer's judgment may fairly be tested by his discrimination between what is of merely accidental and what is of enduring interest in his own productions. Readiana is a whole volume of evidence that Mr. Charles Reade's judgment has not stood that test.

Zoological Notes on the Structure, Affinities, Habits, and Mental Faculties of Wild and Domestic Animals. By Arthur Nicols, F.G.S. (Upcott Gill.)—Mr. Nicols's "Notes," as he modestly calls his volume, are certain to become a favourite with boys, and a standard book of reference for students of natural history. They deal with snakes, marsupials and their allies, and birds. Mr. Nicols has travelled in all parts of the world, is a keen sportsman, an accomplished naturalist, and a shrewd observer. The volume abounds in anecdotes of adventure, mainly derived from his own experience, and is full of entertainment from beginning to end. But Mr. Nicols is no mere anecdote-monger; he is a thoughtful student of natural history, much concerned with the many interesting problems to which the speculations of the late Mr. Darwin have given rise. All his anecdotes and observations, therefore, have a bearing on some special line of thought, and all his investigations are intended to shed light on some important point in biology. With snakes especially, in all their varieties, the author appears to have an intimate acquaintance. And yet he tells us he has never been able to overcome the shrinking dread with which the sudden sight or touch of one of these reptiles seems to inspire nearly all other living creatures. We say nearly all, for there are a few exceptions, among which are the mongoose, certain birds, and the obtuse pig. Mr. Darwin sought to account for this dread by inherited instinct, but Mr. Nicols suggests a solution which some may think better accounts for all the facts. He believes it rather to be the dread of the unknown and unfamiliar, "the mental attitude which sees a ghost in an unusual effect of moonlight, or makes a dog bark at his shadow on the wall, or a horse shy at some strange object in the road." One of the most interesting and useful chapters in the volume deals with "Snake-charming," than which "no superstition has taken so firm a hold on the average Anglo-Indian." Mr. Nicols maintains, and gives ample reasons for his position, that snake-charming is pure charlatanism. There is no mystery about the art whatever; either the snakes are harmless (sometimes painted skillfully to resemble poisonous species), or their fangs and poison-bag have been extracted, or, if not, they have become attached and perfectly friendly to their owners. Another chapter deals with the classification of snakes, in which some popular errors are corrected; and a fourth, full of exciting anecdotes, deals with the subject of poison, and includes some sensible remarks on the "Sea Serpent." The second section of the work, on marsupials, deals mainly with the opossum, kangaroo, and that strange creature, the platypus. The section devoted to birds, covering about two-thirds of the volume, is more systematic than the first two sections. It treats of their structure, flight, their physiology, development, and classification, and discusses with great moderation and good sense some of the interesting problems in evolution suggested by the subject. Altogether, the work is a model, which we commend to all travellers, and is likely enough to become a classic in natural history. There are a few well-executed illustrations.

The Life of Jean Frederic Oberlin, Pastor of the Ban de la Roche. By Mrs. Josephine E. Butler. (The Religious Tract Society.)—This is a very interesting and well-written book. The memory of the patriarch of the Ban de la Roche, in Basle Alsace, is piously preserved, and the house in which he and his family lived and served God throughout the darkest of the revolutionary days is in the same condition as it then was. The life, labours, and character of Oberlin, especially the dash of mysticism which removes any harshness from its outlines, are all full of interest, and the writer handles her subject with sympathy and discrimination.

The Church in Roman Gaul. By the Rev. R. T. Smith, B.D. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.)—In a volume of convenient size, well printed, and furnished with a useful little map, Mr. Travers Smith has managed to convey a great amount of information in a very agreeable manner. He traces the history of the Christian Church in Gaul from its earliest beginnings during the Roman supremacy down to the definite termination of the Imperial rule in the year 536, when, with the sanction of Justinian, the cities of Arles and Marseilles (the last remnants of Roman dominion) were formally ceded to the sons of Clovis. In making extensive use of the formidable array of authorities, ancient and modern, named in the preface, the author is to be congratulated (and surely the reader likewise) on the ease and lightness with which such a mass of material is handled. The clearness and occasional vigour of the style afford very pleasant reading, while the narrative is now and then judiciously relieved by suggestive comment. The avoidance of all exaggeration of epithet, and the entire freedom from a didactic or bigoted tone in a work of this character, deserve special recognition. The opening chapters deal with the ancient Gauls, their origin, their beliefs (the pages on Druidism are specially good), and the first effects of Roman conquest. After this appropriate introduction, the main subject is wisely dealt with in the biographical form, for the most part; but amongst the accounts of the various saints and bishops who played the leading parts in the story, are interspersed excellent vignettes of the life and manners of many periods. The chapters towards the end which, after describing the life and work of St. Sidonius Apollinaris, borrow from his writings a picture of the secular as well as the religious life of the time, are as lively in manner as they are interesting in matter. We close the book with a certain feeling of surprise at being enabled so easily and pleasantly to get over a great deal of ground which, at the first glance, would appear to promise a decidedly undesirable journey.

Sweetbriar; or, Doings in Priorsthorpe Magna. By Agnes Giberne. (Seeley, Jackson, and Halliday.)—A well-intentioned, amiable book for girls. It is not vividly interesting, but it is well principled and sensible, and teaches the evil of tittle-tattle and the good of minding one's own business pointedly, if not forcibly. Its sphere is, perhaps, rather limited intellectually, and its atmosphere a little too gossipy.

John Hus. By A. H. Wratislaw, M.A. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.)—This account of John of Husinetz, commonly called "John Hus," is a painstaking and straightforward endeavour to make English readers more familiar than most of us can boast of being with the character and surroundings of a most remarkable man. We use the words "painstaking" and "straightforward" advisedly. The information here condensed within a small compass has obviously been gathered with no little labour and research, while the complete unpretentiousness, the absence of all affectation and over-wrought word-painting, together with the evident desire to include faithfully defect as well as excellence in the portrait, are such as are at least entitled to respect. Perhaps, indeed, the severity of virtue is even pushed a little too far in regard to simplicity of style. Wholesome as it is to despise that meretricious, highly-coloured rhetoric which so often degrades historical writing, still it is quite possible to value too little those legitimate attractions which heighten effect without falsifying it.

We do not say that such qualities are here altogether wanting, but we wish their presence were more continuous and more marked, for it would be most regrettable if any shortcomings of the kind should hinder the popularity of a book so much needed. The historical introduction is too dry and tame, and the sketch of the precursors of Hus can hardly be considered powerful. These two sections might be rewritten with advantage, and we hope they will be. In the descriptions, however, of the conflicts between the Bohemian King, Wenceslas IV. and Zbynek, the Archbishop, and between Hus and the Cardinals, in whom was embodied the authority of Rome, the pulse of the narrative decidedly quickens. On the other hand, in the unadorned simplicity, as well as the transparent fairness and impartiality, with which the trial of Hus by the Council of Constance is set before us, we get precisely the cool, quiet tone which the subject demands. Such handling is far more effectual than eloquent elaboration, and that hysterical interjection of comment which one meets with far too often. The facts, being left to speak for themselves, do so with a force which cannot but be felt. Mr. Wratislaw deserves the thanks of all who care to know, on good authority, what manner of man was this follower of Wycliffe and forerunner of Luther. Hus had much in common with both. From both, also, he differed on important points. We fear that few of us know as we ought the facts as to his teaching, his character, his attainments, his powers as writer and theologian. That knowledge is now available as a result of the labours of Palacký and Tomek, and Mr. Wratislaw has done good service in making it so accessible to the English public. In spite of there being room for improvement in the manner of presenting it, we feel sure that the genuine interest of the subject, and the candour and industry with which it is treated, must appeal to any reader who will himself bring candour and industry to the perusal of the volume.

Misterton. By Unus. (W. H. Allen and Co.)—Walter Beresford is, no doubt, a very manly curate; Lilian Beachwood is worthy and Maud Wyncombe altogether unworthy of him. But "Unus" need not have lectured her readers (we say "her" advisedly) so long and strenuously on the virtues and vices impersonated by these two young ladies respectively. Besides, if she must lecture, let her be more attentive to the proprieties of grammar. It may be true, historically and otherwise, that "a true and noble woman is, on the whole, truer and nobler than a true and noble man; she was God's last and greatest creation," though Burns, with his "prentice hand on man," &c., said the same thing with more point long ago. But when our author proceeds to say, "as a compensation, true and noble women are rare, but when found, they are a jewel," &c., we must remind her that "they," even "when found," cannot be considered "a jewel," except in countries where polygamy is permissible. "Unus" is, however, in earnest, evidently knows something about Anglican life, and is, in the meantime, content to trouble the public with only one volume.

Paladin and Saracen: Stories from Ariosto. By H. C. Hollway-Calthrop. (Macmillan and Co.)—An admirable compilation, intended, as the author explains in a justificatory preface, to which we refer the reader, "not for scholars or students, but for boys and girls;" therefore, Bowdlerised. This delightful book is almost as great a boon to the readers it is meant for as a new "Arabian Nights" would be. Worse woodcuts than it is illustrated with we have not seen, except in the magazines. To what depths is the art (!) descending?

The Training of Teachers, and other Educational Papers. By S. S. Laurie. (Kegan Paul.)—Many sensible things are said in these papers, which deal with such different subjects as "The University Training of Teachers," "Authority in Relation to Discipline," "The House of Lords and Popular Education," and "The Claims of Latin as a Subject of Instruction." The author, who is Professor of Paediatrics in Edinburgh University, need not, however, have been at the trouble to reprint them, but should have been content with their having done duty as inaugural addresses and magazine articles of a controversial character. The interest in many of the subjects treated of has evaporated, while several articles have a ludicrously self-conscious, ex cathedra, or "inspired dominie" look. Yet, after all, perhaps Mr. Laurie is at his best when he is airing his learning, as in his "Montaigne as an Educationist." We are not quite sure that we understand how he would have Scotch educational affairs managed in the future; would he have a Board of Education or an Educational Commission established in perpetuity in Edinburgh? One of his contentions is thoroughly sound,—that the problem of secondary education in Scotland was not solved by the passing of the Endowments Act of last year.

Beyond Recall: a Novel. By Adeline Sergeant. (Richard Bentley and Sons.)—The title and the binding of this novel are in harmony with its contents. The book is bound in black cloth, with ornaments in red, apparently copied from an Egyptian pattern. The plot, if plot it may be called, is laid in Alexandria and Ramleh during the year 1882, and includes the bombardment of the Egyptian forts, and the massacre and burning of Alexandria. There is much that is clever in the book. The character of Michelle, a jealous, passionate girl, who afterwards develops into a loving wife, is well sketched; and the happy ending of her attachment to Mr. Eastlake, who had known her from childhood, redeems the story from utter sadness. While we hope next time for a more cheerful story from Adeline Sergeant's pen, we may congratulate her on what we believe to be her first attempt.

A Glimpse of the World. By the Author of "Amy Herbert." (Longman and Co.)—Miss Sewell is the Mrs. Sherwood of the present generation. The young people of our day do not, we presume, read "The Lady of the Manor" and "Stories on the Church Catechism," at least we do not hear those meritorious works talked of. But "Amy Herbert," and many others of Miss Sewell's stories, are great favourites in the school-room; and Miss Sewell's latest story, A Glimpse of the World, deserves to be. It is sound, without being dull, quite free from preachiness, and decidedly interesting.

Little Hinges to Great Doors. By F. S. D. Ames. (Burns and Oates.)—A little volume of Roman-Catholic stories for children, each illustrative of some point of conduct, worthy aim, or sacrifice, as inculcated by the doctrines and discipline of the Catholic Church. The stories are attractive, and well adapted to the purpose of the writer, who tells us that "simple as these little histories are, some are true biographies," and that she means them to show the principles of faith, hope, and charity struggling against the weight of worldly influence.

Fair and Free. By the Author of "A Modern Greek Heroine." (Smith, Elder, and Co.)—This story is told with a good deal of power, and its pictures present themselves with a certain lifelike reality to the reader's mind. But then, what hideous realities many of them are! It is surely a mad act to lead a child through a fever-laden court that he may learn to appreciate pure air, and yet the motive of such stories as this is very similar. Right triumphs in the end, it is true; but the scenes through which the progress of the heroine is depicted are of a nature to disgust one with the "society" of which they purport to be a representation, or, at least, with the imagination which can thus display its power.

Kaffir Folk-lore. By George McCall Theal. (W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.)—Mr. Theal gives his guarantee for the genuineness of these stories. They were told by Kaffirs and taken down by Kaffirs. His part has been to add the notes. An introductory chapter gives an account of the Kaffir people. Of the stories themselves, perhaps the most curious is that of Hlakanyanah, a sort of South-African Sisyphus; but all are curious and interesting.

The Angelic Pilgrim; an Epical History of the Chaldee Empire. By W. H. Watson. (G. Redway.)—This is a volume in what the author calls "lyric verse," in his preface, but to which we feel quite unable to give so honourable a name. He seems to have no idea either of rhyme or rhythm, and though he tries various metres seems equally unsuccessful in them all; and the "reason" is wanting as much as the "rhyme," which is disappointing in so well printed a book.

We have received:—Vol. I. of The Student's Encyclopædia, which is in reality a reissue of the "Globe Encyclopædia" on smaller-sized paper and in less bulky form; Old-Testament Revision, by A. ROWLANDS' ODONTO. Has been celebrated for more than half a century as the best, purest, and most fragrant preparation for the teeth ever made; it whitens and preserves the teeth, imparts to them a pearl-like whiteness, strengthens the gums, and gives a pleasing fragrance to the breath. Health depends in a great measure upon the soundness of the teeth, and all dentists will allow that neither washes nor paste can possibly be as efficacious for polishing the teeth, and keeping them sound and white, as a pure and non-gritty tooth powder; such Rowlands' Odonto has always proved itself to be. NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Explosives Bill introduced by the Home Secretary passed both Houses on Monday night. In the Commons, although the Bill authorises judicial inquiry, with witnesses on oath, before any one has been arrested, and compels witnesses to criminate themselves, and authorises prisoners to give evidence, and throws the onus of proof on the accused, and punishes preparation to commit felony with fourteen years' penal servitude, it was not seriously challenged. Sir R. Cross warmly supported the Bill on behalf of the Conservative Party, no Irish Member opened his mouth, and the Bill was read three times in succession, and sent up to the Lords. There Lord Salisbury, to the consternation of his friends, burst into a savage denunciation of the Bill, as one drawn in a panic and forced upon the House by a surprise, and drew down upon himself a grave reproof from Lord Kimberley and Lord Selborne; but no Peer adhered to the Tory Chief, and before eleven o'clock the Bill was passed. It received the Royal Assent on the following morning, and is now law. There is some doubt whether, from its unusual wording, the prisoners now in custody might not be punished under it; but Mr. Poland stated distinctly when they were brought up on Thursday that the Act "did not apply to these men," though they might be tried for conspiracy or under the Treason-Felony Act, and would then be liable to ten years' penal servitude. It certainly was not intended to make the Act retrospective.

Lord Randolph Churchill fired off another letter against Sir Stafford Northcote and in favour of Lord Salisbury in Monday's Times, which would not have done much execution in any case, but being followed, as it fortunately was, by Lord Salisbury's explosion in the House of Lords on Monday night, only served to illustrate the singularly blind and indiscriminating judgment which Lord Randolph Churchill carries into political life. His chief contention is that Sir Stafford Northcote, instead of standing by Lord Salisbury on the question of the Arrears Bill, virtually threw him over, and rendered it impossible for Lord Salisbury to insist successfully on the Lords' Amendments; and that Sir Stafford would have joined the Government on the subject of the Bradlaugh dispute, but for Lord Beaconsfield's declaration on the other side. We do not in the least doubt that Lord Randolph is quite right on both heads. Sir Stafford Northcote is a genuine Conservative,—thoroughly indisposed to concede large Liberal demands, but also still more indisposed to excite the country by rash resistance to those demands, when he foresees that sooner or later they must be conceded. That is, of course, an attitude of mind very vexatious to the Tory Democrat who really believes that he could lash the nation into fury with the Liberals and their proposals; but then, where is the evidence that the Tory Democrat is, we do not say so much right, as even not very far wrong? Lord Salisbury seems to us to show as little sympathy with the genuine Tory instincts as he does with the genuine Democratic instincts, and Lord Randolph Churchill, in this respect, follows faithfully in the footsteps of Lord Salisbury.

The papers this week have been filled with dynamite. No further arrests have been made, but the police have been busily collecting evidence, and there are rumours that the person who can tell most has agreed to turn Queen's evidence. It is evident, from the language of the Home Secretary, that the Government consider that they are dealing with a regular plot,—the plot devised in America, "to bring the British Government to its knees," by blowing up London in fifteen places at once. Mr. Poland, indeed, stated at Bow Street, on Thursday, that this was his substantive charge against the prisoners. The police are acting with extraordinary energy and courage, and handle carboys of nitro-glycerine as if they were kegs of illicit whisky. They are only doing their duty, but other employés of the State, for doing acts not one whit more heroic, receive the Victoria Cross. We hope the Government will consider seriously whether there is any physiological difference between a serjeant in a regiment and a serjeant of police; and whether, if there is not, a reward for special service other than money would not greatly increase the ardour of the Force. We have had many Orders established of late for which less could be said than might be pleaded on behalf of a branch of the Victoria Cross for civic valour.

A private telegram of a serious kind has been received from China, and published in the Times. The writer, supposed to be the head of one of the greatest houses, believes that, with the recall of M. Bourrée, the French Minister at Peking, the hope of peace has passed away. The Chinese will now defend Anam, and the French will find themselves engaged in a long and costly war, in which they must employ considerable forces. The impression at Peking, we believe, was that M. Bourrée was in favour of a forward policy, but he may have patched up Tonquin affairs in a way that M. Challemeil-Lacour disapproves. At all events, it is evident that Minister intends to risk an encounter with China. It is simply impossible that a diplomatist of some experience, responsible for Foreign Affairs, should have gratuitously affirmed in the Senate that he must attack Anam because its ruler acknowledged Chinese suzerainty, unless he meant to set Peking at defiance. The suzerainty is a fact of centuries, and the Empress-Regent must now either defend her vassal, or cede Anam to a European Power. There is little doubt among those who know China that the first serious resistance to the French in Tonquin will be offered by Chinese Regulars, and that the expedition now arriving will consequently be found insufficient for its work.

The Government have determined not to make the Affirmation Bill retrospective, in other words, to make it apply only to persons elected after the passing of the Bill. This was the course taken in relation to the Catholic Relief Bill of 1829, and that is a precedent on all-fours with the present case. We cannot say that,—considering the evidence as to the superstitious condition of the clerical mind, and of those who are affected by the clerical mind,—we think the Government wrong in their decision. But, undoubtedly, we think that the Relief Bill would have been much more just, both in 1829 and now, if it had admitted at once to the Houses of Parliament duly elected Members, on their complying with the law as altered by the passing of the Bill. Mr. Bradlaugh, if the Bill passes in the shape now proposed, must resign, and seek re-election from his constituents, before he can be admitted to take the Affirmation. Whatever, therefore, the new Bill will be, it will not be a Bradlaugh Relief Bill. We, however, have always thought that where a clear injustice has been done,—were it to the meanest of mankind,—a Relief Bill, so far from being undignified or discreditable, would be all the more honourable for the small esteem in which the person relieved by it was held.

Mr. Bradlaugh has succeeded in his appeal to the House of Lords on one point which is probably not an unimportant point for him. The House of Lords have decided, by three judicial votes against one—for we do not count Lord Denman's vote, which is not that of a lawyer, and ought never to have been given—to reverse the decision of the Court below on the question whether the informer in Mr. Bradlaugh's case can claim the penalty of £500 for every vote given by Mr. Bradlaugh in the House of Commons, or whether Mr. Bradlaugh only becomes liable to that penalty on the claim of the Attorney-General, as representing the Crown. The Lord Chancellor, Lord Watson, and Lord Fitzgerald gave judgment that under the wording of the Act of 1866, the Crown only could claim the penalty to which Mr. Bradlaugh had rendered himself liable; Lord Blackburn, on the other hand, declaring (with the probably unwelcome adhesion of Lord Denman) that, in his belief, there was nothing in the statute of 1866 to indicate that any intention existed of changing the law which previously governed that point, and that it should, therefore, be interpreted on that point consistently with the tenour of the statutes which it repealed and replaced. The majority of the Court held, on the other hand, that as the statute of 1866 omitted the words allowing any informer to claim the penalty, it must be assumed that it omitted them intentionally, and that the penalty was only to be forfeited on the demand of the Crown. Mr. Bradlaugh, therefore, is not liable for the fines to Mr. Newdegate's representative, and as the Crown has not prosecuted him, it is not likely that he will be asked to pay anything beyond his own costs. If Mr. Bradlaugh were not forbidden by his creed to indulge any religious emotion, he might well have thanked God that there is a House of Lords, a very curious element of our institutions to become the shield and buckler of Mr. Bradlaugh.

At the annual dinner of the Institution of Civil Engineers, which took place last Saturday, Mr. Bright, who answered for the House of Commons, made some remarks on the inconveniences of doing work in an assembly of which a large minority always pulls in the direction opposed to that of the majority. His observations appeared to imply that he envied the engineers their administrative unanimity in projecting and executing any great work. But surely that is very like a pair of scales envying a hammer the promptness and directness of its execution. The duty of a representative Assembly is, in the first place, to weigh opinions, and only in the second place to give them effect in action. Mr. Bright went on to argue that the isolation which is secured to us by the Channel is no guarantee for peace, and that if the engineers can tunnel successfully under the Channel, that will bring us more promise of peace than any insulating "silver streak" can secure to us. We have said something of Mr. Bright's almost superstitious faith in the efficacy of physical traffic and the means of traffic, in another column. We may add here that we heartily second Mr. Bright's hope that, in this matter of the Channel Tunnel, we should act coolly, and "not under the influence of panic." It is precisely, indeed, the panics which the Channel Tunnel—once opened—would be likely to cause, which we want the public to anticipate in imagination, before deliberately sanctioning the step which would bring them upon us.

The Conservatives made very little of their reply to Mr. Childers's Budget speech on Monday. Indeed, their reply was not to his facts, but to inferences which they feared that the country would draw from his facts. The simple truth is, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer put it, that leaflets describing in most misleading terms the alleged financial crimes of the Government, have been distributed in thousands in all the great boroughs, which it was simply the Chancellor of the Exchequer's duty to answer by actually comparing the achievements of the two Governments in paying off Debt and in paying for the wars in which they had embarked. Neither Mr. W. H. Smith, nor Lord George Hamilton, was able to put his finger on a single misstatement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; while Sir S. Northcote fell into some curious blunders, in his effort to justify his own finance and to depreciate that of his successor. Thus, he represented the efficiency of the Army and Navy last year, at the time of the Egyptian expedition, as due to the purchase of ships and stores made with the vote of credit asked for by the Tory Government, the fact being that the stores of that time had been wholly consumed long before the date of the Egyptian expedition. Sir S. Northcote romanced also in attributing the unpreparedness of the Military and Naval services in 1878 to the undue economy of the Liberal Government which went out of office in 1874, and this though every penny which the Tories had asked for between 1874 and 1878 had been granted at once by the House of Commons. In point of fact, the Tory attack on the Budget speech was a failure, and probably felt to be a failure by the party. When the storm of criticism subsided, Mr. Childers remained in possession of the field.

Mr. Barry on Wednesday brought forward Mr. Healy's Bill creating Elective Councils for Irish Counties, giving them full powers of local taxation, and the right of nominating Sheriffs, Justices of the Peace, and all other county officers. The Bill—which is absurdly extreme, as it introduces an elective Magistracy, which, in the only place where it exists, the City of London, we are about to abolish—was warmly supported by the Parnellite Members, but resisted by the Secretary for Ireland. Mr. Trevelyan showed that it left most important questions—for example, the right of the Councils to tax as Improvement Boards—entirely unsettled; but he rested his argument mainly on the inability of the Government to take any such Bill from a private Member. No responsible Government would touch such a measure without having its details ready, and being prepared to carry it through as a Cabinet Bill. The second reading was, therefore, defeated by 231 to 58. If the Irish are sincere in desiring local self-government, they should press it on Mr. Gladstone, not bring forward crude Bills which could not be worked, and which will make the Government Bill, when it comes, seem tame. We are heartily for local self-government in Ireland, but we reject the election of magistrates, either there or anywhere else.

Mr. Parnell concluded the debate in a bitter speech, which left his general policy less intelligible than ever. After making the Parliamentary but perfectly useless points that Mr. Gladstone, who supported local government in Ireland, was absent from this discussion, and that Mr. Trevelyan, though now objecting to receive such a Bill from a private Member, had in the last Parliament voted for a similar private Member's Bill—as if Mr. Trevelyan could learn nothing from official experience—he threatened future action. In a very short time a reformed Parliament, based on household suffrage, and with a very different set of Ministers, would "settle the question upon Radical and permanent lines." Let us trust that may prove a true prophecy, at least as to the finality of the settlement; but Mr. Parnell, who makes it, on every vacancy orders his followers to vote against the Liberals. That is to say, he believes in the Millennium, and hopes for it, but does his uttermost to keep it back. What is the sense of anticipating everything from Radicals, and at the same time telling the Irish of Liverpool not to vote for Mr. Smith. The only effect of that course is to make Radicals believe that Irishmen are incapable of political gratitude.

Lord Alcester (Admiral Seymour) and Lord Wolseley were on Wednesday presented, the former with the freedom of the City of London, and the latter with an address of congratulation, enclosed in a gold casket. They were subsequently entertained at a banquet at the Mansion House, where they and the Duke of Cambridge and the Marquis of Hartington and Mr. Childers all made speeches. These were none of them very good, though Lord Wolseley took the opportunity of Mr. Childers leaving the War Office to pass a warm eulogium on his services in the recent campaign—a gracefully timed recognition—and for once, the Duke of Cambridge's was the best. He spoke with a directness and jerky plainness which were effective. "I am all for moral influence. What does moral influence mean? It means physical force to back it;" and physical force not latent, but ready for use, at what, in our days, "is very short notice indeed." Moral influence is an excellent thing, but "it is the power of an empire which produces moral influence." That is only a bit of a truth, for after all, moral weight has belonged to Powers physically very feeble,—the Papacy, for example, cannot fire a shot, but is a formidable antagonist,—but it is a bit which, amidst a deluge of sentiment, it is useful to recall. The Law, which is moral influence made concrete, is on the side of the policeman; but still, a wise Commissioner picks six-foot candidates, and prefers that they be plucky.

There never was such a position as that of the Czar of Russia. Europe and Asia are being ransacked to increase the splendour of his coronation, the church where the ceremonial is performed will be entirely filled with Princes, Grand Dukes, Ambassadors, and Bishops, and the crowds of grandees swarming up from the whole world are raising rents in Moscow till, on the days of festivity, they will exceed the normal standard by two thousand per cent. All Europe is interested and all Russia excited, and the centre of the whole scene, the all-powerful Czar, is to enter the city by a circuitous railway route, which will be strictly concealed. He may come in from east or west, for if he comes by the direct road he will be blown up. The precaution is an extreme one, but many signs indicate that the danger is real. The Revolutionists, in Russia as well as abroad, have formally warned the Czar that he shall not be crowned, one mine has already been discovered, and in every Continental capital there is a murmur among the zealots as of expectation. It is simply impossible to recede, but there will not be a moment of the ceremony during which its hero will not believe that he is being "covered" by an assassin. It is a strange passage, however it may end, in the history of despotism. The Cæsar rarely died in his bed, but at least he was safe while his Lictors were round him.

The Times of Thursday intimates that Lord Dufferin, after his visit to Constantinople and to England, will not return to Egypt. That would be a grave misfortune to that country, as any diplomatist who might take his place—say Sir R. Morier, Minister at Lisbon, or Mr. White, Minister at Bucharest—the flatter a man familiar with Turkish provinces—would hold a much less weighty influence, and have much to learn, especially about persons, from the beginning. We trust Lord Dufferin will return to Cairo in spite of the rumour that if Lord Ripon resigns in December, owing to his wife's health. Lord Dufferin may be appointed Viceroy. He deserves the Indian post, which he wished for when he was despatched to Canada, but the difficulty of replacing him at Cairo is almost insuperable. The question raised by the Times as to the status of our Representative in Egypt is easily settled. We constantly supplement the regular Ambassador by an Envoy Extraordinary—for instance, that was Lord Beaconsfield's official position at Berlin—and there is no reason why the Envoy Extraordinary to the Sultan should not reside in Cairo, which is technically within the Sultan's dominion.

The Braithwaite and Buttermere Railway Bill, otherwise the Bill for destroying Borrowdale, has been withdrawn. The promoters persisted till they reached the Lords, but at last even they felt the indignation of every educated man in England.

Mr. Justice Fry is to be the new Lord Justice in place of Lord Justice Brett who has been made Master of the Rolls. Sir E. Fry is one of the soundest lawyers on the Bench, and will make a very good Judge of Appeal,—especially if he will beware of the danger of refining and making too much depend on single issues not of the widest kind. He is at once lucid and conscientious, and while grumblers might call him too scrupulous a Judge, even grumblers would find it difficult to name any other Judge so fit for the Court of Appeal. His forte is discrimination, and his danger is excess in the same direction. Mr. A. L. Smith is to be raised to the vacant seat on the Bench.

The new Archbishop of Canterbury received yesterday week a deputation bringing up the address against the Affirmation Bill, signed by nearly 14,000 of the Clergy, but his Grace's reply was very guarded. He reserved the chief part of what he had to say on the ground that he should probably have to speak his mind in another place. He observed, nevertheless, that he could see no abstract irreligion in substituting an affirmation for an oath, and he pointed out that it was by a simple declaration that the clergy now repudiate the crime of simony, and by a declaration that they give their assent to the Articles and the Book of Common Prayer. The Archbishop intimated that if any change were made, it should be made on religious grounds, and ought not to be open to the sort of interpretation to which the deputation had alluded,—the interpretation, we presume, that an Atheist was, somehow or other, to be got into the House of Commons. The Archbishop's remarks were cautious but not unsatisfactory so far as they went. But we should like to see our clergy openly admitting that there is a religious motive in doing plain political justice, even to a man whose morale and whose scorn for religion we heartily detest and repudiate.

The debate on Tuesday night on Mr. O'Connor Power's large proposals for an extensive scheme of Irish migration,—i.e., for removing the Irish peasants from the bad land in the west to better land elsewhere in Ireland which they are to be aided to reclaim,—seems to us to have disposed finally of the dream that any such scheme is feasible, or offers the slightest prospect of success. He proposed to spend three millions sterling in buying half a million of acres of reclaimable land, and two millions more in draining and building, so as to render them habitable, which would provide farms of twenty acres each for 25,000 Irish peasants. Mr. Trevelyan showed that the cost of this operation would greatly exceed £5,000,000, while the prospect of ever getting the expenditure back again would be extremely bad; whereas the same number of people could be established in comfort in Canada or the United States for a sum not greatly exceeding £625,000, about one-eighth of the sum which Mr. O'Connor Power demands for the far more risky operation which he proposed. Mr. Trevelyan's speech seems to us to have proved to demonstration that emigration, and not migration within the island, is the true remedy for the extreme poverty of the West Coast. Mr. O'Connor Power's motion was rejected, in favour of Lord Lyndhurst's recommendation of emigration, by 99 to 33; and then Lord Lyndhurst's proposal was put, and negatived without a division, on the ground that, though it suggested the right remedy, it suggested it in an impracticable form.

The Times of yesterday argues for the keeping up of the useless and futile Bishopric of Jerusalem, on no ground whatever that we can understand, except that a few English tourists might like it, and that it will be a lasting monument of the willingness of the Anglican Church to ally itself with the Lutheran and Calvinist Church of Prussia. At least, that is the only meaning which we can give to its reply to the very pertinent question, "What has the Bishopric done, and why should any attempt be made to retain it?" That reply is apparently that at least it had the merit of forcing Dr. Newman into the Church of Rome. To advocate the sending of a Bishop where he has no see and no clergy worth talking of, that he may comfort the minds of a few tourists, and remind Englishmen at home that the Anglican Church once at least proclaimed itself nearer to a Lutheran and Calvinist Church than to the Church of Rome, is one of the most puerile suggestions ever made by an English journalist. That is not half as sensible as a proposal to keep up the burning of the effigy of Guy Fawkes on November 5th, because it pleases many boys, and reminds the English public of the bloody intentions of a few Romanising traitors. Will the Times write next November deploring the disuse into which the burning of effigies of Guy Fawkes has unfortunately fallen?

James Stephens, the well-known Fenian head-centre, has written a remarkable letter to the Paris Correspondent of the Standard. In it he declares that if the defenders of the dynamite policy can only be crushed speedily, the Parnellites and the Irish Republican Brotherhood will be able, and will be compelled, to unite in one compact party for the deliverance of Ireland by force of arms. Mr. Parnell, by no fault of his own, has totally failed in his constitutional agitation. Stephens adds his belief that Mr. Parnell will ultimately agree to this course, as did Washington, Lord E. Fitzgerald, and Mr. Smith O'Brien. He believes that an insurrection, provided its object is separation, might, if carefully organised, be successful, and looks to a subsequent alliance with England so close as to be virtually federal. The total absence of insurrectionary plots in Ireland during the last few years, and the expressed repugnance of the leaders to the idea of a rising, will be quoted by the historians of the future as the strangest fact to be noted in the struggle. It seems to show either that the Irish leaders are less in earnest than they are supposed to be, or that they believe their followers to be so. Their excuse, the disproportion of force, is inadmissible. The disproportion is far less than that between the Low Countries and Spain, the American Colonies and England, the Highlanders and England in 1745, or La Vendée and France.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE DYNAMITE BILL.

THE living force remaining in our Parliamentary institutions was severely tested on Monday evening. The Houses were called upon to act rather like a Convention entrusted with power to do anything necessary for the safety of the people, than as deliberative bodies charged to discuss all proposals thoroughly before reducing them to law. One of those emergencies had occurred, happily so rare in our history, in which deliberation is in itself an evil, in which the thousand or more persons who make up the National Committee of Safety must act, instead of debating,—must recognise that the ship is on fire, and that the alternatives are obedience to the officers or a grand calamity. The Home Secretary informed the House of Commons on his responsibility that the rumoured plot for the destruction of London was a reality, that “the pirates of the human race”—they are rather its enemies, for pirates seek plunder—were preparing to use those malignant gifts of science, the new explosives, for the destruction of parts of the capital; that though many had been arrested, fresh agents were immediately expected to arrive, and that the law was insufficient to enable the Government to deal with them. It was necessary to act at once, and to depart from many cherished principles of English legislation. He called upon them to authorise the prisoner to claim the right of giving evidence, to enable the Magistrates to insist on answers criminating a witness—though such answers will not be produced against him—to sanction inquiries on oath when no one is in custody, to make British subjects responsible for acts done abroad, to make illicit possession of explosives of itself a felony punishable with fourteen years’ penal servitude, and to declare design when accompanied by preparation equivalent to successful action. There was material for a night’s debate in every clause of the Bill, and in ordinary times parties would have divided in defence of or attack on every new principle it implies. There was, too, exactly that condition of parties which might tempt such a division. The regular Opposition is eager for chances of effective debate, and not indisposed to waste time during which it is supposed that the popularity of the Government is diminishing. An irregular opposition of Free Lances, composed of four clever aspirants, and six or seven eccentrics, bores, and Irreconcilables, is favourable to veiled obstruction as an effective policy. More than thirty Irish Members have shown that they consider Obstruction a weapon to be used on behalf of Ireland, and were suspected—unfairly, we believe, as regards the majority—of considering Sir W. Harcourt’s “pirates” a forlorn-hope from their own army. Debate, which would be equivalent to failure, seemed eminently possible until the Houses sat; but once assembled, the Houses acted as if obstruction had never been a possibility. One single voice, that of the Tory Chief in the Lords, was heard in protest against rapid legislation; and for the rest, both Houses were unanimous. The Tories helped on the Bill heartily. The Irish Irreconcilables stayed away. The Fourth Party, the eccentrics, and the bores cowered before what they felt to be the national command, and a Bill which in principle is as stringent as any ever passed for the repression of crime in Ireland, a Bill which is really a milder Thuggee law, was swept through both Houses in a night, and was law on the following morning. And it would have been law had any one of the smaller factions ventured to oppose, for they would, in the determined mood of the Houses and the country, have been silenced or expelled, without consideration for any consequences, except the passing of the Bill. Parliament, in fact, showed itself a true exponent of the feelings of the people, rose to the height of the national danger, and met the declaration of war hurled at the country by the enemies of society with all the vigour and, we need not say, with five times the force that could have been displayed by any form of Dictatorship. The Houses were not carried away, either. The Bill is pronounced by the watchful Americans, who on many occasions play to England the part of posterity, “very mild,” the single clause which might be perverted was pointed out, and the merciful clause, which allows the accused to give his own evidence in contradiction to that of accusers, a right invaluable when motive is so completely the essence of the crime, was passed as readily as the clauses which punish.

Whether the Bill is an adequate Bill, remains to be proved; but we think it is. There is no moral reason in the world against inflicting death on those who prepare explosions of which death is an intended or is certain to be an incidental consequence; but there are reasons of expediency against it, the strongest being the difficulty of retaining extreme measures as permanent parts of the law. The present conspiracy, if experience may be trusted, will come shortly to an end, the excessive tension involved acting on the conspirators like a nervous disease; but the danger from science in malignant hands must remain permanent. Human curiosity, which we dignify so often with such fine names, has undone the casket, and the released Genius cannot be again confined. Scoundrels of all kinds are aware of nitro-glycerine, and all safeguards against crime are impaired thereby. No antidote is possible to the nitricized combustibles, or to those, still more dangerous, which do not destroy, but burn or asphyxiate—vide Colonel Majendie’s effort to destroy the contents of the Birmingham carboys—and the preventive laws must not, therefore, offend the national conscience in its normal state. The punishments are sufficient, and the real object of the Act, which is to untie the hands of the official investigators, who form our first line of defence, is most ably pursued. It is in prevention, it must not be forgotten, that safety is to be found. The Dynamiteurs—we had better adopt the French word at once—may yet secure, what they have not yet secured, fanatics as agents, and then punishment will not be of much avail. It is to prevention we must look, and the Bill authorises search as it would be authorised in a magazine with lucifers suspected to be hidden therein, enables Magistrates to take evidence at discretion, to correlate evidence, and to question criminal witnesses, and, in short, does everything that Irish experience has proved to be of value. These powers will be ably used. There are plenty of Magistrates in England with Mr. Jenkinson’s special faculty for tracing out crime—though Government was beaten by some of the worse Trades’ Unions—and the Police, under the new call upon their energies, are developing quite unexpected force. Their behaviour in presence of the new danger, which, it must be remembered, keenly affects the imagination, has been splendid, and has called out deserved encomiums in every Continental capital. Sergeants not specially picked travel miles with sleeping volcanoes between their knees, which, as they know, an extra rough jolt or an overturn might suddenly make active. They enter buildings which could in an instant be blown, with themselves, to atoms, without a shade of hesitation; and watch places compared with which a powder magazine is a secure residence, for weeks, with unflagging zeal. One policeman in particular seems to have chosen a house which he knew, “from his chemical studies,” to be perpetually exporting nitro-glycerine, as the proper place for him to sleep near. The work of detection, too, appears to have been honourably as well as vigilantly done, there being no trace of the employment of agents provocateurs, and no squeamishness whatever in ascertaining facts. The former device cannot be justified by any danger; but mere search, however secret, is, when legal, exactly on the same footing as the opening of letters under a Home-Office Warrant,—that is, it is a regrettable expedient, to be adopted only when the public safety requires, but then not to be neglected. That safety does require that a suspicion of manufacturing hundredweights of nitro-glycerine should be rebutted or confirmed, even though skeleton keys have to be employed by responsible officers in the process. With the new energy of the Police, the new powers of the Justices, and the aroused vigilance of the working-classes—who entirely object to have their children blown up at the bidding of persons in safety at a distance—and with steady avoidance of panic, we may, we believe, keep the enemy at a distance. If not, it must not be forgotten that English mining industries went on very well before nitro-glycerine was discovered, and that we cannot afford to cheapen stone, and slate, and coal, and tunnel work at any expenditure of uninterested human life. The explosion of cities must be prevented, if we have to buy up all the dynamite factories in the country, and make the Government sole manufacturer and possessor of the new artillery. States are not bound by any commercial consideration whatever to allow of private war, any more than they are bound to allow the construction of tunnels which may prevent sea-sickness, at the cost of a conscription.

LORD SALISBURY’S ESCAPE.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL’S Monday letters are likely to obtain a certain success, if one may call it success, as fiascos. Last week, his Monday letter in favour of Lord Salisbury, was followed by far the most enthusiastic demonstration in favour of Sir Stafford Northcote which that statesman has yet obtained in the House of Commons. This week his Monday letter to prove that Lord Salisbury is the only leader under whom the Conservative Party can ever act with force and unity, was followed within only a few hours by a most curious and striking demonstration on the part of Lord Salisbury himself,—undertaken, one would almost say, for the very purpose of destroying the idol which Lord Randolph Churchill had set up, and proving that the one man in the Conservative Party who is resolved to mortify every Conservative instinct, is the Marquis of Salisbury. "It is impossible," wrote Lord Randolph on Monday morning, "to foresee what may be the effect on the Liberal Party of the very liberal use of dynamite which has recently been made, and with which we are still threatened." Lord Salisbury himself was determined to verify in a most unexpected manner Lord Randolph Churchill's shrewd aperçu. The Marquis is, it is said, a scientific chemist, and possibly he had been trying his own hand on the experimental manufacture of dynamite. At all events, he felt so profound a sympathy with the makers of dynamite that he determined to explode a little moral nitro-glycerine of his own in defence of their rights, and before Lord Randolph's letter had been fairly digested by the greater number of his party, Lord Salisbury was heard in the House of Lords heaping the most contemptuous reproaches on the Government for their Explosive Substances Bill, accusing them of having "made a breach in the courtesy of the House," of having "practised a manoeuvre on our Parliamentary system," and, to the horror of the Conservative Peers present,—whose blood almost ran cold as they heard their Leader making his furious onslaught on the Government for the energetic proposal with which they ask leave to deal with the party of Dynamite,—threatening the Government that when the Conservative turn comes, the Tories will spring a mine on the Liberals in the very same way.

Probably no speech ever made in Parliament in our time has been heard with a greater sense of surprise and dismay. Some have conjectured that the only explanation of it is that Lord Salisbury fears a descent on the laboratory at Hatfield under the new Act, and resents the restrictions put upon his daring investigations into the chemistry of nitro-glycerine. Be that as it may, the explosion at the Local Government Office itself did not cause so much emotion as Lord Salisbury's speech. The House of Commons had passed the measure through all its stages without a division, and almost without a conversation, Sir Stafford Northcote not even opening his mouth, and Sir R. Cross, as the Conservative Home Secretary, giving the Bill his most cordial approval, though with some expression of hesitation as to the permanent character of its fourth section,—the section which would touch Lord Salisbury, if, indeed, he did attempt the manufacture of any appreciable quantity of nitro-glycerine in his private laboratory. But when Sir William Harcourt pointed out that no prosecution could take place under the Act except with the consent of the Attorney-General, and that in order to deal with the nameless owners of dynamite whose motives it is impossible to prove, it is absolutely essential to take vague powers, though it will be necessary, of course, to use them with the utmost discretion,—Sir R. Cross gave way at once, and even entreated the House not to diminish the responsibility of the Government for a measure adopted distinctly on their advice, by resisting any of its clauses. When the Bill, thus passed through all its stages in the Lower House within something like an hour, came up to the Lords, the last thing which anybody expected was that it would find its most bitter assailant in the leader of the Tory party. It was a measure which, had the Tories been in power, they might have proposed with some hesitation to the Liberals, knowing how constitutionally reluctant Liberals are to grant very large and vague powers to any Administration, even for the better protection of life and property. But it was a measure against which nobody dreamt that one of the richest and most arbitrary nobles in the kingdom, and one to whom all those who are rich and arbitrary look to denounce fiercely the democratic assailants of wealth and power, would take up the cudgels. Yet Lord Salisbury accused the Government of availing themselves of a popular panic for the purpose of excusing a violation of the Constitution and a trick on the usages of Parliament. We believe that the few Conservative Peers present felt as if a chasm had opened suddenly at their feet when they saw how near they had been to making a supreme leader of the man who thus attacked a measure after their own hearts. What did these Conservatives think of Lord R. Churchill's prophesying, after they had listened to Lord Salisbury's plea for the liberty of dynamite, as they read and re-read Lord Randolph's assertions that in the matter of the Arrears Bill, and in the matter of the Oaths or Affirmation, Lord Salisbury had been right and Sir Stafford Northcote wrong? They must have impatiently asked themselves what either Arrears Bills or Affirmation Bills matter, compared with power to put down these attempts to blow up London, and compared with the indecency of a Tory leader personally attacking the Government of the day for frankly asking the power it needs to put them down. Lord Randolph Churchill is certainly very unlucky. His suggestion that the "liberal use of dynamite,"—Lord Randolph does not spell "liberal" with a capital letter, but he evidently intended to play upon that meaning of the word,—might produce some vast change in the policy of the Liberal party, who might be induced to meet dynamite by proposing revolution, showed a real instinct of what was in the wind, though a perverted instinct. He scented danger, but he scented it from the wrong quarter. It was the Tory leader of his own heart who was meditating a liberal use of dynamite for the better guidance of the Tory party,—who was meditating the coup of blowing up his own reputation by an explosion in favour of Explosives.

After this, it is very little use discussing who may have been right and who wrong in relation to the Oath or Affirmation question, or in relation to the Arrears Bill. It is interesting to know on such good authority, what, however, was pretty well known before, that Sir Stafford Northcote originally sided with the Government on the Bradlaugh question, and was only brought over to the view of those champions of orthodoxy Sir H. Drummond Wolff and Lord Percy by the authority of Lord Beaconsfield. It is interesting to be assured that Lord Salisbury wanted to throw out the Arrears Bill on the second reading, and would have carried his party in the House of Lords with him, had not Sir Stafford intervened to plead for amendments; and had he not promised that if the amendments were rejected, he would support Lord Salisbury in throwing out the Bill. All these facts betray, what, indeed, no one who knows Sir Stafford Northcote can doubt, that he understands the genuine Conservatism of the country,—the spirit that dislikes change, and yet is never prepared for too violent a resistance to strongly supported change,—far better than Lord Salisbury. Sir Stafford Northcote, no doubt, like all Conservative statesmen, believes that when he surrenders the outworks he is not surrendering the citadel itself, but is going to make a strenuous defence in the citadel. Only when the moment comes for that strenuous defence, his prudence tells him that it is useless, and he surrenders the citadel too. That is not very gallant leadership. But it is thoroughly Conservative leadership. It is the kind of leadership that the timid party like, and what they are, on the whole accustomed to. Lord Salisbury does not belong to the timid party, and does not in the least understand them. He belongs to the raging party, the party that would smite democracy hip and thigh, if it could, from Dan even to Beersheba, but that if it could not, would welcome destruction on itself, rather than not express its passionate detestation of democracy in a pitched battle, however disastrous. He is the Coriolanus of our day; and no doubt, part of his interest in dynamite is a sort of dumb sympathy with restrained and captive violence such as that which burns within his own soul. A devotee of political epilepsy like Lord Randolph Churchill may well fix on Lord Salisbury as his trusted leader. But the true Conservative party, which dislikes nothing more intensely than political epilepsy, will not follow him. Sir Stafford Northcote has an easy game to play, which consists chiefly in holding his tongue, and letting his rival ruin his own cause. The fiasco of Monday night will not soon be forgotten. We take it that after that, Lord Salisbury has about as much chance of being recognised as Commander-in-Chief of the Conservative Party as O'Donovan Rossa himself.

THE REASONS FOR PAYING-OFF DEBT.

IT is worth while to consider the arguments for paying-off English Debt, for there is more latent distaste for Mr. Childers' proposals in that direction than their reception in Parliament would indicate. Everybody accepts them, but everybody does not like them; and if the electors were, as in France, the Fundholders, the resistance might speedily be perceptible. The opposition, which as yet is hardly overt, comes from two classes. A good many men, of whom Mr. Hubbard, we see, has made himself the spokesman, question whether the payment of Debt is really as beneficial to the country as the remission of taxes. You pay off an obligation, they say, to the extent of a million a year, and that money stays in the pockets of the people; but if you remit a tax of a million, the money also stays, and so, in addition, does all the profit from the fresh trade produced by every remission. If the tea-duty is taken off, for example, the poor benefit by the reduced cost of their tea, and, in addition, the exporter, the importer, the shipowner, and the distributing shopkeeper benefit by the increased consumption. That argument quite carries away some men, who forget that, apart altogether from the general reasons of State policy, which we give below, every remission of a tax tends, in the first instance, to benefit a class, the traders; while every reduction of Debt directly relieves the whole community, which is not only taxed for the Debt, but is answerable for its security. There might, of course, be a tax so bad in principle or oppressive in its incidence, that no reduction of Debt could be as valuable as the remission of the impost; but, unless we consider tobacco a necessity, or believe the Income-tax to be deducted from the wage-paying fund, instead of the fund for buying superfluities—as is now nearly, though not quite, true—no such tax can be said to remain. Those who oppose reduction of Debt on this ground are not, however, so formidable as those who dislike it on another. These are the whole body of Trustees, including Corporations like the Hospitals, timid investors, and men interested in Banks, Insurance Companies, and all the concerns which must place large sums in securities at once safe and saleable at short notice. They know perfectly well the first secret of 'Change—that, as compared with the bulk of the Debt, the quantity of Consols bought and sold is very small indeed; they see that Two and a half per cent. Stock mounts with the steadiness of mercury in fine weather, and they fear that with the heavy and continuous purchases arranged by Mr. Childers, Consols will speedily reach the point—105, we believe—at which conversion becomes a financial certainty. They see a gaunt spectre before them, a National Stock yielding only two and a half per cent., with a subsidiary Stock behind that yielding only two; and they ask, with deep sighs, half of alarm and half of fatness, what, then, will be the use of accumulating cash? Every safe investment sympathises with Consols, their great old rival, Land, is terribly out of favour, and it seems possible that 2 per cent. may, within ten years, be for the time a usual minimum dividend. Some of our readers will smile, but in every country except England and America this odd fear—a fear, in truth, lest one's credit should be too good—weighs heavily on Treasuries, preventing operations of great profit to the taxpayer. In France in particular, the Treasury is at this moment paying £2,250,000 a year more than it need, from a fear that the peasant holders of the Fives will be enraged if they are suddenly paid off, or offered Fours.

There is, of course, no danger from this fear in England, where the notion of taxing the people for a needless payment to Fundholders would be scouted; but still it operates silently, and it is well every now and then to state the great reasons for paying Debt. One distinctly is a moral one, that if we have borrowed foolishly or lavishly—and we have undoubtedly done both, though not on our grandfathers' scale—we ought to pay off our own Debt, if we can, and not burden posterity for ever. Posterity is justly liable for any cost of insurance, but not in the same degree for the cost of blundering. Of course, it must pay, just as the son of a drunkard must pay for his father's drunkenness; but the liability is more an affliction than a duty. Another reason, a temporary one, is the certainty that, as gold is becoming appreciated—we wish Mr. Goschen would give us a better word—the Debt must, while that process continues, press more heavily, the interest on Consols being guaranteed in gold. A third argument is the strong probability that this generation is eating too greedily of the great cake, its territorial fortune. We may be exhausting the soil, we are certainly exhausting the woods, the quarries, and the brick-fields, and we shall shortly be exhausting the coal-mines. There may be remedies for this, for we do not know what science will do for us,—if we could store the electricity developed, for instance, by the tide, we might almost dispense with coal,—but the probability of exhaustion is great enough to be considered, as is also the chance that emigration may at no distant date deplete the population of Great Britain, as well as of Ireland. There is no present danger, for the emigrants, though they carry away energy, leave room for those left behind to use their energies in; but a large reduction of population would make the Debt a much more serious weight. We should stagger under it, if we were only twenty millions, with a soil pining for a period of recuperation, and producing, therefore, poor crops,—a state of affairs which many keen observers believe to have already arrived in Ireland. To pay off Debt under such circumstances is only wise, as wise as it would be in a landlord who expected a fall of rents to clear off his mortgages while his income remained at its high level. Englishmen hardly feel the taxes just now—the true secret of the tendency to increased Estimates—and they should utilise their prosperity to reduce the burdens on their future.

The grand reason for paying Debt is, however, none of these, but a very different one. We want to strengthen the credit of the State, as the cheapest and best of all Insurances. That Credit is, in truth, a gigantic force, which enables England even now to maintain her position in the world without a conscription, and which may hereafter enable her to undertake great schemes for the internal benefit of the people. The ability to raise huge sums at once rapidly and cheaply is the steam-power in our engine. The Continent smiles at our Army, but does not want to provoke us, because it knows that it could be quintupled for defence without the Treasury quaking. A hundred millions a year would give us a million of men, and we could spend that for five years, and still be burdened only with an extra fourpence on the Income-tax and threepence a pound on sugar. That is a brutal form of stating the truth, but it is a truth; and in the truth, which becomes more true with every payment of Debt, is the most potent application of the principle of Insurance. We have not to pay the money, because we could pay it. If any one doubts that, let him look at the position of the United States. That grand Republic has no Fleet, and on the water could hardly fight Spain. But she has reduced her Debt by strenuous paying to a trifling amount, barely ten millions a year, and every one knows that if she wanted a fleet to blow Spain out of the water, or to contest the seas with us, she would buy and build one in twelve months. Her payment of her Debt is an insurance not only against defeat, but against attack. Nor is this all. If there is one movement in modern society which is gaining in distinctness, startling distinctness, it is that which impels the whole community to use its aggregate force for the benefit of the suffering masses at its base. Call it Socialism, or any nickname you please, but the impulse is there. At this moment, England has given sixty millions,—the capital value of the permanent tax of three millions,—for the education of the Poor. At this moment, Lord Salisbury, the Tory chief, not the Liberal, has publicly stated that it would be well for the State to assist in rehousing the body of the people, that is, practically to rebuild, or repair, or improve the majority of the six million houses in the country, a task of appalling extent. It is certain that not only will such propositions continue to be made, but that some of them, once reduced to solid plans, will sooner or later be carried out. The Democracy will not live in wretchedness, if it can be comfortable without plunder. The whole question, whether this movement shall be ruinously costly, that is, shall involve such taxation as will make industry languish, or shall be comparatively cheap, will depend in the long-run on State credit, and that is dependent on payment of the Debt. Suppose, again to put the matter with brutal distinctness, it took a loan of £500,000,000 to repair the lacunæ in our civilisation, the bad housing of the people being one of them. What would that cost in dividend? At present, probably four per cent., or £20,000,000 a year; but, if conversion could be effected, and a Two per Cent. Loan be started, it might be only three per cent., or only £15,000,000. In other words, Mr. Childers' principle would have increased the potency of the State for social improvement, as well as for battle, by one-fourth, a calculation which is possibly in excess of present truth, but which will bring the actual truth home to all minds. That truth is, that not only is every hundred millions we pay off available for future expenditure, but available at a lower rate, the investors thinking the State promise still more secure. In other words, if we could gradually pay the whole Debt off, the Kingdom could raise a thousand millions for any beneficial or needful purpose, and then be no more burdened than it is now. We despair of conveying to our readers an accurate impression of the magnitude of that force, for a mouth-filling phrase like a thousand millions—though it is only two-thirds of the French Debt—is, except to financiers, beyond realisation; but perhaps this will give them some idea of it:—The power to raise a thousand millions means the power to employ a million of workers or fighters at £1 a week for twenty years. Of course, the Debt will not be paid, though the Americans are setting such an example; but Mr. Childers's heavy blows at it, which he would redouble if the Representatives encouraged him, do proportionately store up new force for the State, which Parliament may in twenty years employ in furthering great efforts for the improvement of the condition of the people. Socialism, as usually explained, we distrust utterly. A man in health should either earn his own living or go where he can do it, not pillage his neighbours; but that the community can make this earning easier, by securing certain conditions of civilisation at the general expense, we make no doubt whatever. It is all very well to talk of Socialism, but if the English were a non-subscribing people, like the French and Irish, a State-supported Hospital for Accidents would have to be set up in each great city. All the chatter in the world about paying for one's own broken bones would not hinder that work one week.

FRANCE AND GERMANY.

THE discussion which has been raging this week upon the Continent as to the alleged Tripartite Treaty between Germany, Austria, and Italy, has thrown a flood of light upon Prince Bismarck's present policy, and on the situation of France. In the first place, it is clear that he has succeeded in binding the three States together in a defensive league against any attack from France, or France at the head of a coalition. It was from the beginning certain that Reuter's telegram of last week, with its official form and simple directness of statement, either emanated from the Italian Ministry, or was sanctioned by them, as otherwise it would never have got over the Italian wires. Continental Governments, fortunately, do not allow semi-official corporations like "Reuter's" and the "Agence Havas" to publish statements of that kind, statements which might produce a breach of international relations, at their own discretion. If they did, the fortunes of all fundholders, and perhaps the peace of the world, would lie at the mercy of a cosmopolitan group of acute speculators, whose agents know exactly how news will affect the markets. The denials instantly made signified little, the governing theory of foreign diplomatists being that if you have a right to keep a Treaty secret, you have ex necessitate a right to deny its existence; and now the form of denial has been given up. The Foreign Minister of Italy, S. Mancini, has admitted in Parliament, while employing all forms of politeness towards France, that there is an agreement which, in his judgment, will tend to make Italy more secure; and an "eminent Italian" in Paris, obviously not an independent personage, has explained to the Daily News the object for which it has been made. The Government of Vienna has suddenly stopped some costly preparations it was making for the additional defence of its southern frontier, and is slowly moving garrisons from the south to the east; while in Berlin, Prince Bismarck has spoken for himself, in the North-German Gazette. In an article admitted to be directly inspired, that journal points out that the interests of the three Powers compel an alliance, inasmuch as all must be endangered if one were defeated, and allows that the three Courts have simultaneously perceived wherein their interest lies. In fact, though a formal reticence is still preserved, in order to avoid international questioning, the fact of an agreement is conceded, and whether it is in the form of a Treaty or of an accepted memorandum matters little. That it is unwritten we do not believe, for there are no facts more constantly present to Prince Bismarck than his master's age and his own broken health, and he would not leave either Rome or Vienna the chance of denying hereafter that she was bound in honour to support Germany. As to the precise nature of the agreement little is said, but Reuter's original account was plainly either an official lie or an official truth, and was most probably the latter. At all events, the drift of the agreement may safely be taken to be that, if France attacks either Germany, or Austria, or Italy, the remaining two Powers shall defend the attacked one; and that if Russia alone attacks either, the other two shall either assist or remain benevolently neutral. Prince Bismarck has, in fact, bound Central Europe, from Königsberg to Naples, into a single defensive league, so strong in men and organisation that attack on it would be almost an act of madness. The combined German and Austrian armies, two millions strong, are set absolutely free, without dread even of a diversion from the Italian side. No Power not carried away by a Revolutionary mania would risk so dangerous an enterprise. So long as this agreement continues, and is not transmuted into an offensive league, Europe is safe from war, except under one contingency. A Revolutionary party may master either France or Russia and pour over the frontier, carrying an idea before its armies, as happened in 1793. Such an occurrence might dissolve all combinations, but though possible, it is outside the range of practical politics, and for the present there is peace,—armed, burdensome, and costly peace, but still peace.

The state of affairs now admitted, and commented on in France with extreme though natural acrimony, has been for some time suspected, and we turn with fresher interest to the arguments which have produced it. These are not, as might have been supposed, fears of a Revolution in France, but fears of a Restoration. Prince Bismarck has a low idea of popular forces; he thinks, like a true Prussian, that they are always weak for war, and he avows in the North-German Gazette, for the twentieth time, that he has no dread of France while she is still Republican. Her institutions bind her, he says, to keep the peace. He does not believe, in fact, that she will be able to go to war, and he says so with a crude frankness which has almost put the Republican journalists of Paris beside themselves. They cannot bear to be told that Republicanism means weakness abroad, and they would like to march to Berlin, just to show Monarchists that Republics can fight, if they please. Their anger is a little unreasonable, as Prince Bismarck has expressed the same opinion before; but it is accentuated by his avowal of another and a new belief. He thinks the French Republic in danger, and that not from the Extremists, but from the Royalists. He expects, he hints, to see a King in France who must rely upon the Army and the Clericals, and who will, if it is humanly possible, declare war either upon Germany or Italy. The claim of the new monarch to his throne will be the revival of French ascendancy in Europe. The Italians are under the same apprehension. Their statesmen think the Republic has failed because its Ministers change so rapidly, and expect its successor to be a King. Indeed, the "eminent Italian" who instructs the Daily News, and who is plainly acquainted with the arguments which move his own Court and Berlin, affirms that the leading Generals of the French Army have an understanding among themselves that the Monarchy shall be restored. In this event, he says Italy would at once have to dread invasion for the restoration of Rome to the Papal Chair, and of course Europe would be in flames. No date for this action of the Generals is mentioned, but a remark made by M. Ferry, during the debate on the Expulsion Bill, that the Comte de Paris would be a "formidable personage" when the Comte de Chambord died, suggests that this is the contingency that the Generals are supposed in France, as well as in Italy, to await.

All this seems to us rather dreamy, but the dream is one of a kind which may weigh heavily both with Prince Bismarck and King Humbert. The latter probably inherits his father's dread of the Roman Question as the one serious danger of the new Monarchy, while the former has been consistent all through. He cannot conceive that a Republic can be strong, or that "an Army" can mean anything but its General Officers. He, therefore, though expecting peace while the Republic lasts, disbelieves in its lasting, and he may very well think he knows that the General Officers in France are both discontented and inclined to Monarchy. His two data—that the Republic will not last, and that Generals are the Army—being granted, his policy is clear enough; and it is as to his data, if anywhere, that he is making mistakes. We believe he is making them. We question the grounds for his belief that the Republic will fall, and deny entirely that the French General Officers are equivalent to the Army of France. The latter assumption was disposed of when Marshal MacMahon resigned, for, but that he knew that a coup d'état would produce "war in the barracks," he would have retained the Presidency. The French Generals will not face that danger, and if they will not, they must wait till the peasants and artisans who fill the ranks weary of the Republic. Where is the sign of that? The peasantry are so content that they hardly care to go to the polls, and scarcely know the names of the Ministers whom the National Assembly chooses to set up. So far from their sympathising in the rage at the loss of prestige which is supposed to influence the Army, they notoriously abandoned Gambetta for fear he should go to war, and would turn out any Chamber which embarked on a policy of enterprise. They refused even to permit action in Egypt. Their feeling may change, of course, but till it changes it must sway the private soldiery; and if it did change, why should they turn to a King? Because, Prince Bismarck will say, he alone could give them the needful military strength. That is his view, and it may be a true one—we do not think so—but it is the exact opposite of the view of French Republicans. Their belief, certainly justified by their history and by the example of 1870, is that a Republic has more energy than a Monarchy, that the People can find a better General than a King can, and that if they are to fight, they had better fight under a Dictatorship. Had Gambetta lived, it is to him they would have turned, and French capacity did not die with Gambetta. We see nothing even plausible in Prince Bismarck's view, while its expression will undoubtedly produce two grand results. The peasantry will be more convinced than ever that the Republic means peace and the Monarchy war, while the Republicans will be more angrily zealous than ever to place men of their own opinions at the head of the great military divisions. The Prince has made the Monarchy and its adherents alike "suspect," and has so far done all he could to prevent the realisation of his own dream. He may, of course, retort that this is what he wishes, but he must not complain if increased belief in his patriotism is accompanied by decreased belief in his sagacity.

THE NEW ASPECT OF THE AFFIRMATION BILL.

WE are not particularly well pleased—except so far as the change promises a speedier, though a scantier measure of justice—with the decision of the Government that what is called the retrospective action of the Affirmation Bill is to be dropped. If it is just to allow any constituency to elect whom they will to a seat in the House of Commons, without imposing on the person chosen any theological test, it is clearly just to insist that, when once he has been thus chosen,—hateful as we regard some of his convictions and some of his denials,—he ought to be permitted to take his seat in the House of Commons without imposing on him any such test, and without subjecting him to special disabilities on the ground that he has been franker with the House of Commons than many of his brother-Members. The Clergy seem to us to have got into their heads the very unmanly and immoral idea that if you can find the means of politically plaguing an Atheist of immoral opinions, you ought to do so, even though you cannot justify on any principle the course you pursue. Nobody pretends that a genuine theistic test ought to be elaborated and enforced on Members of the House of Commons. Nobody pretends that the present Oath was imposed in order to play the part of such a test, or that it could be defended on principle if it had been imposed for that purpose. And yet, all those who argue against the Affirmation Bill, argue that it is right to take advantage of a sheer political accident, which no one asks us to erect into a permanent barrier, for the purpose of keeping an objectionable Member outside the House of Commons. We confess that that seems to us a very petty sort of political injustice. We could say a great deal in favour of making one of Mr. Bradlaugh's books the ground for expelling him from the House of Commons. We can say nothing at all in favour of the spiteful advantage which the pseudo-religious party have taken of his frankness with the House of Commons, to keep him out of his seat by a side-wind. It seems to us that it is often right to smite evil as evil. But we deny that it is ever right to deny to a man in whom we find evil, simply because we find that evil in him, the full advantage of the general principles which we have laid down for all Englishmen alike. We therefore take no pleasure at all in the decision of the Government to follow a precedent in itself tainted with the same kind of injustice, by refusing retrospective effect to the Affirmation Bill. The only result of that refusal is that it will put Mr. Bradlaugh to the expense of seeking a new election, and will give his opponents one more chance of defeating him at the poll,—unfairly, as it seems to us, in both cases. Nothing would please us better than to see Mr. Bradlaugh defeated at the poll, if his seat had been vacated through any of the ordinary causes which vacate seats. But we feel more keenly any deliberate unfairness to one whose principles we condemn so strongly as we condemn Mr. Bradlaugh's, than we should feel it towards a man whom we could admire and revere. There is nothing which seems to us more obligatory than to be scrupulously just in our treatment of those whom we dislike and condemn.

Still, the effect of the new departure is undoubtedly this,

—that the Conservatives, instead of being able for the future to call the Affirmation Bill a Bradlaugh Belief Bill, ought, if they were but just, to call it a Bill for compelling Mr. Bradlaugh to run the gauntlet of a third election before taking his seat. Considering that no one pleads for a genuine theistic test for Members of Parliament, that no one supposes that such a test is even possible, that every one of the "pious" party regards the chance of keeping out Mr. Bradlaugh as a mere wind-fall for them, to which his own frankness has accidentally exposed him, it must be admitted, we think, that, far from being a Bradlaugh Belief Bill, this is a Bill for imposing a mild species of pains and penalties on a particular atheist who happened to have confided his state of mind to the House. We quite admit that the precedent drawn from the reluctant relief afforded to Roman Catholics is a strong precedent, and covers exactly the same ground. Only we should say that there also injustice was done, owing to the exceeding parsimony with which English religion usually deals out justice to those whom it has formerly thought it its duty to withstand. Mr. O'Connell, the elected Roman Catholic candidate of 1829, was elected with a full knowledge of his Roman Catholicism, and, indeed, because of his Roman Catholicism; and to put him to the necessity of appealing again to his constituents to say that they would elect him none the less willingly because Parliament had accorded to him a tardy and scanty justice, was to our mind simply unfair. And so with Mr. Bradlaugh. Northampton, no doubt, had the bad-taste to elect him in great measure because of his well-known denial of faith in a God, and it would be simply ridiculous to suppose that anybody voted for him so long as the Oath stood in his way, who would refuse to vote for him after the obstacle had been removed. At least, if any such there were, they certainly deserved to have no new chance of rejecting him, for they knew that the House itself might at any time admit him to take the oath, if the majority should be disposed so to do. We think that both in 1829 and now, the election validly made, and to which effect could not be given only because the oath could not be taken, should have been accepted, so soon as the special difficulty was removed. However, the Government have decided otherwise, and we do not doubt that their decision will much facilitate the passing of a good Bill, though not the Bill which we should have preferred. And certainly, it takes away the last excuse which any one not desirous of imposing a strict Theistic test can offer for opposing it. Even the House of Lords will hardly venture to refuse the House of Commons the power of accepting an affirmation instead of an oath, from those who regard the affirmation as equally obligatory on them and as a more veracious expression of their true mind. At least, if the Peers do choose to make a great constitutional question of the oath, it is clear that they must, in common consistency, alter the oath itself, and do whatever they can to prevent its being taken, as it has so often been taken, by Agnostics, Secularists, Positivists, and Indifferentists,—in fact, by men to whom religious questions have never been serious questions in any sense, and who have repeated the oath just as they would stand up at grace, just to conform to a convention which did not interest them sufficiently to dispose them to challenge or resist it. If the Oath is, in future, to be a bulwark of Theism, it must be a very different thing indeed from what it has been. And this, we think, even the House of Lords must recognise, should they feel disposed to throw out the Affirmation Bill. The only thing to be said in favour of the abandonment of the retrospective clause is this,—that incomplete justice speedily granted is often a great deal better than complete justice long deferred; and that the abandonment of the retrospective clause will undoubtedly make the Bill a great deal easier to pass, though not so complete a satisfaction of the political justice of the case when once it is passed.

THE GRAND COMMITTEES.

THE important experiment of delegating the detailed work of the House of Commons to Grand Committees has now been on trial for a week. The Standing Committee on Trade meet on Mondays and Fridays, the Standing Committee on Law on Tuesdays and Thursdays. By this arrangement, the members of the two Committees are placed as nearly as possible on an equality. Each Committee has to give up a morning and a Government night; each will enjoy the comparative leisure of a morning and a private Member's night. The Members of the Committee on Trade came off a little the worst, because Supply is usually taken on a Friday evening, whereas Tuesdays very often end in a count-out. But when the burdens are not identical, it is impossible to adjust them with entire accuracy, and though the easier work of the two falls to the Committee on Law, it comes upon the men who, in other respects, have most to do. The accommodation in the two Committee Rooms is sufficient,—a point which in any building associated with the House of Commons deserves notice for its strangeness. At starting, an effort has been made to obliterate the usual party division as regards seats, the first move in this direction being appropriately made by Mr. Forster. As the Bills which will be referred to the Standing Committees will be those into which party considerations are supposed not to enter, this is a sensible innovation. Inasmuch, however, as party considerations do sometimes intrude themselves where they are least expected, it is not impossible that in the end the gangway of the Committee Room may be as significant a division as the floor of the House itself. There is but little room for Reporters, and the morning papers seemingly hold themselves emancipated from the obligation of reporting the proceedings any earlier than suits their convenience. At least, the report of Monday's proceedings did not appear in the Times until Wednesday. On the whole, this is no disadvantage. Discussions in Committee are, or ought to be, meant for the Committee itself, not for the outside public. It is enough for them to follow the debates on general principles, which are still reserved to the full House. Nothing probably will more promote the business like shortness, which has hitherto characterised the meetings of the Committees. The members scarcely speak for five minutes, but they thresh-out all the stronger arguments, till their debates are far more interesting to read than those of the House. They evidently mean business, and they advance it rapidly.

The first question that had to be decided on Monday was the position and functions of the Chairman. Ought he to regard himself as the Speaker of the Committee, or may he leave the Chair, and make a speech like any ordinary Member? The question is not one that decides itself. On the one hand, if the Chairman declares himself for or against an amendment, it may bring his impartiality into suspicion. It is not often, indeed, that a Chairman has the opportunity of making or marring an amendment, but from time to time such an occasion does present itself, and when it does, it is undoubtedly convenient that the Chairman should have taken no part in the discussion. On the other hand, the Chairman's opinion will usually be better worth having than that of most other Members of the Committee as regards the particular Bill which is being considered. Mr. Goschen, for example, is a great authority on trade and commerce, and if he is silenced, as he wishes to be, the Committee will undoubtedly be the losers. The shortest way out of the difficulty would be for the Chairman of each Committee to be taken from among the less qualified Members; but this would hardly, in the long-run, add to the dignity of the Committee, or help to speed the despatch of its business. All things considered, we incline to think that Mr. Goschen's view is needlessly formal, and that the advantage of hearing his opinion on critical questions overbalances the risk that, when he interferes to keep order, he may be supposed to lean too strongly to the side on which he has himself spoken. Of one thing, however, we are clear, and that is, that the Chairman ought not to have power to "sum up." The case of a Judge summing-up the evidence to a jury is not really parallel. Grand Committees will be quite able to form their own conclusion upon the arguments they have heard, and what the Chairman would have to lay before them would not be evidence which needs analysis by a trained mind, in order to show the true bearing of what has been said, but opinions which have already fulfilled, or failed to fulfil, the end for which they have been stated. A Chairman's summing-up would really be the most effective of all the speeches on the side which he really favoured, and it would be all the more effective, because it would have the apparent impartiality of a Judge's charge.

It is not, however, in the Committee-rooms that the fate of the Grand Committees will be decided. So long as a Bill is before them, everything may go well. The experiment may seem to show that the details of a long and complicated measure can now be settled without undue delays or unnecessary chatter, and that a Standing Committee can be made so fair a representative of the best sense of the House, as to make its judgment upon matters of detail more valuable, because more intelligent, than that of the House itself. But when all this has been made plain, the ill-considered action of a minority may, unless the House is at once patient and resolute, undo all that the Grand Committee have effected. In theory, every point that has been fought-out in a Standing Committee may be fought-out again on the Report. The House of Commons has merely delegated its powers in a particular stage of certain Bills; it has not definitely parted with those powers. Every amendment that has been proposed and rejected in the Committee may be re-proposed when the Committee submits the result of its labours to the House; and if Mr. Lowther is to be believed, there will be some Members whose high sense of duty will forbid them to be content with any conclusion in framing which they have not had a hand. On this theory, the fact that a Standing Committee has spent weeks on a Bankruptcy Bill must go for nothing, so long as there be in the House a single country gentleman, Guardsman, or younger son who has still something to contribute from the depths of his impecunious consciousness to the true view of the question. On the other hand, it may sometimes happen that some point of real importance, or—what in legislation comes pretty nearly to the same thing—what a good many people think of real importance, has either been neglected or too soon dismissed in the deliberations of the Standing Committees. A Member who makes this omitted point his own will have no opportunity of pressing it upon the Committee, and his only chance of calling attention to it will be to move an amendment on the Report. The success of the Grand-Committee experiment will depend in a great measure upon the power of the House to discourage the first kind of reconsideration, without discouraging the second. It must learn how to resist endeavours the object of which is not so much to alter the result, as to repeat the process by which it has been reached, and yet listen willingly to any honest effort to show that the Committee has left a part of its work undone, or has done it badly. It will not be an easy combination to secure, but Grand Committees have already disappointed so many prophets of evil, that it is allowable to hope that this further triumph may yet be in store for them.

THE FEAR OF DYNAMITE.

THAT Dynamite should be greatly dreaded is natural, because anything which will destroy great numbers at once is greatly dreaded. The sympathy between human beings is so strong, that a prospect of the simultaneous death of a large group creates more fear—or is it more agitation?—in each of them than the fear of death for himself only does. Good troops will not face fire which, in military phrase, has more than a certain "weight"—that is, kills more than its fair proportion of men at once. Each soldier will face death for himself, but if it is to come to all dying at once, then he will not face it. English soldiers are panic-stricken if they fancy a mine below them, though a mine can only inflict on each the death which each is prepared to encounter in the course of his duty, with no especial shrinking. English sailors are brave to recklessness, but the Admirals in the Crimea discovered and reported that the new shells "must be kept out," for if they are allowed to enter as they are in wooden ships, the sailors would not fight. The multitude of deaths occurring all at once in the confined space cowed them, as they were not cowed by equal, or nearly equal, risks from a succession of shots killing two or three men apiece. The inventors of the mitrailleuse rested the argument for their machine not so much on the number of men it would kill—for, of course, an increase of riflemen in number equal to the tubes of the mitrailleuse would kill as many—as on the moral effect of the destruction of so large a number at once. A mitrailleuse was really only a number of rifles in line, but its effect on the imagination was as if a new rifle had been made to fire ten scattering bullets at once. Indeed, the question is hardly arguable. Everybody feels that he would rather face a force which may kill one man of the regiment in three, than a force which, if it kills at all, will kill a third of the regiment at once. Whether he feels for the multitude, or, as cynics would say, fancies his own chance lessened, he fears the second force more; and dynamite is a force of the second kind. It can kill crowds at once. It is, therefore, natural that it should be dreaded, until men have begun to exaggerate its powers to a rather absurd degree. Those powers are terribly great, within a certain range; but, as we pointed out a fortnight since, there are limits to their action. No explosive manufactured by man can pass through a mountain, or through the obstacle presented by the curvature in the earth's surface; and the notion, therefore, of destroying London at a blow by an explosion of dynamite is simply preposterous. If all the nitro-glycerine in the world were exploded on Hampstead Heath, Westminster would be unaffected, except conceivably as to its windows, which might be blown-in by the impact on the air. Indeed, Mr. George M. Roberts, Technical Manager of Nobel's Explosives Company—a company which plants its works in Ayrshire, to be well out of the way, and could, we imagine, tell strange stories of men's indifference to the chance of death— informs the world that the limit on the action of nitro-glycerine is very much closer than this. He has, no doubt, an interest in allaying an alarm which may threaten his works, by rendering it necessary to stop manufacture altogether; but still he is an expert, with a scientific reputation to lose, and he tells us that the destroying force has been ascertained by experiment to decrease in such a ratio to the distance, that if on the spot it were represented by one million, at a hundred feet distance it would be represented by only one. The ton becomes at that distance in its effective force only the thirtieth part of an ounce. "If a ton of dynamite were exploded in a London street, the effects would be felt severely in the immediate neighbourhood only of the explosion, and beyond that they would be confined to the mere breakage of windows." That is not quite the whole truth, because, as we know from the history of the explosion in Parliament Street, dynamite can exert a projecting force, and a shower of blocks of masonry flung some hundred yards with the force of solid shot would be more destructive than the fire of any battery. Nevertheless, Mr. Roberts' statement shows that natural terror has produced great exaggeration, and that entire cities cannot be destroyed, as people fancy, at a blow; while the superstition that the Anarchists possess some unknown explosive of hitherto unimagined powers, is declared to be unfounded. There is nothing stronger, Mr. Roberts affirms, than "blasting gelatine"—which cannot be made by unskilled persons—and the strength of this is only fractionally greater than that of nitro-glycerine, and only fifty per cent. higher than that of dynamite, which, again, is to gunpowder as eight to one. He does not affirm that no stronger exploding compound could be made, but evidently, with his large knowledge of the subject, believes that it has not been made.

So far, the awe inspired by dynamite is intelligible enough, even if we exclude, as we ought not to do, the political dread arising from it, akin to the dread, which so influences soldiers, of not only being killed, but defeated by new guns; but there is another question more difficult to answer. Why do men fear an explosive of this kind more than another cause of death? The statement may be denied, because so many men, with Colonel Majendie at their head, have recently shown that they can master the fear; but it is, we imagine, true. We suspect, if we could interview Colonel Majendie, he would tell us that mixing nitro-glycerine "not clean of acid," and therefore "unstable" to the last degree, with Hanoverian earth, was more nervous work than facing a battery; and that he would, on the whole, rather take death from a bullet than from a pail of the greasy hell-fire. At all events, there is one bit of evidence which everybody can test for himself. Have we a reader who does not think it rather braver of a policeman to carry about a carboy of nitro-glycerine than to charge a burglar presenting a revolver at his head? In the one case, the impression produced is that of courage, in the other, that of heroism; and yet in both cases the risk is the same,—the risk of an instantaneous death, which, moreover, would probably be more painless from the dynamite than from the revolver. What is the cause of the difference? We believe it to be an effect produced on the imagination, whether of the man endangered, or of the man who reads about him, by three separate causes. One is the shock always produced by the belief that numbers must die, which, as we have seen, affects the bravest and most disciplined men, and which is the secret of the panic in individuals caused by diseases like cholera, which notoriously are not so certainly mortal to any individual as, say, cancer, and nothing like so painful. Another is the special dread, or rather horror, created by unaccustomed modes of death, or death from forces as yet little known or measured. The European public is not yet accustomed to dynamite, except as a blasting agent, and feels a little as if a new and specially fatal disease had broken out like a "black plague" in its midst. In its inexperience, it imagines for the victim tortures which could hardly exist, and general results which are a mere heaping together of improbable possibilities. In fact, it gives its imagination the rein, as it could not do if it were more experienced. Our correspondent, "M." evidently thinks that this is the whole reason of the fear of dynamite, and that if the world, when gunpowder was discovered, had been as sensitive or electric as it is now, it would have imagined from that discovery all the evils we now expect from dynamite. That is very shrewd, for undoubtedly the origin of the alarm is not a new force—gunpowder being dynamite with less power—so much as a new form of human wickedness, and if all dynamiteurs committed suicide from remorse, or retired penitent to convents, the new discovery would speedily be ranked with gunpowder, as nothing but a new resource. But still this is only a part of the truth, the horror being increased, as we have said, by the multitude endangered, and also by the absence of personality in dynamite. We expect it to explode, and in most cases it has exploded, without any man there and then manipulating it. This might be quite as true of gunpowder, which also could be fired in barrels by slow fuses, but owing to its use in war and sport we do not think of it in that way. We expect to find a man behind the rifle or the revolver, and have a courage for the combat with man, however armed, which does not exist for a combat with a blind, speechless, and, so to speak, natural force. To face dynamite is to the imagination to face the lightning, or an earthquake, or a lava-stream, or any other death-giver, before which fortitude is useless, and retreat not dishonourable. Nothing, not even habit, will give men courage in the presence of earthquake, though, like everything else, an earthquake can only kill you once; and to the imagination the true analogue of earthquake is dynamite. It can give death when death has not been directly willed by any one, death by its own invisible, unaccountable, inexplicable rage; and man, under all circumstances, dreads the stone that can speak. The dread may diminish with time, if over long periods dynamite remains inert, as gunpowder does; but whenever it is used, it will, we believe, revive. If meteorites were ten acres broad, and could kill mortals in heaps, men would fear them who do not fear bullets, and who would be willing, on good cause shown, to accompany forlorn-hopes. Death without the possibility of resistance is far more appalling than death with a fight for it, however hopeless, for it excites the imagination more.

MR. BRIGHT ON THE BLESSEDNESS OF COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

MR. BRIGHT'S speech at the Institution of Civil Engineers, on Saturday, in Kensington Town Hall, evinced a strange sort of unreasoned, not to say almost superstitious, conviction, that under all kinds of circumstances, the more intercourse you can promote between one nation and another, the more friendly, and the more likely to profit by their friendship, those nations will become. Mr. Bright's object, apparently, was to persuade his hearers that if the Channel Tunnel could be made to answer commercially,—on which he offered no opinion,—it could not but answer morally. The mercantile profit of the transaction might be a dubious question, and without that necessary condition Mr. Bright did not appear willing to answer for the moral advantage of the enterprise. But, granted its mercantile success, he seems to think that the moral consequences of the undertaking are not within the limits of discussion. "Anything which will bring the people of the Continent into cordial relations with the people of this country," says Mr. Bright, rather naïvely, "will be much more likely to preserve peace, than any of those strange notions that peace is to be preserved by our being kept separate from them." Now, if the relations established are to be always and uniformly "cordial," cadit quæstio,—Mr. Bright need not tell us that the more cordial we become, the less we shall be likely to quarrel. That is not only a true, but an identical proposition. But supposing Mr. Bright were asked whether it must necessarily be an advantage to the cordial friendship of two neighbours to have a door opened between their houses, so as to obviate the necessity of going round by the front entrance, would he answer in the affirmative without the smallest hesitation, and without having the least regard to the character of the friendship between them, or of the misunderstandings to which they had been liable?

Has it never occurred to him that there are cases in which the promotion of too great intimacy between neighbours has resulted not in closer friendship, but in an abrupt termination of friendship? Surely, nothing is more obvious than that a certain separation, even a positive distance between friends, may be a security for the duration of the friendship, instead of an obstacle in the way of it. We are quite ready to admit to Mr. Bright that a physical separation is far from being a security for peace. The moats round the feudal castles no more kept their owners at peace with each other, than the moat round England kept England at peace with France. But almost for the same reason for which it is true that isolation does not mean peace, it is still more true that the removal of isolation does not mean peace. Isolation does not mean peace where there is the disposition to quarrel, because the disposition to quarrel is active enough to overleap small obstacles. But once grant the smallest disposition to quarrel, and then open and active communication, so far from ensuring peace, will undoubtedly facilitate strife. Mr. Bright will say that the more people there are who are friendly to France in England, and the more people there are who are friendly to England in France, the less fear of war there must be. Perhaps so, so far as these people are concerned. But then, again, the more close and delicate are the relations between any two countries, the more mischief a few evil-disposed persons can do, which the many well-disposed persons can never undo. Nothing is more misleading than to assume that the multiplication of intercourse operates only to draw people closer together. Why have we quarrelled so much more with France than with Germany? Why, simply because we have been in much closer communication with France than with Germany. Why has France quarrelled much more with Germany than we have quarrelled with Germany? Simply because France has been in much closer communication with Germany than we have been. Which of the European peoples has been at war with the United States except ourselves? And why have we alone been at war with them? Simply because the people of the Anglo-American Colonies,—subsequently the people of the United States,—and the people of England had much closer relations with each other than the people of the Continent had with them. Was there ever a war between any European people and the people of the American continent as severe and protracted as the Civil War of 1861-5 between the Northern and Southern States? Yet there was absolute Free-trade and free intercourse of every conceivable kind between these Northern and Southern States, and it was precisely in consequence of that close and free intercourse, that the deep-rooted divergence between the genius of the two peoples and of their institutions resulted in so fierce a strife. It is absolutely the reverse of true that the closeness of the relations established between two States is the measure of security against war. Judging by history, it would be much nearer the truth to speak of this closeness of relations as the measure of the danger of war. Until the point has been reached at which two peoples are really fused into one, closeness of intercourse, far from averting the danger of conflict, greatly enhances it. It is quite true, as Mr. Bright says, that there has been less quarrelling between France and England since there were constant steam-packets plying between the two countries than there was before. And that, no doubt, may have been partly due to that general increase of mutual respect between the two nations which has resulted from the multiplication of newspapers and other means of knowledge, as well as from the personal knowledge gained by direct travelling. But it has been in a very much larger degree due to that rapid development of French military power, and of English naval power, which has secured the strength of the two countries from any possibility of collision, the kind of strength peculiar to the insular power being precisely that which could best secure us against the pressure of military strength. It is needless to remark that any change which tended to do away with the separating line between the two kinds of power, would tend also to do away with the security against a collision. Anything which enabled the swordfish to fight in the jungle, or the tiger to fight in the sea, would certainly increase the prospect of battles between the swordfish and the tiger. And so anything which made England accessible by land, would increase the prospect of collisions, and still more the fear of collisions, between England and France. Yet we do not mean to imply for a moment that the multiplication of means of communication is only another name for the multiplication of the chances of quarrel. Of course, it implies also the multiplication of an indefinite number of friendly relations for every unfriendly relation which might arise. Unfortunately, however, the dangers which close intercourse involves from those who desire war, are very much greater indeed than the securities for peace which are given by the same closeness of intercourse on the part of the friends of peace. The power of an assassin to cast a shell of dynamite into London streets, is not neutralised by the power of a thousand lovers of peace to denounce and punish him. The dangers of intimacy are aggravated by the existence of one traitor in a degree indefinitely greater than that in which the safeguards are multiplied by the existence of ten thousand cordial friends.

Mr. Bright indulges in a rapture which is intelligible enough, though a little common-place, on the rapidity and safety of his railway journeys from London to Rochdale. We are by no means insensible to the wonders of the new traffic, which has, doubtless, so changed the surface of this island since the accession of William IV., that it is difficult for us to realise the England of 1820, and would be difficult for those who died before the new era to realise the England of to-day. Still, what puzzles us is this,—that Mr. Bright, with his great imagination, his strong poetical insight into the life that underlies the external world, should regard all this transformation with a sort of religious awe, as if it introduced nothing but blessedness into the world, and should apparently not be in the least sensible of the manifold moral dangers which all this rapid change, and rapid stimulus to the love of change, has brought us, along with the rich stream of material blessings. The ancient notion of a traveller was decidedly unfavourable to travelling. It used to be held in the old Greek world that commerce, so far as it involved travel, was the most dangerous and unsettling of pursuits, since it removed a man from the steady pressure of one kind of national conviction, while it did not subject him long enough to any other kind, to give him an equivalent for what he had lost. And in the ancient world, there was a great deal of truth in the prejudice. No doubt, there was less fixed creed, less steady conviction among the commercial peoples,—among the Phœnicians and the Greeks, for instance,—than among any of the races which grew up under the same steady and constant influences. Doubtless, a time came in the history of the West when all this was changed, when prejudice had crystallised men into types much too hard and rigid, and when experience of different creeds, customs, and laws, was needful in order to give the requisite charity to human feelings. But even in our own age, the effect of easy and frequent change of place is by no means one of pure good. Indeed, we are inclined to ascribe to the over-stimulus of frequent contact with new ideas, much of that breaking-away from all moral conviction which marks so considerable a class in what we may call the more mobile-minded races of the modern world,—the Slaves, the French, the Irish. The English, no doubt, with their heavily-built and slowly-moving character, probably take more good and less harm from the frequent and easy changes of modern life than any other race in the world. Yet even for the English, it is by no means true that the multiplication of the means of locomotion is pure blessing, or that we ought to look upon it, as Mr. Bright seems to look upon it, as almost sacramental,—as conveying through physical means a purely spiritual strength. It requires a very strong head to hold one's own in this moral whirligig of a world; and this strong head is not given to all Englishmen, much less to all members of the human race. That is no reason, we admit, why we should forbid the utilisation by man of all physical discoveries which he can turn clearly to his own use. But it is a reason why we are not bound to regard the convenience of commerce as the final and authoritative consideration by which to test the desirability of any change which must have great political and social, as well as great commercial consequences. It is clear enough that it would be immensely for the convenience of commerce that the various nations of the earth should all use a single language. But would any statesman in his senses propose, on that account, to begin the effort to substitute a universal language for the language spoken by any one people? It seems to us childish in Mr. Bright to assume that the decisive question in relation to the Channel Tunnel is its mechanical possibility and its commercial remunerativeness. It might be both mechanically possible and also sure of the very highest commercial success, and yet be as undesirable,—if it is to promote Stock-Exchange panics, and to put all our military advisers on the fidget for generations to come,—as it would be, for instance, to propose to the French Government to exchange Dover for Calais, in order that each of the two Governments might be identified with the safety and welfare of a bit of territory belonging to the other Government. There is no manner of absolute religious duty obliging us to extend the commerce of the world, if there be anything to set off against that extension which concerns the world at least as vitally as commercial enterprise itself. No doubt, there should be a very good reason for refusing to do what would render our intercourse with other men easier and cheaper. But we all recognise in our individual daily life that such reasons do exist, and are often very weighty ones; and there may be,—and we think there are,—just as good reasons for refusing to do what would render international intercourse somewhat easier and cheaper, as for refusing to do what would render family intercourse easier and cheaper. Over-exposure to each other's whims is by no means the best security for true friendship; and it is the friendship of nations which is the true end to keep in view, not the mere multiplication of their opportunities of intercourse.

"STUDY AND STIMULANTS."

WHAT is the real influence of stimulants and narcotics upon the brain? This is a question which has suggested itself to every man who has had much intellectual work to do, and especially to that large class of persons who earn a living by the exercise of their brains, instead of by the sweat of their brow. Theoretical discussions of it we have had in abundance, indeed in superabundance, and the effect of them has only been, for the most part, to prompt the resigned inquiry,—Who shall decide, when doctors disagree? Mr. A. Arthur Reade, however, in a book bearing the above title, has raised this question again, to apply to it a new method of solution, certainly far more entertaining than the old one, whatever its ultimate value may prove to be. He has changed the venue, as the lawyers would say, from the theoretical to the practical realm, and instead of asking what is the real influence of alcohol and tobacco upon the brain, he asks what has been the experience of those engaged in intellectual work. And in pursuance of his method, he has addressed inquiries to a large number of distinguished men of letters, including statesmen, essayists, novelists, journalists, and inventors, and their replies constitute the present volume. Mr. Reade deserves great credit for the felicitous and insinuating manner in which he must have framed his inquiries, to wheedle this irritable genus into such interesting replies, for he furnishes us with two hundred pages of reading matter possessing that element of personal interest which the most scrupulous of us enjoy, without arousing any of those qualms of conscience which haunt us during the perusal of the indiscretions of literary executors, or the familiar and sometimes libellous gossip of the Society journals. In spite of our just denunciation of the modern "interviewer," we feel more than an abstract interest in reading of Mr. Boehm's vigorous daily regimen, or in learning that Mark Twain finds three hundred cigars a month sufficient to keep his constitution upon a firm basis. Of course, the excessive use of either alcohol or tobacco is beyond the range of this discussion; "excessive" means harmful, and it is absurd to ask if that which is harmful is beneficial; we are concerned with the inquiry whether the proper use of them leads to the production of more and better work.

As we have said, one learned theoretical argument may generally be set-off against another, with the corollary that the majority of doctors smoke and take wine, so that we are not surprised, on opening Mr. Reade's book, to come upon several flat contradictions. Mr. Allibone leads off with the opinion that the chief benefit of smoking is that it keeps its devotee quiet for an hour after dinner, "which is a great thing for digestion." He may be paired with Mr. Ruskin, who bases his dislike of it mainly upon the belief that it makes a man content to be idle, when he would otherwise be at work. Again, Mr. Robert Buchanan believes that, physiologically speaking, both alcohol and tobacco are invaluable to humankind; while Mr. G. F. Watts cannot help thinking that the introduction of tobacco by civilised races has been an unmixed evil. Professor Rawlinson begins his letter by saying that it does not appear to him that the method of the present inquiry can lead to any important results; while Mr. Charles Reade, in the next letter, writes:—"Your subject is important, and your method of inquiry sound." We care comparatively little, however, what most of these gentlemen think on the subject, our interest lies in learning what they do; actions speak louder than words, and many of Mr. Reade's correspondents entirely miss the point when favouring him with their own ideas on the subject. Dr. J. A. H. Murray, for instance, begs the question when he says:—"I thought it was now generally admitted that the more work a man has to do, the less he can afford to muddle himself in any way. . . . Fiat experimentum in corpore vilior." This "generally admitted" may be ranked with "every schoolboy knows"; the object of the present investigation is to find whether alcohol and tobacco, properly used, do muddle a man. The book abounds, however, in interesting bits of autobiography.

The letters are given in alphabetical order, an arrangement which brings Mr. Matthew Arnold's characteristic letter to the front. He has always drunk wine, chiefly claret, and has never smoked. He writes:—"Real brain-work of itself, I think, upsets the worker and makes him bilious; wine will not cure this, nor will abstaining from wine prevent it. But, in general, wine used in moderation seems to add to the agreeableness of life,—for adults, at any rate; and whatever adds to the agreeableness of life adds to its resources and powers." Dr. Alexander Bain informs us that the difficulty which presses upon him is this:—"In organic influences you are not at liberty to lay down the law of concomitant variations without exception, or to affirm that what is bad in large quantities is simply less bad when the quantity is small. There may be proportions not only innocuous, but beneficial." Professor Paul Bert expresses his opinion in four propositions, of which the following is the last:—"The use of alcoholic liquors and of tobacco in feeble doses affords to many persons very great satisfaction, and is altogether harmless and inoffensive." Mr. Isaac Pitman, in a "breef skeech ov mei leif," which looks like Swedish, but is afterwards discovered to be the "parshiali reformd spelling," expresses his "ferm konvikshon that they ekserseiz a dedli influens on the human rase." Professor Blackie considers smoking "vile and odious;" Mr. Ruskin "entirely abhors" it; Mr. G. F. Watts, as we have said, thinks the introduction of it has been an "unmixed evil;" Dr. Martineau's "intense dislike of it" has restricted his travelling to a minimum, and kept him from all public places where he was "liable to encounter its sickening effects;" Mr. Cornelius Walford believes it to be "a more insidious stimulant than alcoholic beverages;" Mr. Gladstone "detests" it; and Professor Mayor computes that he must have saved some £1,500 by abstaining from it. Surely, Byron's

"Sublime tobacco! which from East to West

has not often been subjected to such a severe indictment, and if many of the readers of this volume are like that ingenuous Member of Parliament who recently declared that he should be influenced much more strongly by the example of the Princess of Wales in the matter of pigeon-shooting, than by all the arguments of the opponents of it, we may expect to hear of an immediate and great defection from the ranks of the smokers. Side by side, however, with the above sentiments, the volume contains numerous grateful testimonies to the opposite effect. Mr. Boehm finds that, after a long spell of work, a cigarette is a soother for which he has a "perfect craving;" Mr. Buchanan smokes "pretty habitually," and, as we have said, believes tobacco to be "invaluable to humankind;" Mr. Wilkie Collins writes that when he is ill, tobacco is the best friend that his irritable nerves possess; when he is well, but exhausted by work, tobacco nerves and composes him; and he maliciously adds: "when I read learned attacks on the practice of smoking, I feel indebted to the writer,—he adds largely to the relish of my cigar." Mr. Darwin found that "two little paper cigarettes of Turkish tobacco" rested him, after he had "been compelled to talk, with tired memory, more than anything else;" with Professor Dowden, tobacco "soothes away small worries," and "restores little irritating incidents to their true proportions;" Mr. R. E. Francillon finds that his consumption of tobacco and his production of work are "in almost exact proportion," and has a very strong suspicion that if he did not smoke (which he finds harmless) he would have to conquer really dangerous temptations; Mr. G. A. Henty believes "smoking, if not begun until after the age of twenty-one, to be advantageous alike to health, temper, and intellect;" Mr. James Payn smokes the whole time he is engaged in literary composition, and says: "As I have worked longer and more continuously for thirty years than any other author (save one), I cannot believe that tobacco has done me any harm." Dr. W. H. Russell has "felt comforted and sustained" in his work by both alcohol and tobacco, especially by the latter; M. Taine finds cigarettes useful between two ideas,—when he has the first, but has not arrived at the second. Finally, Mr. Clemens, "Mark Twain," contributes a long and very funny account of his experience. He began to smoke immoderately—one hundred cigars a month—when he was eight years old. Before he was twenty, he had increased his allowance to two hundred; before he was thirty, to three hundred. At various times he has abstained for several months, but has quite forgotten whether the result on each occasion was good or evil. Being under a contract to produce "Roughing It," he wrote, without smoking, six chapters in three weeks; resuming smoking, he burned the six chapters, and wrote the book in three months, "without any bother or difficulty." When he takes his annual eight months' holiday, he finds three hundred cigars a month sufficient to keep his constitution on a firm basis; when he is at work,—but he must take the responsibility of the next awful statement:—"I allow myself the fullest possible marvel of inspiration; consequently, I ordinarily smoke fifteen cigars during my five hours' labours, and if my interest reaches the enthusiastic point, I smoke more. I smoke with all my might, and allow no intervals." Our readers must determine for themselves whether he is serious, or whether he is hoaxing Mr. Reade. Thus the smokers need not despair under the indictment we gathered from the volume; the case for the defence is equally strong, and they may take refuge behind the same old antinomy:—for every Oliver, there is a Roland.

With regard to the use of wine, there are, of course, many of the correspondents who wholly condemn it. None admit that they resort to it for inspiration, and the majority find that a very moderate quantity—say, a couple of glasses of claret at dinner—is best for them. One or two confess that they take it not from belief in any benefit received from it, but simply because they like it,—because it adds to the agreeableness of life, as Mr. Arnold says. This is probably the true explanation in the vast majority of cases, from the confident "Quid non ebrietas designat?" of Horace, down to the last German student, two-thirds of whose Geschmack consist of ein starkes Bier, ein beizender Tabak.

This leads us to say a word on the literature of the subject. Here, too, the same antithesis is found. The cup and the weed have been exalted and denounced with equal eloquence and insight, except that the former had a long start in literature. What would not Horace have said about a cigar? The lovers of the weed make up for the late arrival of their favourite by finding classical prophetic references to it; for instance, to take the first that occurs to us, "Emollit mores, nec sinit esse feros." As we desire to see fair play, we will suggest to the opposite party that they will find a comfortable passage in Martial:—

Tecta juvant.*"

Of all the passages, however, in praise or in defence of tobacco, we know of none that comes up to Mr. Lowell's exquisite and characteristic lines:—

"Now the kind nymph to Bacchus born
By Morpheus' daughter, she that seems Gifted upon her natal morn
By him with fire, by her with dreams,
Nicotia, dearer to the Muse
Than all the grape's bewildering juice,
We worship, unforbid of thee;
And, as her incense floats and curls
In airy spires and wayward whirls,
Or poises on its tremulous stalk
A flower of fairest revery,
So winds and loiters, idly free,
The current of unguided talk,
Now laughter-rippled, and now caught
In smooth, dark pools of deeper thought.
Meanwhile thou mellowest every word,
A sweetly unobtrusive third;
For thou hast magic beyond wine,
To unlock natures each to each;
The unspoken thought thou canst divine;
Thou fill'st the pauses of the speech
With whispers that to dreamland reach
And frozen fancy-springs unchain
In Arctic outskirts of the brain;
Sun of all inmost confidences,
To thy rays doth the heart uncloze

Its formal calyx of pretences,
That close against rude day's offences,
And open its shy midnight rose!"

But what, in conclusion, do we learn from Mr. Reade's new method? Very little. These interesting confessions cannot possibly combine to form a rule; even if the present writer were to state that within his reach there stands a familiar yellow-and-white jar bearing the inscription "ΤΩΙ ΒΑΚΧΩΙ," which seems to him happily to combine sentiment and fact, the statement would have no value for any one else, either as a guide or as a warning. It is the old story of Sum cuique,—what is one man's meat is another man's poison. We cannot improve much on Captain Fred. Burnaby's "humble opinion," that "every man must find out for himself." On the whole, however, the perusal of this volume, with its varying estimates of wine and tobacco, has confirmed us in our opinion that—as Professor Tyndall puts it in his letter—"the man is happiest who is so organised as to be able to dispense with the use of both."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

"A LAYMAN ON ANGLICANISM."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In confirmation of your remarks in your review of "Romanism, Protestantism, Anglicanism," by "Oxonienensis," that there is no necessary connection between the Sacramental and the Sacerdotal theory of the Eucharist, I may mention that the former view is stated, and that in a very strong sacrificial form, in a recent volume of lectures on the "Worship and Offices of the Church of Scotland," addressed to the Divinity students at the four Scottish Universities by Dr. Sprott, one of the Lecturers on Pastoral Theology appointed by the General Assembly of the Kirk, assuredly one of the most definitely non-sacerdotal communions in Christendom.

To myself, the strongest argument against the Zwinglian theory is its admirable clearness, simplicity, and consistency. It possesses these qualities in so high a degree (being capable, besides, of taking a very devout form), that if it had ever been the belief of ancient Christendom, it must have left the clearest traces in patristic literature, if not in ancient liturgies. However soon corruption and superstition might have crept in, the original belief must have held its ground with sufficient tenacity to be at least still discoverable, even if it did not actively combat the intruding views on a large and public scale. But not the faintest suggestion which is so much as patient of Zwinglianism is discoverable, so far as my reading has gone—and I think I must have read almost every word in patristic treatises which bears on the matter—until the rise of the mediæval sects.

With regard to the discussion by "Oxonienensis" of the view taken by the Church of England of non-episcopal ordinations, his facts and arguments are borrowed (I think without a single exception) from a quite curiously inaccurate, unhistorical, and paralogical article in the Quarterly Review of October, 1878, entitled, "Is the Church of England Protestant?"

The fallacy in this article—or rather one of the fallacies, for it swarms with them—lies in confusing between the apparent fact that during Elizabeth's reign non-episcopalian ministers were admitted to Anglican benefices in some cases (only about four of which can be substantiated), and the legal regularity of such admissions. In point of fact, they were entirely illegal always, being barred by the Preface to the Ordinal, then, as now, statute law, and owed their impunity to the difficulty, in those wholly newspaperless and nearly roadless days, of calling powerful dignitaries and patrons to account for obscure jobs, such as presentation to a rural living. Where the case allowed of publicity, as in Whittingham's appointment to the Deanery of Durham and Travers's application in London for preferment, the evidence shows that the illegality was recognised and appealed against. I am not discussing the moral or theological merits of the question, but simply stating its legal bearing.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE DYNAMITE DANGER.

SIR,—I understand your article of March 24th, on "The Dynamite Danger," to maintain that the sudden arising of this danger is not so much due to the newly increased intensity of political passions, as to the new fact of the invention of dynamite. If you are right, this warrants a hope that the effect of this newly acquired power on the minds of the discontented classes may wear off with its novelty. As you truly remark, incendiarism has always been an easy crime to commit; yet quiet people are not in a constant panic about incendiarism, nor are discontented people, for the same reason, in a state of delirious excitement.

It may help us to face this new danger, if we will reflect on the effect that would be produced on our minds by the invention of gunpowder and the whole system of firearms and artillery, supposing—what may be easily imagined, though impossible in fact—that all these had been brought to perfection in secret, and suddenly made known. Gunpowder, in the supposed case, would seem far more alarming than dynamite does now; for though dynamite is a great advance on gunpowder in destructive power, yet gunpowder is a much greater advance on the destructive agencies known before its invention. And as to the effect of rifles and artillery in war, we should no doubt say:—"All existing military systems will be revolutionised, or rather, annihilated. Numbers will be only an embarrassment, when the destruction of life caused by an exploding shell will be in proportion to the numbers within reach of the fragments. Courage cannot be maintained, and discipline and organisation will be useless, when no man can see the hand that is to destroy him. War will be a mere game of chance, nothing can be foreseen; and if any moral quality will go for anything in deciding battles, it will not be sober, disciplined, deliberate courage, but mere reckless, dare-devil audacity. The world will belong to the greatest ruffians. The only hope for the future of mankind consists in this,—that war will be too uncertain to be ventured on by Governments, and too terrible to be faced by soldiers." All this would have been plausible, yet how untrue! Notwithstanding all changes of weapons, victory has always belonged, and probably will always belong, to numbers, courage, discipline, and organisation.—I am, Sir, &c., M.

LORD ABERDEEN ON THE AFFIRMATION BILL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your notice of the Earl of Aberdeen's article on the Affirmation Bill in the Fortnightly leaves the impression, which I am sure you could not have intended, that Lord Aberdeen is not quite decided upon this important question. No one has expressed himself more firmly than he has done that the passing of this Bill is a simple act of justice, and his recommendation that those should leave the House in whose minds Mr. Bradlaugh is uppermost in connection with this question, was simply intended to meet the difficulty of Members who supposed that the direct object of the Bill was to admit an Atheist. Now, however, when the Government have declared the Bill not to be retrospective, all difficulty is removed, and its opponents can no longer call it a Bradlaugh Relief Bill. I have read the article carefully, and certainly regard it as a strong plea for the Affirmation Bill.—I am, Sir, &c.,

CHRISTIAN D. GINSBURG.

[We had no intention of leaving the impression referred to, and were quite aware that Lord Aberdeen was counselling weaker brethren.—ED. Spectator.]

"OUR BETTERS."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—If not too late, the following might be useful, in the way of indicating a common, perhaps the common, interpretation of our "betters." Some years ago, a young Wesleyan minister told me that, as a boy, with the other village children, duly marshalled, he had stood on the village green on the Sunday morning, and, as the Squire and his friends drove up to the parish church, had sung:—

"God bless the Squire,
And all his rich relations;
And teach us poor people
To keep our proper stations."

The words italicised give, I apprehend, a tolerably accurate idea of what "betters" has been taught to mean, to the great mass of the English people.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE WORSHIP OF RANK.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your very interesting article on Lord Dunraven's paper does not seem to reach the root of the English love of aristocracy,—i.e., of a national system of hereditary rank and power. It is not (I take it) that the average Englishman has any great pleasure in feeling that he has "betters," but he likes other people to feel it. If each of his associates can say,—"I am as good as you," it is a comfort to him that they cannot say, "I am as good as anybody." He thinks that society, as a whole, is more wholesome, pleasant, stable, and in the truest sense free, as well as more noble and beautiful, for being built rank above rank, than if strewn loose on the dead-level. This conviction of the value to the national life as a symmetrical whole of great inequalities in social rank and political power, be it right or wrong, has nothing of "flunkeyism" in it, and deserves the thoughtful regard of all reformers.—I am, Sir, &c., DIOBUS.

[We do not accuse Englishmen of flunkeyism, but of liking ornament in social arrangements. We fear a good many of them feel that paying undue deference justifies them in claiming it in their turn.—ED. Spectator.]

MR. JACOB BRIGHT AND THE CONGO DEBATE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your article of Saturday last on "The Sovereignty of the Congo," criticising my speech, you say, "Mr. Jacob Bright, certainly no Chauvinist, denounces Portugal with injudicious violence as 'that rotten Power.'" May I state that I should certainly not have ventured to employ such words on my own authority. I quoted them from Monteiro, a well-known and trustworthy Portuguese author, who used the expression in characterising Portuguese government in Africa. I subjoin the passage which I read to the House:—"Were the natives otherwise than inoffensive and incapable of enmity, they would long ago have swept away the rotten power of the Portuguese in that large extent of territory."—"Angola and the Congo," Vol. II., p. 42.—I am, Sir, &c.,

IRISH EMIGRANTS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In last week's Spectator, third page, it is stated that the late embarkation of emigrants in Blacksod Bay, County Mayo, was a "thoroughly cheerful occasion." I hope you will allow me to correct this statement in your next issue. The account which I saw of the affair (in or from a daily paper) was that, as each boatload of emigrants left the shore for the steamer, a wail of lamentation arose. I think that any one who has been present at the departure of Irish emigrants from their homes, will agree with me that loud and sorrowful lamentations usually accompany such departures from friends and country, not likely to be seen again.—I am, Sir, &c.,

EDUCATION, AND DRINKING HABITS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I am afraid you are mistaken, though I should be glad to think you are not, in ascribing the diminished consumption of alcoholic beverages in the United Kingdom to compulsory education. Switzerland, one of the best educated countries in Europe, is very nearly, if not quite, the most drunken; and Geneva, beyond all comparison the best educated Canton of the Confederation, is the worst of all. The State spends on the education of a population of 100,000, £50,000 a year (equal to an expenditure for the United Kingdom of fifteen millions), and the people spend on drink a sum equal to £10 per head of population per annum! I should rather be disposed to attribute the lessening addiction to drink in England to the effects of teetotal societies, and the growing conviction among all classes that alcohol in any shape is rarely beneficial, and often hurtful, to health, an idea which, as yet, has not so much as dawned on the Continental mind. Here and in France mothers give their babies wine, and most people regard it as one of the prime necessities of life.—I am, Sir, &c.,

RATIONAL DRESS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—We have heard a good deal lately about "rational dress," and we are promised one, if not two, exhibitions of it this year; but as everybody does not go to exhibitions, and as, moreover, an exhibition is rather calculated to convey to ignorant minds the idea of something not intended for every-day use, I am anxious to suggest a method of propagating the new doctrines which, if the ladies who preach them are really in earnest, will no doubt be very easily carried out. It is this:—Let every woman who, either in print or on any platform, has ever urged upon any other women the foolishness, or unhealthiness, or immorality of the present style of dress, assume at once a costume strictly in conformity with "rational" rules, and let her wear it for the next two months, in every public place or private assembly. Supposing fifty ladies, or even less, to do this, most people in London would have an opportunity of seeing what "rational dress" really is, and of judging, the women for themselves, the men for their wives and daughters, whether it ought to be adopted. But there must be no half-measures, no compromising with vicious fashions. We are told that all shoes should have flat soles and broad toes, that all waists should be as guiltless of restraint as that of the Medicean Venus, that sleeves should be roomy, skirts straight, and bonnets fit to protect the head effectually from sun and wind, and a great many other things which I, for one, should like to see exemplified, not only on the persons of young and pretty girls who look well in anything, but on the more mature ladies who have hitherto done the talking and writing, and who are, naturally, the persons to show the world the excellence of the new way. Perhaps, if you are good enough to print this letter, my suggestion may reach the proper quarter, and who knows but we may presently begin to meet rationally dressed ladies at every turn?—I am, Sir, &c., A.

MR. RUSSELL ON VIVISECTION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I was much obliged to you for publishing my letter on vivisection last Saturday. Had I longer deferred writing to you, I should have been too late for last week's Spectator, and by next Saturday the matter would have been rather out of date. As, however, I called attention to the fact that the Times had failed to publish my letter of the 5th inst., it is only fair that I should, with equal publicity, record the fact that they have published it to-day. Better late, than never.—I am, Sir, &c.,

MR. NICHOL AND THE POEM OF "BRAHMA," BY EMERSON.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—You did well to correct Mr. Nichol's misquotation, in his "History of American Literature," of the above poem; but there is still another blunder in it, the correction of which will, perhaps, enable him and others to understand this poem better, and which I will explain thus.

When Emerson was last in England, in 1873, he spent his last evening with me before sailing for Boston. When in my library, he asked me if I had an English edition of his "May Poems," as, he said, he had been asked whatever the one on "Brahma" could mean. To which he had replied, call it "Jehovah," and perhaps you will understand it better. But another friend had said to him that it seemed only nonsense! I found the poem for him, and on looking it over, he exclaimed, "Well might they call it nonsense! Not only is the word 'not' omitted in the third line [as you pointed out], but in the seventh line they have printed vanquished, instead of vanished, which, of course, spoils the whole meaning of the poem." I have always admired this poem, as clearly giving the Brahmin belief that each soul is part of the Divinity, and hope this correction will help to make it more clear.—I am, Sir, &c.,

BOOKS.

MRS. CARLYLE'S LETTERS.*

With a little suppression of the innumerable repetitions concerning bad nights, digestion, insect annoyances, and other household matters, of which no one can expect the public to enjoy more than is needful to show the domestic character and capacity of the writer, these three volumes might be compressed into two of the most fascinating in the English language; but this compression they certainly require. Mrs. Carlyle evidently wrote without a thought of her letters ever serving any purpose but that of telling her correspondents what she was thinking, feeling, suffering, or enjoying at the time, and letters so written by a woman continually employed in the same class of tasks, and suffering from the same class of causes, could not but contain a vast amount of needless and even profuse repetition. Mr. Froude might, we think, have added greatly to the charm of this book, without in any way detracting from its frankness, if he had abbreviated almost all those letters in which the various housecleanings and the various headaches are minutely described, leaving one or two of each type to stand in full, but cutting down the rest. As it is, the reader at times forgets that Mrs. Carlyle is not responsible for all these egotisms, and imputes to her the sin of repetitions which are really the fault of the editor. Were all such redundancies of household and medical detail eliminated, there would remain in these volumes ample stores of vivacity, and brightness, and satire, and pathos, and patience, and impatience, and humour and wit; stores ample enough to constitute a lasting memorial to Mrs. Carlyle's memory, and nothing to incline any one to skip. As it is, the horrors of London four-posters and the details of sleepless nights are sometimes multiplied till the admirable vividness, sharpness, tenderness, and originality of the letters are a little hidden from view.

Mrs. Carlyle did not invent quite such remarkable phrases in describing the people whom she best knew, as her husband. But in bringing their figures before our minds, she was hardly, if at all, his inferior. Take, for instance, this description of Mr. Carlyle's lady admirers, with the sly hit in conclusion at himself:—

"Let no woman who values peace of soul ever dream of marrying an author! That is to say, if he is an honest one, who makes a conscience of doing the thing he pretends to do. But this I observe to you in confidence; should I state such a sentiment openly, I might happen to get myself torn in pieces by the host of my husband's lady admirers, who already, I suspect, think me too happy in not knowing my happiness. You cannot fancy what way he is making with the fair intellects here! There is Harriet Martineau presents him with her ear-trumpet with a pretty, blushing air of coquetry, which would almost convince me out of belief in her identity! And Mrs. Pierce Butler bolts in upon his studies, out of the atmosphere, as it were, in riding-habit, cap and whip (but no shadow of a horse, only a carriage, the whip, I suppose, being to whip the cushions with, for the purpose of keeping her hand in practice)—my inexperienced Scotch domestic remaining entirely in a nonplus whether she had let in 'a leddy or a gentleman!' And then there is a young American beauty—such a beauty! 'snow and rose-bloom' throughout, not as to clothes merely, but complexion also; large and soft, and without one idea, you would say, to rub upon another! And this charming creature publicly declares herself his 'ardent admirer,' and I heard her with my own ears call out quite passionately at parting with him, 'Oh, Mr. Carlyle, I want to see you to talk a long, long time about—"Sartor!"' 'Sartor,' of all things in this world! What could such a young lady have got to say about 'Sartor,' can you imagine? And Mrs. Marsh, the moving authoress of the 'Old Man's Tales,' reads 'Sartor' when she is ill in bed; from which one thing at least may be clearly inferred, that her illness is not of the head. In short, my dear friend, the singular author of 'Sartor' appears to me at this moment to be in a perilous position, inasmuch as (with the innocence of a sucking dove to outward appearance) he is leading honourable women, not a few, entirely off their feet. And who can say that he will keep his own? After all, in sober earnest, is it not curious that my husband's writings should be only completely understood and adequately appreciated by women and mad people? I do not know very well what to infer from the fact."

Too much has certainly been made of Mrs. Carlyle's sufferings through her husband's indifference to her. That she suffered greatly at intervals for perhaps ten or twelve years, partly through Lady Ashburton's influence over her husband, partly from Carlyle's selfish absorption in the monster work of his life, the Life of Frederick the Great, is undeniable; but it is clear enough that even during parts of this time she was at heart not only devoted to her husband, but conscious that nothing pleased him better than to hear how truly she was wrapped up in him. Take, for example, these two tender letters, both written during the middle and least happy period of their lives. The first was written in July, 1844, after she had just left home on a visit:—

"Indeed, dear, you look to be almost unhappy enough already! I do not want you to suffer physically, only morally, you understand, and to hear of your having to take coffee at night and all that gives me no wicked satisfaction, but makes me quite unhappy. It is curious how much more uncomfortable I feel without you, when it is I who am going away from you, and not, as it used to be, you gone away from me. I am always wondering since I came here how I can, even in my angriest mood, talk about leaving you for good and all; for to be sure, if I were to leave you to-day on that principle, I should need absolutely to go back to-morrow to see how you were taking it."

And the following was written in July, 1846, when Carlyle had apparently forgotten to write to her on her birthday, the truth being that the letter was waiting for her, but that the post-mistress had made some mistake:—

"Seaforth, Tuesday, July 14, 1846.

"Oh! my dear husband, fortune has played me such a cruel trick this day! and I do not even feel any resentment against fortune, for the suffocating misery of the last two hours. I know always, when I seem to you most exacting, that whatever happens to me is nothing like so bad as I deserve. But you shall hear how it was. Not a line from you on my birthday, the post-mistress averred! I did not burst out crying, did not faint—did not do anything absurd, so far as I know; but I walked back again without speaking a word; and with such a tumult of wretchedness in my heart as you, who know me, can conceive. And then I shut myself in my own room to fancy everything that was most tormenting. Were you, finally, so out of patience with me that you had resolved to write to me no more at all? Had you gone to Addiscombe, and found no leisure there to remember my existence? Were you taken ill, so ill that you could not write? That last idea made me mad to get off to the railway, and back to London. Oh, mercy! what a two hours I had of it! And just when I was at my wits' end, I heard Julia crying out through the house: 'Mrs. Carlyle, Mrs. Carlyle! Are you there? Here is a letter for you.' And so there was after all! The post-mistress had overlooked it, and had given it to Robert, when he went afterwards, not knowing that we had been. I wonder what love-letter was ever received with such thankfulness! Oh, my dear! I am not fit for living in the world with this organisation. I am as much broken to pieces by that little accident as if I had come through an attack of cholera or typhus fever. I cannot even steady my hand to write decently. But I felt an irresistible need of thanking you, by return of post. Yes, I have kissed the dear little card-case; and now I will lie down awhile, and try and get some sleep. At least, to quiet myself, I will try to believe—oh, why cannot I believe it, once for all—that with all my faults and follies, I am 'dearer to you than any earthly creature.' I will be better for Geraldine here; she is become very quiet and nice; and as affectionate for me as ever.—Your own J. C."

These letters will give an adequate idea of the tenderness and passion of which Mrs. Carlyle was capable, and which, had Carlyle been other than he was, she would, no doubt, have lavished freely on her husband. But we do not in the least mean to convey that all the shortcoming was on his side. Many of her letters,—and still more her diaries,—show the hardness, pride, and tauntingness with which she met what she regarded as his neglect, and of course, this did not tend to restore the confidence between them. As somebody said, there was too much of the diamond on the surface of each of them to make life together quite easy, and though in her the tenderness was deep beneath, it was by no means always get-at-able, for she loved to play the man when she found her husband not recognising the woman in her. That Carlyle himself was hard, the ease with which he threw off even intimate friends like John Stuart Mill seems to show. Speaking of the appearance of his own screamy and foolish little pamphlet, "Occasional Thoughts on the Nigger Question," Carlyle says, quite coolly, that it produced "execrative shrieks from several people, J. S. Mill for one, who, indeed, had personally quite parted from me a year or two before, I know not why, nor indeed very much inquired, since it was his silly pleasure, poor Mill!" Mrs. Carlyle evidently felt the estrangement much more deeply. When she got a cold note from Mr. J. S. Mill in reply to a cordial message from herself, she speaks of having had something like a trembling fit, from the pain it gave her. But when Mrs. Carlyle met with hardness from one she loved, though it wounded her deeply, she always strove to affect a hardness she did not feel, and which she would have done much better not to put on. She admits that on the few occasions when she gave way to a natural burst of feeling, Carlyle was not in any way indifferent to her distress. Mrs. Carlyle calls the long ten years or so while Frederick the Great was being written,—“the valley of the shadow of Frederick the Great,” and truly it was to her much worse than the valley of the shadow of death, especially as during a part of it, Lady Ashburton contrived to cast on her lot a shadow at least as chilling as the departed Frederick himself. But even in this period, though her letters get a bitterer tone, there is no falling off in their brilliancy. Nothing can be more amusing, for instance, than her account of Count d'Orsay, and her contrast between him and Lord Jeffery:—

"To-day, oddly enough, while I was engaged in re-reading Carlyle's Philosophy of Clothes, Count d'Orsay walked in. I had not seen him for four or five years. Last time he was as gay in his colours as a humming-bird—blue satin cravat, blue velvet waistcoat, cream-coloured coat, lined with velvet of the same hue, trousers also of a bright colour, I forget what; white French gloves, two glorious breast-pins attached by a chain, and length enough of gold watch-guard to have hanged himself in. To-day, in compliment to his five more years, he was all in black and brown—a black satin cravat, a brown velvet waistcoat, a brown coat, some shades darker than the waistcoat, lined with velvet of its own shade, and almost black trousers, one breast-pin, a large pear-shaped pearl set into a little cup of diamonds, and only one fold of gold chain round his neck, tucked together right on the centre of his spacious breast with one magnificent turquoise. Well! that man understood his trade; if it be but that of dandy, nobody can deny that he is a perfect master of it, that he dresses himself with consummate skill! A bungler would have made no allowance for five more years at his time of life; but he had the fine sense to perceive how much better his dress of to-day sets off his slightly-enlarged figure and slightly-worn complexion, than the humming-bird colours of five years back would have done. Poor D'Orsay! he was born to have been something better than even the king of dandies. He did not say nearly so many clever things this time as on the last occasion. His wit, I suppose, is of the sort that belongs more to animal spirits than to real genius, and his animal spirits seem to have fallen many degrees. The only thing that fell from him to-day worth remembering was his account of a mask he had seen of Charles Fox, 'all punched and flattened as if he had slept in a book.' Lord Jeffery came, unexpected, while the Count was here. What a difference! the prince of critics and the prince of dandies. How washed out the beautiful dandiacal face looked beside that little clever old man's! The large blue dandiacal eyes, you would have said, had never contemplated anything more interesting than the reflection of the handsome personage they pertained to in a looking-glass; while the dark penetrating ones of the other had been taking note of most things in God's universe, even seeing a good way into millstones."

Again, take the witty account of the way in which each of the two doctors who attended Mrs. Carlyle ignored the particular ailment for which she had consulted the other one. "Mr. Barnes," she says, "regards my leg as his patient and my arm as Dr. Quain's patient, which he has nothing to do with; and he is rather glad to be irresponsible for it, seeing nothing to be done." Nor could anything be more powerful, in its way, than this reproach against her husband, sent to her intimate friend, Mrs. Russell:—

"5 Cheyne Row: December 15, 1862.

"I should not be at all afraid that after a few weeks my new maid would do well enough if it weren't for Mr. C.'s frightful impatience with any new servant untrained to his ways, which would drive a woman out of the house with her hair on end if allowed to act directly upon her! So that I have to stand between them, and imitate in a small, humble way the Roman soldier who gathered his arms full of the enemy's spears, and received them all into his own breast." It is this which makes a change of servants, even when for the better, a terror to me in prospect, and an agony in realisation—for a time."

* Note by Mr. Carlyle.—"Oh heavens, the comparison! it was too true."

But if Mrs. Carlyle had been a little more reticent with her friends and a little less reticent with her husband, he would, doubtless, have made her a better husband, and she would certainly have made him a better wife.

Nothing strikes us as more remarkable than the complete way in which a woman of so much genius as Mrs. Carlyle,—a woman whose observation and style are her own, and never become in any way Carlylese,—assimilated, without ever questioning them apparently, all Carlyle's crude ideas; his notion that the only true religion consists in imaginative wonder and impatience of shams,—his scorn for science whenever it touches the borderland of religion,—his cruel contempt for the sufferings of the less dignified races of men like the negroes, or what he was pleased to think the scum of our British population,—his belief that men were "mostly fools," and his strange notion that men could discern by a sort of second-sight who were the rulers to whom they ought to submit themselves. These crude ideas never filled either Mrs. Carlyle's mind or her heart. That she was miserable in part for want of a better faith is clear throughout these letters, and yet she assumes all through that Carlyle is possessed of the only truth in the world: that is of any real significance, and that all men who are worth anything should come over to his creed. For example, she tells frankly a Liverpool Unitarian minister of eminence that he ought at once to abandon his half-and-half position, and come over to Carlyle's. And yet this book is curiously full of evidence that neither Carlyle nor his wife had any creed which subdued their hearts and minds, or gave them guidance and peace in time of trouble. It contains the letters of a brilliant woman without any inward source of rest at all, or anything that she herself mistook for it. Nevertheless she is apparently as proud of her intellectual position and of her spiritual vacuum as if the one had given her a complete key to human weaknesses, and the other a constant spring of human strength.

MR. BENN'S GREEK PHILOSOPHERS.*

MR. BENN's work on the Greek philosophers is a remarkable production. It is subtle, learned, and eloquent. He brings to the illustration of his proper subject information gathered from the most varied sources, and has been able, in quite a felicitous way, to show the frequent parallelism between Greek and modern thought. Neither the vast learning, nor the systematising power, nor the fascinating style in which it is written, nor all of these taken together is sufficient to enable us to account for the book, nor for the particular conclusions set forth in it. It is one of those books into which a personal element largely enters, and unexpressed considerations form a large part of the logical process which justifies the results won by Mr. Benn. It is all the more necessary to point this out, because Mr. Benn is one of those who seem to think that truth can only be reached when we eliminate the personal element altogether. This book of his, is, on the contrary, one of the best illustrations we have seen of the large part which unconscious preconceptions play in conscious logical processes. He has come to the study of Greek philosophy, and to the study of philosophy in general, with quite a number of presuppositions, some of which are present in clear consciousness to his mind, and some of which lie more or less completely in the background. One of these conscious presuppositions is what he calls "the modern conception of the universe as an absolute whole, whose parts are not caused, but constituted by their fundamental unity, and are not really separated from each other in nature, but only ideally distinguished in our thoughts." (Vol. II., pp. 346-7.) Alongside of this we may put another conception, the consistency of which with the foregoing we do not quite see. Yet it is a conception which finds frequent expression in these volumes, chiefly, however, when Mr. Benn puts on the mantle of prophecy. The time will come "when the truths of science are seen by all, as they are now seen by a few, to involve the admission that there is no object for our devotion but the welfare of sentient beings like ourselves; that there are no changes in Nature for which natural forces will not account; and that the unity of all existence has, for us, no individualisation beyond the finite and perishable consciousness of man." (Vol. II., p. 265.) Another preconception in the mind of Mr. Benn is a hatred of superstition. By superstition, he means almost all that other people mean when they speak of natural and revealed religion. Frequent allusions occur to "organised superstition." So far has this gone with Mr. Benn, that hatred of superstition often rises to the altitude of religious faith. His language attains to a warmer glow and becomes urgent and passionate, in its denunciation of the evil wrought by a faith in the supernatural, in any form whatsoever. A curious illustration occurs in a paragraph in the third section of the chapter on the religious revival. Mr. Benn is speaking of the military organisation of the Roman Empire, and of some of the results of it:—"On the other hand, when it came to be a question of supernatural agency, a man of this type would astonish the Jews themselves by his credulity. Imbued with the idea of personal authority, he readily fancied that any one standing high in the favour of God could cure diseases from a distance, by simply giving them the word of command to depart." (Vol. II., p. 207.) This is one of the few allusions to the New Testament to be found in these two volumes, and we quote it because of the illustration it affords of the extreme arbitrariness of Mr. Benn's method of criticism. It shows how a mind imbued with preconceptions will pass through a mass of evidence, and like a magnet, will attract only what has affinity with itself. It was open to Mr. Benn to take the story of the centurion as a whole, it was equally open to him to omit all reference to it. But it was not open to him, without critical inquiry, simply in this arbitrary way to take as much as suited his purpose, and to cast the remainder overboard as superstition. The story of the centurion hangs together. Instead of manifesting credulity, he showed a reasonable faith. He argued from what he knew just as cogently as Mr. Benn does; even more so. Personal authority was a fact. A word from the Emperor was enough, as the centurion well knew, to set troops in motion from Palestine to Britain. He himself was a man under authority, and others obeyed him as he obeyed his superiors.

Was there anything irrational in supposing that similar authority and obedience might obtain in other spheres? If the story in the Gospels be true, and if Jesus Christ is what he claims to be, then it is not the centurion who exhibits credulity; it is Mr. Benn. If the story is true, the centurion was right, and Mr. Benn is wrong in his opinion. It is time that it should be understood that superstition may be negative as well as positive. And people may err as much in refusing to faith its proper sphere, as in yielding to extra-belief.

The truth is that Mr. Benn is an enthusiast, and his enthusiasm is twofold. It is positive when he is looking at the scientific intelligence, its methods, and its triumphs. For him science is the beneficent healing power, whose office it is to redeem humanity from all evils. On the other hand, he is a negative enthusiast, who hates as passionately as he loves. He can see no good in supernaturalism. It is simply an obstruction to science, and must at all hazards be removed out of the way. It is this enthusiasm which evidently has set Mr. Benn to the enormous toil of writing this book, and of the vast preparatory study which has issued in this result. It is as good a way of attack on Supernaturalism as any which can be found now-a-days. To write a history of Greek philosophy, and to show how supernaturalism coincided with reaction, and how progress, in all the breadth of its meaning, coincided with the triumph of what Mr. Benn calls the scientific spirit, was a happy thought. It would bring the forces of history to bear on the formidable defence which supernaturalism is still able to offer. What had resisted the direct attack, and indeed had attacked in turn and not without success the exclusive scientific prejudices of our own time, might not be able to resist a flank attack by the circuitous route of the philosophers of Greece. No doubt Mr. Benn has a certain interest in Greek philosophy, for its own sake; but to us it appears that it has a deeper interest for him, in so far as it enables him to overthrow the citadel of superstition. He has brought to the study of Greek philosophy the intensity of his own convictions, and his eyes see just what they have the power to see, and no more. From the tone of the book, the author seems to imagine that he has got free from preconception, and is as far as possible from reading into history what his own mind brought with it; and yet, if Cardinal Newman were seeking a new illustration of the leading principle set forth in the Grammar of Assent, he could find none more appropriate than The Greek Philosophers, by A. W. Benn. The reasoning of this volume has a personal and individual character.

Sometimes, indeed, these preconceptions fall into the background, and Mr. Benn allows himself to stand face to face with the objects of his study. Then we have true, earnest work, and results of abiding value. The studies of the pre-Socratic schools, and of Socrates, of Plato, and Aristotle, are worthy of all praise, when they are confined to these philosophers, and their place in the history of human thought. The exposition is always good, but it is not allowed to proceed undisturbed for any length of time. Mr. Benn has to point a moral and adorn a tale, and takes occasion to show how superstition comes in, in a quiet, disguised way, or destructively like a flood. Now and then we come across an enjoyable allusion to modern times and thought; a fair specimen is the following, which occurs in his description of the Sophists:—"Wherever the rhetorician comes into competition with the professional, he will beat him on his own ground, and will be preferred to him for every public office. The type is by no means extinct, and flourishes like a green bay-tree among ourselves. Like Pendennis, a writer of this kind will review any book from the height of superior knowledge acquired by two hours' reading in the British Museum; or, if he is adroit enough, will dispense with even that slender amount of preparation. He need not even trouble himself to read the book which he criticises. A superficial acquaintance with magazine articles will qualify him to pass judgment on all life, all religion, and all philosophy. But it is in politics that the finest career lies before him. He rises to power by attacking the measures of real statesmen, and remains there by adopting them. He becomes Chancellor of the Exchequer by gross economical blundering, and Prime Minister by a happy mixture of epigram and adulation." (Vol. I., p. 97.) These allusions add much to the enjoyment of the reader, but not very much to his knowledge or information. Frequently, indeed, they break the continuity of argument and exposition, although we have no doubt that they appear to the author the most valuable feature of the book. In the midst of the exposition of Plato's system, when we have reached what many regard as the highest point of his thought,

* The Greek Philosophers. By Alfred William Benn. 2 vols. London: C. Kegan Paul and Co.

Mr. Benn stops short to apologise for Plato, and to point out how even out of this evil good did eventually flow. The Theism which Plato reached is regarded by critics "who, like Lange, are most imbued with the scientific spirit as a retrograde movement. We may to a certain extent agree with them, without admitting that philosophy as a whole was injured by departing from the principles of Democritus. An intellectual, like an animal organism, may sometimes have to choose between retrograde metamorphosis and total extinction. The course of events drove speculation to Athens, where it could only exist on the condition of assuming a theological form. Moreover, action and reaction are equal and contrary. Mythology gained as much as philosophy lost. It was purified from immoral ingredients, and raised to the highest level which supernaturalism is capable of attaining. If the Republic was the forerunner of the Catholic Church, the Timæus was the forerunner of the Catholic faith." (Vol. I., p. 267.) The statement in the last sentence is either a truism or an untruth, according to the meaning we are to attach to the word "forerunner." If this means only that the Timæus came first in time, then, of course, this is true. If it means that the Timæus determined either the form or the contents of the Catholic faith, nothing can be more untrue. That this is, however, Mr. Benn's meaning is obvious from many paragraphs in his work. He speaks in the preface of Hellenic culture having to repair "the ravages of the Barbarians, and, chiefly under the form of Christianity, to make itself accepted by the new nationalities which had arisen on the ruins of the Roman Empire." The Christian interpretation of life is a "great supernaturalist reaction," which had its time and passed away; and when it passed away, "Nature could once more be studied on scientific principles."

To suppose that Christianity owed its strength and success to Hellenic culture is so contrary to historic evidence, that he who makes the supposition and gravely proceeds to build on it, by the very fact shows himself disqualified for the task of reading history aright, and appreciating what are its moving forces. The motive force of Christianity did not come from Greece. It came from Palestine. Its power did not spring from Plato. It sprang from Christ. Christianity confronted the thought of Greece with a greater thought by far, and brought satisfaction to the needs which the culture of Greece could awaken but could not satisfy. Christianity could use all that Greece had won, just because it came to Greek thought and life from a higher stand-point, and had in it the energies of a larger life. Just as Christianity met the wants created by the thought and culture of the Greeks, so also it met those new wants of humanity which had been awakened for the first time in history by the wide dominion, the equal justice, and the common citizenship of the Roman Empire. Christianity brought to the Roman Empire a wider citizenship, a vaster dominion, a more large-hearted brotherhood, a more equal justice, just because it brought them an organisation in which differences of nationality, speech, history, race, and sex, were made to blend in the higher unity of the body of Christ. This new organisation has its origin, form, and motive in Christ. He was in the thought of Christianity, the beginning and the end of it. And to every Christian, union with Christ was both the source and the end of eternal life. These are common-places which every student of history ought to know, and yet they are utterly ignored by Mr. Benn, who can see nothing, as far as we can gather from these volumes, in Christianity which cannot be found in the culture of Greece. We have read these volumes from end to end, some chapters we have read more than once, and we have sought to discover whether Mr. Benn was prepared to allow any factors to have influence in the history of Europe save those which are derived from Greece or Rome. We have found that he can appreciate the forces derived from Judaism before Christianity began to be, that he can also see that some influence was derived from the union of Greek thought with the thought of Arabia. But when we sought to discover whether Christianity had any direct power, any moulding influence on the thought and life of men, we have not found that Mr. Benn was prepared to allow that it had. It seems to us that Mr. Benn regards both the "supernaturalist reaction" and the influence which overcame it as having been derived from the thought and culture of Greece, a position which every student of history knows to be utterly untenable.

We have already exceeded the limits which we can afford to this book, or we should have liked to look closely at the issues raised by Mr. Benn, in the chapter on "Religious Revival." We do not think that he has made good his case, or shown that the accepted conclusions regarding the civilization of the Roman Empire have to be rejected as inadequate or untenable. But if he has made good his case, and if the picture he has drawn be true, then the worse for his general position. For if the religions which Christianity overcame were not effete, worn-out, and condemned, but strong, vigorous, and adequate for the expression of the religious life, then the testimony to the vigour, truth, and adequacy of the Christian religion becomes all the stronger, unless, indeed, Mr. Benn takes refuge in the shelter for the distressed which men of his way of thinking have built for themselves, and say that the more vigorous a religion which recognises the supernatural is, the more dangerous and the more untrue it is.

HERR EBERS'S LAST NOVEL.*

THE realism which is the key-note, and also in some measure the bane of our modern spirit, in its artistic expression, has in Germany, in the domain of fiction, not yet developed into naturalism. For the German, the craze for actuality is satisfied by historical accuracy; always fond of instructing himself, and being instructed, he asks from his work of art that it should teach him something. Professor Ebers has very happily apprehended this demand on the part of his countrymen, and to this apprehension he owes the great success that has unquestionably attended his work. If excellence of workmanship be commensurate with popularity, then, beyond doubt, Ebers is the greatest of living German novelists; for his works, and his alone, command a large public, and are read and bought in a country which, notwithstanding its reputation for learning, reads few and buys fewer books. For ourselves, we have never had a great regard for Ebers' semi-sentimental, cumbrous treatment of historical subjects; but, at the same time, we cannot deny to him a certain graphic power, which, combined with his really accurate knowledge of ancient matters, enables him to cause the past to live again before our eyes,—a past, however, always skillfully draped with a certain nineteenth-century decency and refinement. His Egyptian Princess was an eminently readable book. But of late, Ebers has steadily declined, and has written too hastily. It has become the fashion of late that no German Christmas gift-table is complete, if there be not upon it a new volume from the pen of this favourite author, who ever writes with such decorum, who never permits himself to forget that it has been said that novels are written "pour les jeunes gens et les femmes;" and Ebers has been only too true to this demand. His latest Christmas gift, while in some respects superior to the Burgomaster's Daughter, suffers yet more from hasty and careless workmanship. In point of style, this is one of the least admirable of his productions; it would seem at times as if the Professor had forgotten how to handle his mother-tongue, such strange pranks does he play with her adjectives and verbs,—her involved sentences grow yet more so in his hands. He cannot surely have read his own proofs, or it could not have escaped so excellent a scholar that he occasionally perpetrates nonsense. If, therefore, his English translator has now and then fallen into the same trap, she can scarcely be blamed, for in one or two cases her error is merely too strict fidelity to her original. Her work also suffers a little from hastiness, but as a whole, Miss Bell has, as before, acquitted herself bravely in her task, though her alternate redundancy and economy of punctuation certainly do not enhance the enjoyment of reading.

Only a Word misses excellence. The book falls sharply into two parts, that do not cohere. It would almost appear that the author, while writing, had entirely changed his design. Like most German novels, the composition is faulty and ill-proportioned; and while the beginning is detailed, related with warmth and poetry, the later portion is hurried, and becomes at last a mere dry chronicle of historical actions. No doubt, Professor Ebers modelled his new tale upon the mediæval German novel of adventure, which, in some respects, it resembles; but in adapting it in usum Delphini, he has made it, in great part, a tedious, twice-told tale. And a twice-told tale it is indeed, for in its pages we have quite a microcosm of contemporary mediæval history,—the Spanish persecutions in Flanders, the battle of Lepanto, Andrea Doria and the Genoese victories in the East, the Court of Philip of Spain, Venice in the times of Titian, and what not else, all grouped, or rather dragged, with more or less success round the protagonist, the Swabian boy, whose pursuit of a word has led him thus far afield. This word is the keynote of the tale, and as a fundamental idea is so charming that we regret the more that it is not more skilfully worked out. The young Black Forester, Ulrich, the son of the sturdy, worthy smith, Adam, lives with his father among the outcasts of the Riehtberg, where lives also a learned Spanish Jew, whose daughter is the play and lesson-mate of the boy. Costa is an outcast for his faith's sake, Adam a self-constituted pariah, for he is unable to bear the shame brought upon him by his light-natured, frivolous wife, who left him years ago to follow the wandering instincts of her nature and the silken clothes of a gay, young cavalier. Ulrich and little Ruth are imaginative children. They have seen the grave Hebrew brood over his books, and in answer to their inquiry as to what he sought therein, they have extracted the reply, "A word!" A word,—their childish fancy transforms this into a conjuror's tale, they seek the word that shall change them into fairy princess and prince, they plan a thousand splendid things that the word shall perform for them and theirs, and among these is ever foremost the secret desire of Ulrich that his "mammy" may return, the sweet-voiced, fair-visaged woman whom he remembers in his dreams, for whom he cherishes a tender memory, that remains alive for all his father's prohibitions against his lost wife's name being mentioned in his presence. The blood of his mother is strong in the boy, the world of his fancy is far different from that of the brainless lads around him. The image of the unhappy woman, of whom no one had ever spoken a good word to him, who had abandoned him, and whose faithlessness had given other boys a right to laugh him to scorn, ever floated before his eyes; he sees his mother, he beholds motherhood in every pure and sacred virgin that graces the altar shrines, and through love for his mother there awakes in the lad's mind a love for art, which is wisely fostered by the Jew. The visit of a Benedictine friar ends the childish idyl of free intercourse between Christian and Jew; on pain of persecution for Costa, he forces Adam to send his boy to the convent school. While here, he learns that his beloved tutor is to be put to the rack, and he effects an escape, to warn the Jew of the danger that awaits him at the hands of the monks. The smith, Ulrich, Costa, his wife, and child, all flee in the dead of night, protected by a snowstorm that wipes out their traces, to seek across the borders the peace, the right to live their lives after their own fashion, that is denied to them at home. They are betrayed and pursued; Ulrich is decoyed, Costa is basely murdered while he pleads for the life of his persecutor, and Adam is left alone with the sickly wife and little daughter of the Hebrew. At this point the story suddenly makes a break. Up to this point it has been full of freshness and charm, and written with a crispness in which Ebers has touched once again the level of his highest work. The hundred pages in which these incidents are condensed are full of pictures, the feeling of the middle ages is reproduced with easy power, without sense or evidence of effort. The descriptive scenes recall the objective treatment of nature that is so attractive a feature in the poems of the Meister and Minnesingers of the time. We are attracted, too, by the burly, true-hearted smith, the gentle-spirited, learned Jew, lord of the wide world of thought, and desiring no other or better world. Ruth, too, the poetic little maiden, has endeared herself to us. Yet at one fell swoop all these attractive characters are blotted out of the story, and we follow the fortunes of Ulrich only, fortunes too crowded with incidents, too baldly told to hold our interest. The farther we read the more tedious do these grow, and at the last we weary heartily of the manifold adventures of this plaything of a word. For though the break between the early and latter portion of Ebers' book is sharply delineated in the figure of his hero also, he yet retains of his old self the fancy that life can be rendered easy and successful at the bidding of a word. But that word? What is it? A fugitive on the wayside, Ulrich is rescued by the Dutch painter Antonio Moro, who is on his road to Spain, to paint for Philip. While halting at a wayside inn, he hears a rough soldier's song, whose confident burden is ever the word "Good-fortune," "good-fortune." Ulrich shouts, catching the refrain with rapturous glee, that surely is the word he has been seeking. And indeed, for a while, Fortune seems to justify his choice; she showers gifts from her cornucopia over his head. He is the favourite, the pupil of Moro, he is the inmate of the Spanish palace, nothing disturbs his enjoyment, save the thought that perchance Art be the word to enclose within it Good-Fortune. It is a pity that Ebers has marred what might have been a most original psychological study by his desire to pander to the German love of instruction. At the Spanish Court we have to endure an Ebers version of Don Carlos, we are obliged to meet many well-known characters, we are wearied by the number of personages that flit across the scene without connection with the tale; and even that fascinating Italian, Sofonisba Anguisciola, becomes tiresome at this author's hands. Then, too, how far Ebers is justified in the picture that he draws of Philip II. is a matter for question. His Philip is scarcely the one with whom history has rendered us familiar. Yet, having respect for Ebers' historical knowledge, we should, perhaps, accept him upon his authority, but for the astonishing family likeness he bears to the same writer's portrait of the Emperor Hadrian. Even the incident in The Emperor where Hadrian tries his hand at sculpture is here reproduced, under the altered form of painting. In all other respects, the two episodes and their ultimate outcomes are alike.

Meanwhile, good-fortune, while obedient to our hero in all else, fails him in Art, and this because his mother's light blood moves in him, and makes him want to take things too easily; the drudgery of his profession is distasteful to him. He begins to doubt himself, his future, the word and the efficacy of its spell. A visit to Italy disgusts him with his own paintings, and turns him into a gambler; his inherited restlessness and love of self-display, the vagabond nature of his mother, come uppermost; he becomes a soldier, under Don Juan of Austria, and we are forced to be present with him at the battle of Lepanto. "Glory" is now the word he lives for; he is convinced that glory is the word, the last and highest goal of man's endeavour. We encounter him next in the Netherlands, perpetrating the grossest inhumanities in the name of Christ and his Church, yet finding that glory, too, fails to fulfil his expectations. Then he remembers that Don Juan has said that laurels are leaves that wither, that power is a field to till, and henceforth "Power" is the word that he pursues. He gets himself chosen Electo, that is, leader of the mutinous army that clamoured for towns to sack, in return for arrears of pay. Here in the camp he finds his mother, who has sunk to a common camp-follower, the soldier's sibyl, fortune-teller, mistress, boon companion. Yet Ulrich is not repelled at finding her again thus. This may be psychologically correct, but in what follows Ebers is both absurd and wanting in good-taste. He would have us credit that, in spite of the foul associations of camp life, this woman has kept herself superior and absolutely high-minded. All this episode concerning the camp sibyl is truly unpleasant, and casts an ugly reflection upon the poetic remembrance ever cherished by Ulrich, and which was the one high note in his life that was never shifted, even when he touched his lowest depths of mental abasement. Accident reveals to the Electo that his father is still alive and at Antwerp, where he has become a noted armourer and a Protestant. Instantly Ulrich dreams of a reconciliation between his parents. He hurries to Antwerp, to find that old Adam not only does not take the same view of his wife's purity as her son, but that he will have nothing to say to this blood-stained man in Spanish uniform. Stunned, overwhelmed with grief, Ulrich returns to the camp, to find his mother stabbed in a fit of jealousy by one of her lovers. With more fury than before he throws himself into his duties as Electo, and leads his troops on to the sack of Antwerp. Wounded, he is rescued by his father, nursed by Ruth, and learns to know that the word is still in a measure Art, but that there is a truer and higher word,—and that word is Love. Thus, after all, this story of wild adventures ends, as all properly-conducted stories should, with marriage-bells and a general harmony. This may be possible, with Ebers' faith that character remains untarnished by even the vilest acts. For ourselves, we doubt it.

LORD HATHERLEY.*

LORD HATHERLEY's character, apart from his work, was so high, that he deserved a memorial in the shape of a biography, discreet, modest, and just, like himself. Mr. Stephens's memoir undoubtedly merits such a description. He has carefully borne in mind his own belief that "at the present day the interests of biography are at stake," and in his pages Lord

* A Memoir of the Right Hon. William Page Wood, Baron Hatherley, with Selections from his Correspondence. Edited by W. R. Stephens, M.A. 2 vols. Lond.: Bentley and Son. 1883.

Hatherley never figures as saying ill-natured things of his contemporaries, although we actually find him describing—doubtless, in moments of genuinely “virtuous indignation”—a statement of Cardinal Wiseman’s as “audacious lying,” and a speech of Mr. Disraeli’s as “scandalous.” Nor is it necessary to certify of the biographer of Dr. Hook that he does not thrust himself before the public to the detriment of his subject. But his new work is far too long, and in the selections he has made from the materials placed at his disposal he has not always borne in mind the necessity for consulting the wishes of the general public as to the life of such a man as Lord Hatherley. We do not object—although doubtless objection may in some quarters be made—to the publication of the pious reflections and epistolary critiques of religious and philosophical books with which Wood, as a busy barrister and a careful judge, filled his letters to his friend Hook. He was known to the world as an actively religious man, of what, with unconscious ingenuity, he once described as the “Hookite persuasion.” With him, religion was certainly what Carlyle and Joubert, for once agreeing, consider all religion should be, “not a theology or a theosophy, but a bond, a yoke, an indissoluble engagement.” It is right, therefore, that the world should know how the religion of such a man affects his daily conduct and labour, and to what extent it influences his career. But Mr. Stephens need not have given his readers so many of the boyish confidences and literary enthusiasms which Wood poured forth on paper, when studying at Geneva and elsewhere. One is glad to know that he was a warm admirer of Shakespeare, and one may well believe that he had little sympathy with Byron’s morality. But why should we have page after page of “sweet seventeen” criticism like this?—“One might say, in comparing the French poets to Shakespeare, as in comparing Homer to Virgil, that Racine, for instance, never falls so low as Shakespeare, nor does he ever mount by any means so high. For my part, I was always fond of native genius uncramped by rules. . . . I like Homer ten thousand times more than Virgil, and Shakespeare ten million times better than all the French poets put together. . . . By-the-bye, have you read the new work of Lord Byron, the Curse of Minerva? I think I never read such an infamous publication, or one more worthy of being burnt by the common hangman.” Finally, Mr. Stephens might have spared us altogether Lord Hatherley’s poems, consisting mostly of sonnets addressed to his much-loved wife, Charlotte. Easy-flowing album rhyme like,—

Oh! how thickly all around,
Yet so gently, that thou hearest
As they hover, not a sound,”

does not merit preservation for its own sake, nor can it be truly said to serve as a window through which one can look into the heart of the writer, however deserving of private respect it may be, as the sincere expression of a love that ran very smooth.

Lord Hatherley’s career was singularly placid and successful, as is well brought out in the unpretentious fragment of autobiography which in 1863 he wrote for Mr. Foss, who was then preparing the last chapter of his Judges of England, and with a slight amplification of which Mr. Stephens might, perhaps, have contented himself. He was born on November 29th, 1801, in Falcon Square, Cripplegate. He seems to have derived his courage, pertinacity, and perhaps, also, his, in many respects, advanced Liberalism from his father, the well-known Alderman or “Absolute” Wood, the friend and champion of Queen Caroline. His mother was the daughter of John Page, a surgeon, of Woodbridge, in Suffolk, who is notable chiefly for having had the poet Crabbe as one of his apprentices. The most eventful portion of Wood’s school career was that spent at Winchester. Here he formed his life-long intimacy with Dean Hook. During his time there, also, a rebellion broke out against the head master, Dr. Gabell; and, singularly enough, Wood, although a great favourite with Gabell, took the side of the rebels—simply because he thought them in the right—and was expelled. He was next sent to Geneva, where he was much influenced by Rossi’s lectures on ancient history, and ultimately to Trinity College, Cambridge. He came out twenty-fourth Wrangler, and was elected to a college fellowship; his health, however, was such as to prevent him from doing so well at college as otherwise he would have done. He was called to the Bar in 1827, and for some time took considerable delight in the society which sat at the feet of Coleridge, at Highgate, and assembled in Mrs. Basil Montagu’s drawing-room in Bedford Square. Industrious, religious, irreproachable in all moral respects, he soon obtained a comfortable professional income, and married a lady who was his “second self” in philanthropy, Sunday-school work, and the like. His independence was finally assured by his benefiting from the legacy of a singular relative, who seems to have been generally known as “Jimmy Wood, of Gloucester.” In 1847, Wood entered Parliament, as Member for the City of Oxford. His politics were a singular mixture. He was behind his time in resisting the abolition of Church rates, if not also in opposing marriage with a deceased wife’s sister. He was before it in advocating the removal of religious disabilities, the substitution of an affirmation for the Parliamentary Oath, the abolition of the game laws, and—fortunately for his political and legal prospects—household suffrage and the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. Of all the leading politicians of his time, he seems to have admired Lord John Russell most, although in 1855 he had the prescience to indicate Mr. Gladstone as the one man of genius then in the House of Commons. In 1851 he became Solicitor-General. He announces the fact in this letter, which is thoroughly characteristic of the man:—

“Just a line to say I am Solicitor-General as soon as the office is vacant (I believe to-morrow). Lord John very handsomely said, ‘I hope, after my declaration as to the suffrage, you can accept the office.’ I told him I would not otherwise have done so. God grant that it may be for good to me, a poor sinner, to be thus placed in a more responsible position! I have not sought it, but pray for me. I have given my £1,000 to Palmer’s Village Church, Westminster; and I am sure you will not grudge it, when I tell you poor Mr. James (the incumbent) was in despair, having only £700. I thought, if he could say he would have £1,000, provided £4,000 could be raised in a given time!—and lo! in a fortnight it was done, and he is overjoyed. It is a wretched district.”

Wood abandoned his career in Parliament and at the Bar for a Vice-Chancellorship in 1852, and thereafter considered himself as politically “shunted.” In 1868, however, he was made a Lord Justice, and finally, on Mr. Gladstone coming into power the same year, and Sir Roundell Palmer being “impossible” for the Lord Chancellorship, on account of his opinions on the Irish Church question, Sir William Page Wood succeeded to the highest honours of his profession, as Baron Hatherley. Failing eyesight compelled him to retire in 1872. In 1881 he died, having survived both his wife and his dearest friend, Dean Hook. He was especially lamented by his colleagues, and by the poor of Westminster, for whose spiritual, educational, and material welfare he had laboured long and earnestly. Although not one of the most eminent, Lord Hatherley was one of the most respected of Chancellors. His defence of the appointment of Sir Robert Collier to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and his characteristically courageous vindication of his old college contemporary, Mr. Beales, will not soon be forgotten.

These two volumes are largely composed of the judgments Lord Hatherley passed in private letters on the men he met, and the books, mainly of a theological and philosophical character, that he read in the course of a long life. They are marked by fairness rather than by acuteness. The bias and capacity of his mind may be gathered from what he says on Warburton, or this typical passage on Berkeley:—

“Cambridge was a dangerous place for a young, inquiring mind, and the philosophy ‘falsely so-called’ would have been singularly dangerous to me, had I not from a boy been imbued with Berkeley’s spiritual views. It is often supposed that his notions are pure theory: to me they were singularly practical; and I cannot say how fixedly, in its worst state of sinfulness, my mind clung to the reality and eternity of spiritual things as being the ‘δύναμις ὅρα,’ the only realities. The miracles also which in youth [not childhood, which is all-believing] are a severe test of faith, were always made so plain and easy to me on Berkeley’s views, who resolves all phenomena into the direct will of God, that I was saved from the influence of works like Hume’s. I have much to answer for in not having been saved from other sins, with all the helps I have received, but shall ever feel deeply grateful to Berkeley for the assistance he has afforded me. Such men are like the pious Eastern sovereigns who dig wells and build cisterns for the wayfaring traveller.”

Occasionally, he says things that are rather happy, simply on account of their author’s fairness. Thus, speaking of Buckle and his History of Civilisation, he says:—“It will be severely reviewed, and justly, for it is in the conceited intellectual style, and goes out of the way to favour infidelity; but I think there is something better in the man, and his dedication to his mother, of whom he is devotedly fond, is a good sign of it. . . . I think the book too large to do much harm, and the man too good not to make an effort to guide him better.” Again, we should have regarded the following, on Mr. Froude’s History of England, as a good example of Carlylian “mischievousness,” could we conceive Lord Hatherley to have been capable of anything of the kind:—"Froude's whole style is detestable; and, in fact, anything like a fixed belief in a dogma with him is like setting up a red rag before a bull. He has, I think, at bottom a sound affection for what is right, but his prejudices are enormous. It is curious how full of prejudice every man is who complains most of it in others." Finally, take, as a good example of unconscious humour, this, on Theodore Hook, the graceless uncle of the Dean of Chichester:—"I can easily imagine that he would feel great pleasure in tying crackers to the coats of the mourners at a funeral, without stopping to inquire whether they were parents following a deceased child, or undertakers' assistants merely hired for the solemnity." We may say of this biography, in conclusion, that in spite of the faults we have indicated, it is calculated to increase the reputation of its subject, as an upright judge, as a high-minded, veracious, and courageous politician, as a sincere and, on the whole, enlightened, Christian gentleman.

THE PARISH OF HILBY.*

THIS is not a pretentious book, and after reading on its title-page that it is merely "a simple story of a quiet place," no one will expect to find therein startling incidents, passion torn to rags, scenes of great power, or anything of the sensational kind. But though it does not make great promises, at all events it performs as much as it had undertaken, after a thorough and enjoyable fashion which is not always to be met with in more ambitious works. It deals exclusively with a small country neighbourhood and its inhabitants, indulges in no squire or smart folks, and introduces no nearer approach to the aristocracy than a parson and his family, who are believed to be descended from a baronet about two generations off. The hero, Massey, is an honest, good sort of young tenant-farmer, rather more gentlemanly than the generality of his class, and with such a strongly developed predilection for the society of girls, that the reader is amazed to find that he has actually managed to attain the age of thirty without getting married. Having gone to establish himself in a farm which he has taken, in a hitherto unknown locality, he proceeds immediately to "get foolish about" (as Mr. Howells' Shakers term falling in love) the only two unmarried girls in the place simultaneously. One of these girls is the parson's sister, a shade above him socially, and thoroughly worthy of being loved; while the other is a shade his inferior in position, daughter to a tenant-farmer, and an affected, silly, vulgar little thing. The former he speedily longs with his whole soul to marry, the latter he never desires to do more than flirt with; and his behaviour in regard to these two women is the part of the story with which we are most inclined to find fault. A man who is filled by a really great and passionate love for a woman who fully deserves to be so loved, is very unlikely to find pleasure in continuing at the same time to carry on a vigorous flirtation with a shallow-minded, pushing, ill-mannered, rustic coquette; and yet this is what the author represents her hero as doing. He ought to have felt—and we believe that such a man as Massey would have felt—that to kiss, caress, and trifle with the ill-bred village flirt was an insult to the lady whom he really cared for; and to a man of his stamp, it would have been a sheer impossibility to insult the object of his love. Therefore the fault in him rings harsh and untrue, like an unresolved discord in music, and is more offensive than it would otherwise have been, because it is out of keeping with the rest of his character. It is a pity, for he is brave, manly, generous, amiable, and in other ways a lovable young man enough; but the liking which he inspires is considerably lessened by his behaviour in his love-affairs, and when he gets into a mess over them, one feels that he richly deserved his troubles. For a further account of how he comported himself, and what fortune attended him, we refer our readers to the book itself, with the confident expectation of thereby earning the gratitude of all who do not despise a good and carefully-drawn picture of tranquil country life, drawn by a person who is evidently at home in her subject, and knows what sort of people tenant-farmers and labourers are, and how they are likely to speak, think, and act.

All the characters are life-like, but perhaps the chef d'œuvre of them is Pollie, the forward, pretty, vain, worldly, flirtatious, farmer's daughter, who has a great ambition to be fine, and who is "conscious that it was in her to live up to dress-clothes every evening of her life;" in which opinion, however, the reader differs from her wholly, perceiving that Nature had rendered her eminently well adapted to the society of the class to which she belonged by birth, and that she must inevitably have been thoroughly miserable and out of her element in the atmosphere of any more refined state of life. Having two lovers, she appears also to have two selves, which are continually at war together as to which of the suitors is to be the favoured one. Her own genuine self cordially approves of, appreciates, and prefers the sweetheart who is least genteel and most funny, and whose jokes and style of courtship are alike atrociously vulgar, and exactly suited to her taste and understanding. But then there is in her another self as well, which finds an irresistible charm in the superior appearance and manners of the more gentlemanly lover, and to him she seems unable to help giving what small portion of heart (if any) she possesses, even though almost against her own will. The contest between these two selves, as now the former predominates, and now the latter, is well delineated; and there is nothing forced or untrue to nature in Pollie's conduct, nothing analogous to what we have complained of in Massey's. Mrs. Mann has the excellent gift of being able to put herself into the place of the individuals she writes about, looking at things from the point of view they would be likely to take, and sympathising with their sentiments; and this gift imparts real human nature to her work, and enables her to render faithfully delicate gradations of disposition and feeling which are not very easy to put into words, though it is by no means unusual for people to have a vague impression of their existence. From beginning to end of the book there is not an atom of slovenly work to be found; and though its pages are not marked by any special power or originality, we have, nevertheless, found it to be very pleasant reading.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

British Quarterly Review. April. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—This number is in a great measure occupied with ecclesiastical and political controversy. The article on "Welsh Education and the Established Church in Wales" is a powerful answer to an attack made by the Church Quarterly. There is no doubt that a large proportion of the religious life of the Principality is connected with the Nonconformist communities. But surely Mr. Richard goes a little beyond the truth when he says:—"There is not one of the upwards of 3,000 Dissenting pulpits in Wales where the pure and lofty morality of the Gospel is not habitually and honestly enforced." Wales is exceptionally fortunate, if it is free from Antinomianism. Another vindication, this time of an historical character, is to be found in "The True Character of the Pilgrim Fathers." "Notes on the Reign of Charles II." is a thoughtful essay, which deserves high commendation for its moderation and candid spirit. Mr. R. J. Griffith is surely a little hasty when, in "The Future of English Politics," he asks, "Where, except in London, would a heavy tax on coals, for the benefit of a mere insignificant section of the community, be permitted?" The redemption of Epping Forest, among other things, has been done by the tax on coals. And Paris, to mention one city only, puts up with much more in the way of taxes than London. And is it not a distinct retrogression to advocate "a wise and flexible system of out-door relief"? The most interesting of the literary articles is the account of the Italian scholar, Muratori. The paper on "The Late Bishop Wilberforce" is well worth reading. The other contents of the number are "Thought and Speech," an able contribution to natural theology, "Shakspeare's Immortals," and "The Political Survey of the Quarter."

Social Wreckage. By Francis Peek. (Isbister.)—This is a book which, instead of criticising, we feel rather disposed to encourage the reading of, and mainly on account of the obvious earnestness of its author, who belongs to the philanthropic, rather than economical, school of theorists on social questions. It is a review of the laws of England as they affect the poor, and is practically a revised and enlarged edition of Mr. Peek's former book, on "Our Laws and our Poor." While Mr. Peek, in our opinion, goes to extravagance in his sweeping condemnation of the Poor Laws for fostering pauperism, while there is indignation rather than suggestion in what he says of the Licensing Laws and the laws relating to women, he marshals before the dispassionate reader a great number of alarmingly significant facts as to the cruelty with which witnesses are often treated in the course of trial, and to the inequality of the punishments inflicted by judges and magistrates. Mr. Peek's opinion is that "a terrible responsibility rests upon our legislators, upon our churches, and upon all members of the community who, without protest, permit things to remain in their present condition." His book, however, will stimulate not so much legislation as voluntary effort, which, being too frequently suffused with anger, sometimes obstructs rather than promotes legislation.

The Book of Psalms in English Blank Verse. By Ben Tehillim. (Andrew Elliot, Edinburgh.)—The author of this translation thinks that "to chant a prose version is an absurdity; music, being rhythmical, needs a rhythmical subject." Rhyme he rejects, as imposing "on a faithful translator difficulties which are insurmountable." Thus he finds himself shut up to blank verse. But he does not mean by "blank verse" what is commonly signified by that phrase. He means simply unrhymed verse, commonly, indeed, of ten syllables, but often of eight or six, and without any attempt at the variety of pauses which goes so far to make the music of blank verse properly so called. This is the form in which he gives us his new translation of the Psalter. As a translation, we have no intention of criticising it. It claims to use "the verbal and lineal arrangements of the original," and therefore moves under very considerable constraint. But we may say emphatically that if "Ben Tehillim" thinks that this "blank verse" of his has any one quality (besides faithfulness to the original, of which we do not speak) which should make it preferable to the prose of the Authorised Version or of the Prayer-book Version for reading or chanting, to be used with music or without music, he is grievously mistaken. Here is a whole Psalm (iii.) :—

"Jehovah, O how many are my troublers!
Many are rising up at me!
Many are saying to my soul,
There is no saving help for him in God.
But thou, Jehovah, art a shield round me,
My glory and the raiser of my head.
Aloud unto Jehovah I will call;
And he'll answer from his holy hill.
I did down lay me, and would take my sleep.
I have awaked again,
Because Jehovah is upholding me.
I will not fear the myriads of folk Whom they have set against me round about.
Arise, Jehovah! save me, O my God!
For thou hast smitten all my foes on cheek;
The teeth of wicked men thou shattered hast.
Unto Jehovah is salvation due;
Upon thy people may thy blessing be."

Cambridge Greek Testament for Schools and Colleges: St. Mark's Gospel. By the Rev. G. F. Maclear. (The University Press.)—It is scarcely necessary to say more than that Dr. Maclear's contribution to this excellent series is worthy of its predecessors. His annotation is, perhaps, more didactic and more apologetic than we should expect in a book intended for educational purposes; but there is little with which the reader into whose hands the book is likely to fall will disagree, and nothing to offend. On the other hand, it is satisfactorily full, nor would it have been easy to compress without injuring it. In the criticism of the text, Dr. Maclear seems to us very successful in hitting the just mean. The detailed knowledge of manuscripts and reading which it is sometimes the practice to impose upon lads at school seems to us quite out of place. It is fitted only for advanced students. Nevertheless, all intelligent readers of the New Testament should be acquainted with the outlines of the subject. These are exactly what Dr. Maclear gives us in this volume. In the series of the "Cambridge Bible for Schools," from the same publishers (in this series the English text is given), we have The Epistle to the Hebrews, edited by Canon Farrar. We may specially recommend to readers the able contrast which the editor draws, in his introduction, between the view of the Mosaic Law as it is developed in the Epistles of St. Paul and as it is set forth in this Epistle. This tells strongly against the Pauline authorship, the particular arguments on this subject being given later on. The annotation, as far as we have examined it, seems full of interest and value.

The Adventures of Halek, an autobiographical fragment, by John H. Nicholson (Griffith and Farran), is intended to set forth in an allegorical form varying states of growth in the mind of a thinker of the nineteenth century. The narrative is skilfully woven, although here and there the veil is almost drawn aside; and all through, it requires only ordinary attention to discover the originals of the dwellers in Benuben, that island between the distant countries of Adironda and Kashep, whose inhabitants only partly believe in the existence of these other places, while yet they are blessed or cursed by those who come from them. Some idea of the author's opinions is given in such passages as the following :—"Kashep may indeed be considered as a house of correction, for it is only inhabited by those Benubenas who wholly give themselves up to evil, so that the happiness of others would be destroyed were they not separated till they are willing to make an orderly progression in usefulness and wisdom." In the course of the narrative, the author manages to satirise a great many familiar usages and old customs, whilst inculcating throughout a spirit of reverence and humility.

We have received the first of a series of The Student's Hand-book of Philosophy—Psychology, by Professor Cocker, D.D. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—The first book, entitled "Prolegomena," gives in outline the views of different schools of thought; the second deals with methodology; in the third we are introduced to psychology proper, this being divided into phenomenal psychology, with the subdivisions of cognition, feeling, and volition, and dynamical psychology, subdivided into intellect, sensibility, and will. Professor Cocker is great in classification. His nomenclature gives the impression of being too elaborate and technical, but he certainly contrives to give lucidity and order to his exposition of a very difficult subject.

Q. Horatii Flacci Carminum Liber IV. Edited, with Notes, by T. E. Page, M.A. (Macmillan and Co.)—Mr. Page shows us that there is still something to be done for Horace, after all the labour which commentators almost without number have bestowed upon him. More than once he finds an usage or a construction, an antithesis or an allusion, which has been missed, or not adequately noted by his predecessors. In iii., 68, the mood of contuderit ("neque res bellica. . . . Quod regum tumidas contuderit minas, ostendet Capitolio") requires notice, though it can scarcely be described as "very difficult," an expression which would have been more appropriate, if the poet had used the indicative of a purely hypothetical and conceptive reason. In ix., 49-52, the antithesis between "peius leto flagitium timet, non ille pro caris amicis et timidus perire," is well pointed out. In xi., 4, 5, the indicative fulges might have been noted, seeing that Phyllis was not actually wearing, but was to wear, the ivy, of which Horace has, he tells her, a good store. Mr. Page would have made the construction of ix., 1 ("ne forte credas," &c.) clearer, if he had told his readers how the ne ought not to be taken. It is only too possible that, in the face of his summary and note, a boy may take it as = ne credideris. Possibly it might be well to substitute a comma for the colon at the end of the stanza. We should certainly do so in xii., 21-4, after poculis :—

"Cum tua
Velox merces veni : non ego te meis
Immunem meditor tingere poculis :
Pleasa dives ut in domo ;"

otherwise, the dives might be taken with the subject of veni. We cannot accept the suggestion that plurimum should be taken with nemus, in ii., 29-31,—

"Grata carpentis thyma per laborem
Plurimum circos nemus uvidique Tiburis ripas ;"

per laborem standing for "laboriously" without an adjective does not sound right. But we have no serious fault to find with Mr. Page's edition, but on the contrary, believe it to be a work of very considerable merit, the outcome of a scholarship that is ingenious, as well as accurate.

A Short Constitutional History of England. By Henry St. Clair Feilden, B.A. (B. H. Blackwell, Oxford.)—"A Short History of the Constitution" would have been a better title for this book. It does not, as one might expect, give a continuous history of the country regarded from the point of view of the student of the Constitution, but takes in order its various political institutions, and traces their growth. There are ten chapters, dealing with such subjects as "The Crown," "The Central Assembly," "The People," "The Towns," "The Church," and "The Defences of the Realm." It is a good plan, and, on the whole, well worked out, though we notice some strange omissions. Here, for instance, is the account of the Reform Bill of 1867 :—"In 1867, Lord Derby's Reform Bill was passed. By it thirty-three seats were redistributed, the county franchise was reduced to £12, and a lodger franchise was added." There is nothing here about the household franchise, for which we have to refer back (not that any reference is given) to p. 134. A careless reader would certainly suppose that a "lodger franchise was added" to the £10 borough franchise of 1832, mentioned in a preceding paragraph.

A Narrative of the Boer War. By Thomas Fortescue Carter. (Remington.)—If we cannot accept this volume as history, and to do this would be to pronounce definitely on some very obscure and difficult questions, we may say without hesitation that it contains some valuable materials for history. Mr. Carter has not the gift of very articulate utterance; he is apt to lose, if not himself, yet certainly his readers, in a multiplicity of details. But he has had good opportunities of gathering knowledge of the subject about which he writes, and he is obviously candid and anxious to do justice. He was present at the disaster of Majuba Hill, and his narrative does not make that dismal affair seem any brighter. On one point—of which we have lately heard something, and of which we shall certainly have to hear more—the bad shooting of our troops, he is very emphatic. On the whole, though we can hardly recommend this book to the general reader, we may say that no one who wishes to find out for himself the truth about the war, its causes, its conduct, and its result, can afford to neglect this valuable contribution to its history.

River Songs. By Arthur Dillon. Illustrated by Margery May. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—There is some really fine verse in this volume, though the author's feeling for rhythm seems uncertain. He has caught, too, something of the spirit of the legends which he tells, though the framework in which they are set is somewhat clumsily contrived. The fancy of their being related by holly-bushes and drops of water comes perilously near to the grotesque. Still, Mr. Dillon has imagination and power of expression, and can give, as in the description of the three homes which his wandering mariners visit—"The Home of Revel," "The Home of Sleep," and "The Home of Pain"—distinct and impressive pictures. For quotation, however, we may find a more suitable passage in the last of these River Songs:—

"Let the wind be roaring his loudest, or sunk in death-like swoon;
Still the Ocean, the changeless lover, follows the changeless moon;
But she above in the night-time unmoved looks down on his love,
Like a god and less than human, as she sits on her throne above.
And now she watches his yearning, and now she hides away,
And turns her bright face from him that worships the Lord of Day.
But, seen or unseen, he loves her, and follows her round the world,
And vainly he stretches towards her, with his silvery locks and curled,
And his great heart moves within him, and he heaves a mighty sigh;
And thus, for ever and ever, he worships his Queen on high."

The shorter poems seem inferior to the more sustained efforts. There is spirit in Miss M. May's illustrations, but the drawing is occasionally questionable,—witness the calves, in that which faces p. 63.

A History of Wood Engraving. By George E. Woodberry. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Wood engraving, if we take no account of certain mythical stories which give it an earlier origin, seems to have preceded printing by about a quarter of a century. The history of its early developments in Flanders, in Germany, in Italy, and in France is narrated in an interesting way by Mr. Woodberry, with no lack of illustration. We are then brought on to Albert Dürer and his school, a marvellous advance both in power of design and in delicacy of execution. Then begins the story of the decline of the art, a decline which may almost be said to have ended in total extinction. Finally, we have the revival, with the names of Thomas Bewick and William Blake in the forefront of the movement. Of modern wood engraving, the account is necessarily brief and imperfect; more than one name, especially of English artists that might well have been mentioned, is lacking. All that is said, however, seems sensible and sound; and we have a valuable account of the recent development of the art in America, a development which has produced surprisingly successful results. The author gives us some good examples by way of illustration. We may mention especially a fine portrait of Dean Stanley. He adds a useful list of works on wood engraving.

A Pilgrimage to the Shrines of Our Lady of Loreto. By George Falkner. (Elliot Stock.)—Mr. Falkner describes the "Holy House," the gorgeous church in which it is enshrined, and its treasury, rich with the offerings of many generations of devotees, with the feeling of a lover of art; and he tells its story, not exactly from the standpoint of a believer—which, indeed, it must be difficult even for a convert to assume—but with that sympathy which it is not difficult to feel with the genuine belief of others. The volume is handsomely illustrated from drawings and photographs, and makes a very appropriate record of an interesting expedition.

Behind a Brass Knocker. By Frederick Barnard and Charles H. Ross. (Chatto and Windus.)—Here we have sketches of the inmates of a boarding-house, a numerous company, among which a dismal cynicism permits us to see few that are not knaves, fools, or lunatics. Few would live by choice in a boarding-house; but we take it that those who find it necessary or convenient to do so are about as honest and as sane as other people. Dickens set the example of laughing at them, but his laugh was good-humoured, not the risus amarus with which Messrs. Barnard and Ross introduce these "grim realities," as they call them. There is a certain cleverness in these sketches, and, it may be owned, a certain truth. But, as a whole, they are false. There was never gathered together such a menagerie of evil beasts as we find collected at "Mrs. Mite's Boarding-house."

Paris in Peril. Edited by Henry Vizetelly. 2 vols. (Tinsley Brothers.)—The story of the siege of Paris is told in these two volumes with much detail, gathered, one may safely conjecture, from personal knowledge and experience. There have been many sieges more tragical in their incidents and their dénouement, but none which have had a more varied and remarkable history. None certainly have been more thoroughly described. All the civilised world was watching the scene; and, not to speak of the besiegers, the besieged were possessed of even too great a gift of expressing their feelings. Hence, there arose the most curious mixture of tragic and comic elements. There was no lack of genuine heroism, and side by side with it the exhibition, at once pitiful and ludicrous, of mean and cowardly natures trying to assume an heroic pose. All this made a succession of very remarkable scenes, of which we get in these volumes impressions that are photographic in their minuteness and fidelity. The editor's care in collecting information is worthy of all praise, and his general method of dealing with his subject, and of judging the conduct of both sides in this terrible conflict, are excellent. It is a pity that he should have injured the effect of the whole with the absurd conclusion which his political prejudices lead him to draw. It is simply irrational to suppose that our action was influenced by the fact that Mr. Gladstone, and not Mr. Disraeli, was at the head of affairs. A Conservative Government would have been as unable to intervene as was the Liberal.

Plays for the People; or, Common Rights and their Defenders. By

C. Edmund Maurice. (Bell and Sons.)—Mr. Maurice wishes to "popularise" the work of the Commons Preservation Society by presenting to the public "some of its more picturesque aspects." With this hope, he has written three little dramas, the first of which has for its subject the preservation of Epping Forest, (why should we not have now a Part II., turning on the rejection of the High Beech railway scheme?) the second celebrates the good deed of Timothy Bennett, shoemaker, of Hampton Wick, who in 1752 vindicated a right of way through Bushey Park; while the third is an imaginary story, setting forth the jobbing tendency of local boards, and the still more culpable laches of ex-officio members. This last, with its more rapid action and obvious issues, is, perhaps, the best of the three. We wish well to Mr. Maurice's plays, though we do not feel very sanguine. For the most part, it is not books that make movements popular, but movements that make books. It is a curious fact that to ninety-nine people out of a hundred the "common rights" in which they are interested mean something quite different from the reality. They are eager to assert the privilege of the public to enjoy certain open spaces. True "common rights" are really "commoners' rights," to which the interests of the public are really adverse. Grazing rights, for instance, become valueless, when a common becomes accessible to the "toiling millions." "Lopping," to take another example, had its use as an instrument for defeating the claims of grasping lords, but lopping has had to be extinguished, in the interests of the public, which likes to see the trees in full beauty.

The Companion to the Grammars. By F. Venosta. (Williams and Norgate.)—Signor Venosta has put together a collection of words, phrases, &c., in English, French, German, and Italian. The book is likely to be useful, though the English is not altogether beyond reproach. Our usage of articles has not been mastered, and some of the phrases and terms are incorrect. We do not speak of "a made-up dish," or "a copy-book of penmanship." A "Fallow," for "Fellow," on p. 212, is a ludicrous, but suggestive misprint. "Town-due" scarcely represents "l'octroi," though it would not be easy to suggest a real equivalent. The City of London "corn and coal" duties are our nearest approach. But after all, we can find but few errors.

New Zealand As It Is. By John Bradshaw. (Sampson Low and Co.)—This is certainly the most complete book on New Zealand that has yet come under our notice. The author describes the country, the population, the life which they lead, the characteristics of their government, their farming, their commerce, the education which they can secure for their children, in fact, their whole social state. The author's object is to "consider the characteristics of the country rather as they affect those who are about to leave their native land than as they appear to colonists themselves." To enable him to do this, he has had a considerable experience of life elsewhere than in New Zealand, and he confirms and supplements the information which he supplies by official documents, statistic and other. The general reader will find much interest in it; the intending emigrant can hardly have a more complete, and, we should say, trustworthy guide.

English as She is Spoke; or, a Jest in Sober Earnest. With an Introduction by James Millington. (Field and Tuer.)—This is not the first time that fun has been made out of the ingenious Señor Carolino's attempt to instruct the studious youth of Portugal and Brazil in English "clean of gallicisms and despoiled phrases," but the jest will bear repetition. A more curious example of a dictionary-constructed language could not be found. Schoolmasters know what absurd results follow when their pupils have the free use of an English-Latin dictionary, but they will not be able to match this. Sometimes, indeed, the compiler has soared beyond the dictionary, and gone through processes which it is impossible to trace. It is perplexing to find among "kitchen utensils" "the shovels," and "some wigs" among "eatings." An ordinary acquaintance with "hunting" does not include the term "hound's fee," nor is "staroh" commonly included among "metals and minerals." "Gleek" is an obscure "game," and the "degree" of "harbinger" is uncommon. As a sample of continuous English, we may take this advice of an old physician who had "enjoyed of a health unalterable,"—"I live of the product of my ordering without take any remedy I command to my sicks."

We have received Sonnenschein's Special-Merit Readers. Standard III. (W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.)—Notes, illustrations and glossaries help to make what seems a careful selection of extracts, both prose and verse, attractive and useful. There are one or two poems in Scotch; why not take some in Dorsetshire, from Mr. Barnes' volumes?—Book IV. of Chambers's Historical Readers (W. and R. Chambers) is the last of the series, and takes in the history of England from 1688 to 1882. From the same publishers we have also Chambers's Graduated Readers, Book III. Each reading is supplied with a glossary and exercises.

NOVELS AND TALES.—Lost in the Crowd, by the Author of "Recommended to Mercy" (White and Co.), is the story of an octoroon, who in the old days of slavery loved "not wisely, but too well," an impulsive young Englishman. We are introduced during the slow progress of three volumes to typical people of all nationalities, and in spite of the occasional tedium of long drawn-out details, become interested. Happily, all comes right for the pretty octoroon in the end.—Upton-on-Thames, by Thomas A. Pinkerton, 2 vols. (Chapman and Hall), is an amusing story of county-town life, circling round a vulgar and ambitious solicitor and his equally vulgar and still more ambitious wife. The heroine is tolerably attractive. There is an account of a coroner's inquest, which, though somewhat tedious, hits off pretty effectively the weak points of that institution.—Killed at Sedan, by Samuel Richardson (Washbourne), is not a particularly entertaining story relating to the Franco-Prussian war. There is far too much "fine-writing" in it.—Mary St. John. By Rosa Nouchette Carey. 3 vols. (Bentley.) "The Church" and its work plays a prominent part in this novel. Mary St. John is one of those young women who have a "mission," and fearlessly carry it out, though happily, in the end, she is content to find her work in the common-place sphere to which most of her sex devote themselves. There is much affliction and death towards the end, and some hard things are said of Dissenters; but the story is likely to prove acceptable in certain circles.

MAGAZINES, ETC.—We have received the following for April:—Part 1 of a serial edition of the Doré Gallery (Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co.)—Part 32 of Picturesque Palestine.—The Magazine of Art.—Art and Letters.—Part 6 of Greater London.—The Gentleman's Magazine.—The Army and Navy Magazine.—Colburn's United Service Magazine.—The Month.—The Nautical Magazine.—Science Gossip.—The Theatre, a good number.—London Society.—The Folklore Journal.—The Antiquarian Magazine.—All the Year Round, which contains an interesting paper on "Rats."—Chambers's Journal.—Aunt Judy's Magazine.—Cassell's Magazine.—Good Words, in which the papers on "Alpine Resting-places" are concluded.—The Sunday at Home.—The Leisure Hour.—The Sunday Magazine.—Part 1 of a reissue of Cassell's Dictionary of Cookery.—The Ladies' Gazette of Fashion, which gives a description of the dresses worn at the recent Royal Drawing-room receptions.—Harper's Monthly Magazine, which opens with an illustrated article on "English Farmers."—The Atlantic Monthly.—The North-American Review.—The China Review.—The Continent.

ODONTO.

Has been celebrated for more than half a century as the best, purest, and most fragrant preparation for the teeth ever made; it whitens and preserves the teeth, imparts to them a pearl-like whiteness, strengthens the gums, and gives a pleasing fragrance to the breath. Health depends in a great measure upon the soundness of the teeth, and all dentists will allow that neither washes nor paste can possibly be as effectious for polishing the teeth, and keeping them sound and white, as a pure and non-gritty tooth powder; it such Rowlands' Odonto has always proved itself to be.

his sketches have considerable freshness and humour. Mr. Downey has certainly been successful in his efforts to please, and his work is perhaps the more interest-

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

PARLIAMENT was amused on Monday to hear officially that the Governor of Queensland had sent a policeman to annex Papua, an island about a third larger than France. Members laughed out as the telegram was read, not, we think, from ridicule, but from a certain excitement and sense of the incongruity between the means and the end. It appears, from a short speech by the Under-Secretary for the Colonies, Mr. E. Ashley, that in the Colonial Office the annexation is supposed to have been made in self-defence, the Queenslanders expecting a German or French descent on Papua. If there is ground for that fear, it may, as we have argued elsewhere, be expedient to adopt the annexation, though Papua must be a separate colony. There will, of course, be much debate, but substantially the matter is of less importance than it looks. Papua is sure to fall to Australia, and the Queenslanders are only a little in advance of inevitable occurrences. The great island will not allow its most important strait to be in anybody's hands but its own.

The German Parliament was on the 14th inst. startled by a Message from the Emperor, countersigned by Prince Bismarck, in which his Majesty stated that legislation for the benefit of the working-classes must go on. He had already in his hereditary dominion relieved them of the Income-tax, and he had now "obtained the assent of the allied Governments"—a curious paraphrase for the Federal Council—to a proposal for passing the Budget of 1884. If the Reichstag also assented and passed that Budget, the winter would be left free for economic reforms. The Liberals are greatly annoyed with this message. They think Prince Bismarck is using the Emperor and the workmen to force on them his proposal for an anticipatory Budget, which will leave him for eighteen months free from Parliamentary control. They are, therefore, resolved to resist, but resistance will, as usual, depend upon the action of the Catholic Centre, which may have been conciliated. The Vatican, however, can hardly desire to untie Prince Bismarck's hands.

Sir Stafford Northcote unveiled on Thursday, at Westminster, the noble bronze statue of Lord Beaconsfield by Signor Raggi, at the request of Lord Arthur Russell, who with happy courtesy has taken the lead in rendering this tribute of honour to one of the greatest of his uncle's adversaries. Sir Stafford's speech was not particularly happy, for it consisted chiefly in attributing to Lord Beaconsfield those qualities and that kind of popularity which you would suppose a priori that a great English statesman would possess, but which, as a matter of fact, Lord Beaconsfield certainly did not possess, though he possessed other qualities and another kind of popularity far more unique. Sir Stafford said that Lord Beaconsfield had "rooted himself in the affections" and obtained "a command over the hearts" of the whole British people, which we believe to be as far as possible from the truth. And he attributed to Lord Beaconsfield's individuality of character the power to make all of us "sympathise with him," even while we feel our own unlikeness. Lord Salisbury, on the other hand, attributed to Lord Beaconsfield a fixed resolve to make war on all the tendencies which threaten the separate nationality of England, and the diminution or extinction of her peculiar glories,—which is true enough, only Lord Salisbury went on to identify Lord Beaconsfield's whole "nature and being" with a passionate desire for the greatness of this country, of which there seems to us absolutely no evidence. Lord Beaconsfield made the best he knew how to make, of course, of the nation with which he had identified his career. But whether he ever loved us in the least, or even liked us heartily, we entertain the gravest doubt.

The heartiest speech was that of Lord John Manners, who was really attached and grateful to his hero, and expressed his attachment with manly force and gratitude. He declared that Lord Beaconsfield was "a charming,—an ever charming companion,—and a true friend." He further described him as having, behind a somewhat impassive appearance, "a heart full of the most generous emotions, and alive to the tenderest and gentlest sympathies,—a fancy ever free, an imagination ever soaring, a faith that was constant even unto death." We can hardly imagine words that seem to us less accurately descriptive of the man. That they truly and fairly describe, however, Lord John Manners's private ideal of the man, we are well aware. But was it not part of Lord Beaconsfield's speciality that the leading features of his character were far more powerfully impressed on those who studied him from afar than on his friends,—that the near view of him confused the observer?

There is talk of taking four nights for the discussion of the Affirmation Bill, which comes on next week. Such a waste of time on a Bill the principle of which has been discussed and re-discussed for years, till the whole country is sick of it, and wants simply to decide the matter, would be monstrous. We hope that if any organised attempt to waste the time of the House of Commons in this way should be made, there may be a very significant explosion of opinion on the subject in the country. A single night's debate is more than enough for a subject beaten-out already as fine as goldbeater-skin.

Joseph Brady and Daniel Curley, the two men who with Kelly were accused of being the ringleaders in the murders of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, have both been found guilty, and sentenced to death. An alibi was set up on behalf of each, but the evidence against them was irresistible. Four approvers, none of whom had any motive for fixing on these men, swore to their guilt, and were corroborated by independent testimony. Curley, who made a long speech in his own defence, accused the police of teaching the independent witnesses to identify him after his arrest, but he offered no proof; and it must be remembered that these witnesses had every temptation to escape the popular dislike, if they could have done it on so easy an excuse. The jury, who were very painstaking, felt no doubt; and Curley, a very bold and decided man, admitted frankly that he had been a member of the Invincibles from his youth, and stepped down saying, "God save Ireland!" Carey, in his final evidence, accused him of having suggested the murder of the carman Kavanagh, who, he contended, "ought to be wiped out," lest he should peach; but there is no corroboration of this. The most extraordinary feature of Curley's case is that, while acknowledging that he had taken the oath to commit murder when ordered, he declared and believed that he was a man of unusually high "moral" character. It seems as if with such men, as with the followers of Bhowanie, murder had been struck out of the list of crimes.

Another informer! There is no help for it, and no reason why a bad man should not confess and so aid the law, but it is very unlucky that the right cause must rely on such agency. Norman, the possessor of the dynamite taken in the Strand, was on Thursday admitted Queen's evidence against the arrested dynamiteurs. He stated that his name was Lynch, that he was an American, of Irish parents; that he wished to free Ireland; that he was induced to join one of many New York societies ruled by O'Donovan Rossa, who is called by them "The Old Man;" that he was ordered to England at a moment's notice, and there found, principally from the statements of Dr. T. Gallagher, now under examination, that he was expected to aid in a conspiracy to blow up the House of Commons and other public buildings. His evidence has still to be corroborated, but if it is true, it for the first time directly implicates the American leaders of the violent party. The legal advisers of the Crown, moreover, consider it sufficient to justify a prosecution of the dynamiteurs for treason-felony, the penalty for which is ten years' penal servitude.

Lynch's revelations have greatly accelerated the growth of healthy opinion in America. The great majority there have for some time been doubtful as to the propriety of allowing such plots to be arranged on their territory, but have doubted the evidence. Knowing Lynch, and being able to test his statements about persons and places, they are growing convinced, and the feeling is rapidly rising that a great State professing Christianity ought to prevent the despatch of agents and money for murderous purposes against a friendly people. This opinion has been loudly expressed in the Press, and by public speakers—one speaker in particular, a Mr. Davis, President of the Young Hebrews' Association, accusing the Fenians of "sheltering their cowardly carcasses behind the American Constitution"—and is, it is said, beginning to influence the respectable Irish. The strong language employed is no proof of strong action, but it is proof that the Americans are not afraid of the dynamiteurs, either as criminals or voters, and will when the time arrives deal with them with their characteristic decision. The ultimate remedy, as we pointed out long since, will come from that side.

Sir William Harcourt was rather overdoing his part of guardian of the public safety, when he went so far on Monday night as to say, in answer to Mr. Parnell, that he would ask for permission to dispense with the rule which allows prisoners to have a private interview with the solicitor who is to defend them, and that he had actually given instructions that no such interviews were to be allowed in the case of persons accused of belonging to the dynamite conspiracies. The truth is that such instructions were quite inconsistent with the present law, and it is doubtful enough whether Parliament would have granted the Home Secretary an Act of indemnity for breaking it. That in such cases it would be quite right to insist that no solicitor whose respectability is not known to the Government should be permitted to defend this class of prisoners,—a precaution formerly adopted in cases of treasonable conspiracies,—we admit. The safety of the public is of paramount importance, and, no doubt, under cover of interviews with legal advisers, steps might be taken to destroy all evidence of conspiracies which it is essential for the public interest to bring to light. But though that is a good reason for not letting the person accused of dynamite conspiracies choose their own legal advisers without check, it is no reason at all for the monstrous injustice of refusing them a perfectly free and unfettered consultation with any respectable legal advisers who undertake their defence. Sir W. Harcourt poses extremely well as the enthusiastic guardian of our hearths and homes, but he should beware of overdoing the part. We observe with pleasure that he is not acting up to his threat.

At the annual dinner of the Conservative Central Committee, held on Wednesday night, Sir Stafford Northcote declared that he did not remember a single occasion "since the death of our lamented and revered leader," on which Lord Salisbury and himself had seriously differed on the course of policy which ought to be pursued. That certainly takes one somewhat by surprise. Did Sir Stafford Northcote really agree with Lord Salisbury when the latter proposed to the Conservative Peers of the House of Lords to reject the Arrears Bill, since so many of the Lords' amendments had been disagreed with by the Commons? If he did, why did he support the Lords' amendments in the Commons so languidly, and give everybody the impression that far from desiring to bring up the whole strength of the Conservative party to the support of those amendments, he was not in the least serious in the wish to force a dissolution on them? Lord Randolph Churchill has expressed the view which the whole public took of Sir Stafford Northcote's attitude,—his very wise attitude, we venture to call it,—on that matter. But if he did not agree with Lord Salisbury, what an extraordinary declaration was that of Wednesday night. But perhaps Sir Stafford Northcote does not think it a "serious" difference,—when Lord Salisbury wishes to risk a dissolution on a matter on which he himself thinks that a dissolution would be an act of madness.

The full operation of the remission of the passenger-duty effected by Mr. Childers is not yet perceived. It will not only enable the Companies to improve third-class travelling, as long as the charge is kept below a penny a mile, but it will tempt them to do it. Trains heavily loaded with third-class passengers will pay, and we hope to see the order, which is the great want of the third-class traffic, fully established. This can only be secured by the introduction of the Swiss carriages, with their short benches and free gangway between them stretching from carriage to carriage, down which a conductor can walk, with authority to remove drunken men, prevent riot, and suppress foul talk. Such carriages will be eagerly sought, the seclusion which is desired by first-class passengers being just the quality which third-class passengers dislike. "They like company," and when assembled in large numbers will help to keep decent order. It is to the increase of this class of travellers that the Companies must look to keep down the expense of haulage, and with the Swiss carriages they would soon add one-third to their receipts. Female travelling especially would be doubled. At present, a decent or feeble woman able to pay only third-class fare travels only when compelled.

Mr. Goschen, on Wednesday, delivered to the Bankers' Institute an address on the increased purchasing power of gold. Its drift was the same as that of his speech in the House of Commons, but he adduced much evidence, and entered into further detail. He holds that the gold production of the world since 1862 has sunk to £20,000,000 a year, of which £10,000,000 is used up in the arts and other ways, leaving £10,000,000 to swell the volume of the currency. Three Governments, however—those of America, Germany, and Italy—have absorbed £200,000,000 in changing silver and paper currencies into gold, and have thus swept up the whole surplus, while the rapid increase of trade and intercommunication makes the demand for metal yearly more eager. There should, therefore, be a heavy fall in all prices not kept up by special causes, and Mr. Goschen quoted a mass of returns proving that this had been the case. We have rarely, or indeed never, seen a speech which approached so near a mathematical demonstration; and, if it is correct, it follows that rents must fall. It is impossible for the farmer, with all his prices reduced—permanently reduced, unless a new gold supply is discovered—to pay the rents based upon a higher average of receipts. The landlords may, however, take comfort. They have had nearly thirty years of prosperity.

The House of Commons did not distinguish itself on Thursday. General Wolseley and Admiral Seymour, having received orders to act against Arabi, did act, and acted with success. As the action was great, it was needful to reward them with honours and money. Being baronets, they were made peers, and granted about £30,000 each, in the cumbrous shape of pensions of £2,000 a year for two lives. Parliament, of course, had to vote the money, and in the House of Commons all who dislike the war, all who object to pensions, and all who hate Britain, joined together in an ungenerous and unmannerly resistance to the grant. Eighty-five Members voted against Lord Alcester and fifty-five against Lord Wolseley. The whole proceeding is contemptible. To expel the Government for its conduct in Egypt is reasonable, but to support the Government and snub its agents for doing their work so well is almost base. As to the amount of the grant, it is nothing compared with what the country saves by rewarding the Services with occasional prizes instead of permanent pay, and about half the year's profits of several big shopmen. We are ashamed to see sound Radicals so ignorant of the first conditions of efficient State service. If the hereditary principle alone was the object of dislike, why did not the objectors propose an adequate grant at once?

The Queen has hit the West-End butchers a hard blow, by notifying publicly that, in view of the declining numbers of English sheep, lamb will not be eaten this year in the Royal establishment. The higher classes always follow the Queen, the price of lamb has fallen, it is said, 4d. a pound, and as the butchers gain their best profit on this meat, they are proportionately hurt. Householders will not grieve for them, but it is doubtful if the Queen's idea, though purely benevolent, is economically right. If the lambs are allowed to become sheep, there will be more mutton, and more potentiality of producing mutton,—that much is clear. But whether the flockmaster will be equally anxious for large flocks is not so clear. His profit is derived, first, from his wool, which, as Mr. Goschen shows, is horridly cheap; secondly, from his mutton, which is dear; and thirdly, from his lamb, which is extravagantly dear, and in fact makes up for the decrease upon wool. Whether, without this excessive profit on lamb, he has still sufficient temptation to go on, is the question. Buyers of mutton say yes, but the flockmaster says the profit on mutton all goes to the butcher, and that, so far from the stock-breeder growing rich, on the Downs of South England half the sheep are pawned a year before killing, at heavy interest.

To Monday's Times the Duke of Argyll addressed a letter attacking Mr. Chamberlain's last Birmingham speech,—mainly for the sentence concerning Lord Salisbury's wealth as having grown and increased while his ancestors and he slept, "by levying an unearned share on all that other men have done by toil and labour to add to the general wealth and prosperity of the country of which they form a part." Against this comment the Duke of Argyll directs a sharp criticism, which might have been more pertinent if he had fully understood Mr. Chamberlain's drift, which he certainly does not. Of this, however, we have spoken elsewhere. Here we may add that the Duke of Argyll, while admitting that Lord Salisbury has a sharp tongue, and that he himself has sometimes smarted under his piercing shafts, testifies that he never heard the Marquis direct an illiberal attack upon the whole class to which any of his antagonists belongs, or indulge in "allusions to the sources of his adversaries' private fortune alike invidious and unjust." As a matter of fact, the defence for Mr. Chamberlain was that Lord Salisbury's only sympathy appeared to be with the Irish proprietors of the "unearned share," while he had nothing but hard names for another class,—those tenants whose earned share of the value of their property the recent Irish Land Act had just been restoring to them. Mr. Chamberlain's attack on Lord Salisbury was not gratuitous. It was an attack on the class legislator, not on the individual peer.

Mr. Bradlaugh was acquitted on Saturday, after a three days' trial, of any legal complicity in the responsibility for those blasphemies of the Freethinker for which Mr. Foote and his colleagues have been convicted and punished. The Lord Chief Justice in his charge was as fair to Mr. Bradlaugh as Lord Selborne had been in the appeal case of the previous week; and as neither Lord Selborne nor Lord Coleridge feels anything but disgust for Mr. Bradlaugh's peculiar views, we have some reason to congratulate the English Bench on their completely impartial review of the law and the facts of Mr. Bradlaugh's various issues with his accusers. The Lord Chief Justice on Saturday pointed out, in the most emphatic way, that, unless the jury could find proof that Mr. Bradlaugh was directly responsible for the publication of the condemned blasphemies of the Freethinker, it would by no means be enough to show that he might, had he chosen to do so, by the exertion of his authority and influence have prevented their publication. There was no adequate evidence at all that Mr. Bradlaugh had personally authorised the publication of any of these blasphemies, and he was, therefore, very properly acquitted. If the Legislature were only as well able to detach their minds from the irrelevant offences of Mr. Bradlaugh, as the Judges are, the fame of his rank creed and of the indiscreet persecution to which he has been subjected would soon vanish out of the popular view.

We are sorry to find, by a letter addressed to Thursday's Standard, that the authorised report of the Archbishop of Canterbury's reply to the deputation which waited upon him with the remonstrance against the Affirmation Bill,—the report revised by Dr. Benson himself,—ends with a declaration that though he sees nothing intrinsically irreligious in the substitution of an affirmation for an oath, he regards the present proposal to allow that substitution, as objectionable,—apparently because it would remove the obstacle in the Member for Northampton's way,—and that he shall oppose it. Does the Archbishop think that an abstractedly right proposal is transformed into a wrong one, by the fact that it removes an admitted injustice from the path of an unbeliever and an enemy of Christian morality? Or does he suppose that a beneficial change of the law would ever take place, if it were carefully postponed till there was no practical grievance to cry out against?

Eight thousand lay Churchmen, "including several Peers, Baronets, M.P.'s, J.P.'s, &c., &c.," have expressed their opinion that the Bishop of London did very wrong in seconding the Archbishop of Canterbury's dying wish for the peaceable settlement of the feud between Mr. Mackonochie and the party bent on getting him deprived of his benefice at St. Alban's, Holborn. These eight thousand have got Dr. Deane and Mr. Jenne to give them a legal opinion that the Bishop of London had sufficient legal ground for refusing to permit Mr. Mackonochie's resignation of St. Alban's (suggested by Archbishop Tait himself), and also for refusing to institute him to St. Peter's, London Docks; and that, having sufficient legal ground for both these refusals, Dr. Jackson ought to have acted as the Bishop of Manchester acted in Mr. Green's case, and have thwarted the Archbishop's dying effort for the peace of the Church. With all respect to these eight thousand members of the Evangelical Church Militant, we presume to think that a mind so little prepossessed in favour of Ritualism as Dr. Tait's,—we may say, so strongly prepossessed against it,—was much more likely to judge aright when, under the very shadow of death, he endeavoured to retrace steps which he had formerly taken, than any 8,000 of them, though justified by a legal opinion from Dr. Deane and Mr. Jenne, under the annoyance of a party defeat, are at all likely to judge. In the number of counsellors of that kind there is no safety, or if any, only a safe misguidance.

Mr. Childers has given up the proposal for the gradual abolition of the duty on silver-plate. Finding that the trade object altogether to the suggestion of warehousing silver plate in show-rooms under the Queen's lock and key till it should be bought by the public, when the duty would be paid of course by the buyer, and regarding the drawback on any remission of duty which, without some such arrangement of this sort for getting rid gradually of existing stocks, would have to be paid to the trade, as altogether too costly to the public, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has completely abandoned all notion of repealing the duty at present, either in whole or in part. It is a pity. India would certainly benefit greatly by the abolition of the duty; and would the trade suffer so much even if no drawback were paid? They would gain, of course, in the end. Even for the moment, would they lose more than a considerable part of their profit?

M. Tirard, the French Minister of Finance, has brought forward a very weak proposal for converting the Five per Cents., which now amount to £228,000,000. He proposes to reduce them to Four and a Half per Cents., exempt from repayment for five years. The effect of this proposal will be to save £1,140,000 a year, but to irritate all holders of the Fives, who will not only lose income, but will find their stock gradually sinking as the time for repayment approaches. The true way would have been to consolidate the whole Debt in one Three-per-cent. stock, at a fraction above present prices, thereby saving £2,280,000 a year, and giving the holders the advantage to be derived from the gradual rise which any safe stock, once limited, is sure to experience. Huge as the French Debt is, the savings of the people, if order were maintained, would very speedily force it up to ninety, more especially if English investors were to come in, as, but for their chronic panic about émeutes, would happen even now. The late Mr. Bagehot, a first-rate judge, used to say that the French Debt was, for permanent investment, the safest of all, for the stockholders all carried bayonets.

LORD BEACONSFIELD'S STATUE.

SIGNOR RAGGI has done his work admirably, and it is perhaps not, on the whole, to be regretted that the distinction of creating so fine a statue to Lord Beaconsfield should have fallen to an Italian. The countryman of Machiavelli, if he was present at the ceremony of the unveiling, must have been amused to find Sir Stafford Northcote singling out for special remark the one moral feature which, so far as we know, was not only "conspicuous by its absence" in Lord Beaconsfield, but is quite as conspicuous by its absence in the lineaments of that splendid and characteristic statue. "He might be said," remarked Sir Stafford Northcote to his audience, "to have been one of those characters with whom, although they are unlike ourselves, we all so deeply sympathise." It is tolerably certain that Signor Raggi never dreamt of representing the countenance of a man with whom, although he is unlike ourselves, we English all so deeply sympathise. The face with which the great political strategist looks down on London is certainly not one to attract much sympathy from Englishmen, though it is one to fascinate with a certain wondering admiration. Signor Raggi has caught perfectly the attitude of mind in which, as we believe, the whole career of Lord Beaconsfield was lived. That attitude is one of dubious and quizzical inspection of a scene which is but half-understood, but, nevertheless, understood sufficiently for very effective action. Lord Beaconsfield is deeply interested in the people he surveys; he sees much in them of a narrow efficiency; he feels, indeed, more disposed to thank God for their grotesque prepossessions than even to quiz them, though he cannot wholly restrain the doubtful smile into which his lips break as he inspects them; but the last thought which would enter that ingenious and finessing brain, would have been one of sympathy with them, or even one of a kind to which they could give their sympathy, if they would. We do not think that Lord Salisbury shot his arrow quite as carefully away from the true mark as Sir Stafford Northcote. But when he said that Lord Beaconsfield's "whole nature and being were bound up in a desire for the greatness and continued existence of his country," we imagine that Lord Beaconsfield, if he could have listened to Lord Salisbury, would have indulged in one of those dubious smiles. It is quite true, no doubt, that he did set himself to protest against the tendencies threatening "to obliterate the line that divided us from other lands, and which seemed to neglect and to efface the peculiar glories of the English people;" but then, he set himself to protest against those tendencies because he was the head of the Conservative Party, and because that was the aspect of Conservative feeling in which he discerned more of common-sense and significance than in most other aspects of it. He never forgot his own early remark that "it is even the duty of public men occasionally to adopt sentiments with which they do not sympathise, because the people must have leaders." And in this case, no doubt, he held that England, while she remained distinctively English, would be greater than she could ever become as a mere yeast or leaven in the fermenting mass of cosmopolitan life. But whether he ever indulged in that disinterested and passionate desire for the greatness of his country with which Lord Salisbury credits him, we must say that we profoundly doubt. Judging by his writings, Lord Beaconsfield's sympathies were rather with Eastern than with Western peoples, and the interest with which he marshalled the ranks of those peculiarly English country gentlemen, "acred up to their lips," whose army he commanded, partook perhaps in about equal proportions of the interest with which Sir John Lubbock experiments on his ants, and of the interest with which Frederick the Great drove back his flying soldiers, and taunted them with being unwilling to die in his service, ("Wollt ihr immer leben?") Lord Salisbury is not quite as far from the mark as Sir Stafford Northcote, for it is clear that what Lord Beaconsfield really intended to do was to enhance the greatness of the British people. But to say that his heart and imagination were bound up in that achievement, which he undertook because he was the Conservative leader, and because he loved to succeed in his career, seems to us singularly rash in any one who has studied all Lord Beaconsfield's writings, and noted the diffused indications of genial contempt for the British people which they contain.

We cannot, then, concur in the least in the conventional Conservative praise that the late Lord Beaconsfield "rooted himself in the affections and obtained a command over the hearts of the whole British people." Such a boast seems to us to miss the true significance of that great career altogether, as well as to miss entirely the expression of the fine statue which Italian sympathy with Lord Beaconsfield's audacity and finesse has created for our admiration. It is a genuine political diplomatist who looks down upon Westminster, with that wrinkled forehead and that dubious smile, though a diplomatist to whom the characters of individuals, much as they mattered, mattered even less than the characters of large masses and classes of the people. The lesson taught us by the statue is the lesson of the old fable of the horse and the man over again. Mr. Disraeli learnt enough of the English people—whom he never, however, fully understood—to spring into the saddle more than once, and to manage them not without even some grandeur of effect. But his interest in us was, as we believe, more the kind of interest taken by a skilful rider in a horse which he had never thoroughly learnt to understand, than any of a nature to attract to himself a large measure of sympathy such as that with which Sir Stafford Northcote so quaintly credits him. That we were all of us fascinated by the spectacle of his achievements, that we all felt that the interest of our public life was greatly enhanced by the element of Mr. Disraeli's unknowableness—for never did a British Minister have colleagues who were more complete agnostics as to the probable strategy of their chief,—that we all regretted his death as the vanishing from amongst us of a strange and picturesque figure, the secret of whose power we had never penetrated, is certain enough. But just as he was a student of England—with occasional intervals of mastery—to the end, so England in her turn was to the end rather absorbed in studying Lord Beaconsfield than in either obeying him or trusting him. He was a pleasant enigma to us, which we never solved, though we believed—not always wisely—that his power was too much limited by the character of the medium in which it moved, to endanger greatly our safety and our welfare. We do not in the least believe that this attitude towards Lord Beaconsfield has changed in any way since his death. On the contrary, as we look back on his career, its main features come out more significantly. The sudden and unscrupulous change from Radicalism to Conservatism,—the fierce but wholly unimpassioned assault on the late Sir Robert Peel, a mere necessity of Mr. Disraeli's great ambition,—the advice which induced the late Lord Derby "to dish the Whigs" by furthering the progress of democracy, instead of arresting it,—the attempt to make the Indian Empire the pivot of our influence in Europe,—and the profound sympathy with Mahomedanism which breathed through the whole policy of Lord Beaconsfield's last administration,—are understood now as they were never understood before, as indicative of a policy grandiose and imaginative, but wholly experimental and unscrupulous, the policy of a sort of political alchemist ruthlessly trying to turn the English clay to gold, and caring little what risk he might be running by the pretentious pyrotechny in the display of which his unscientific science had embarked him. To our minds, the best lesson which the English people could deduce for their own benefit from that striking and most picturesque career might be expressed in the words of Scripture:—"Be ye not as the horse or as the mule, which have no understanding: whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle, lest they come near unto thee." Lord Beaconsfield put the bit in our mouths and the bridle on our necks, and though we were able to throw off his yoke, we may some day, if we do not grow in wisdom, find a new Lord Beaconsfield whom, once seated in the saddle, we could not again displace.

THE ANNEXATION OF PAPUA.

ON one condition, and one condition only, we can approve the annexation of Papua, and that is, that Parliament deliberately sanctions the act with its eyes open, votes the small necessary sums, and arranges for the government of the island as a Queen's colony. The precedent set by the Government of Queensland in annexing the island on its own responsibility is too dangerous to be sanctioned. We cannot have New Zealand annexing Polynesia, as Sir Julius Vogel officially recommended, or the South-African Colonies claiming Madagascar, or the Canadian Dominion making a spring at Haiti, just because they think those possessions are necessary, or may be advantageous. The foreign policy of this country must remain in the hands of the central authority, if England is to remain responsible for the external safety of her Colonies; and foreign policy is impossible, if we are to be burdened with new possessions acquired without any volition of our own, or in opposition to the will of Parliament. Moreover, Queensland is not the colony to be trusted with a vast island, at least as large as France, with a black population of which we know little, but which certainly exceeds half a million. Her colonists have not the resources for the necessary occupation, even if it is to be accomplished gradually, and have not learned thoroughly the great lesson that in dealing with inferior races, absolute and painstaking justice—which does not preclude strong government—is not only right, but also wise. Slavery is always paid for, either in the demoralisation of the ruling race, or in some war costing more than all the value of the labour stolen from the oppressed. If the Papuans, unjustly governed or made to labour unfairly, break into wars like those waged by the Maroons, who were simply blacks driven mad by oppression, England, and not Queensland, will be called upon for aid, and where she may have to fight she must employ her own civilising agency. It is true that to the bewildering expanse of the great semi-tropical colony, even a vast island like Papua is not an addition such as it appears to Englishmen accustomed to the minute measurements of Western Europe; but still, it is not a mere piece of land, but a place occupied by tribes who, in an imperfect and savage way, can, if ill-treated, fight. England must protect and quiet them, and to protect them in peace, must govern.

While, however, we reject the idea of an annexation by Queensland, we think the arguments for direct annexation unusually weighty. We do not, in our own interests, want any more tropical territory. We have more than we can well manage already, and the picture of sugar-canes and minerals, pearls and edible sea-slugs, drawn by Dr. Robertson, will not inflame the British imagination. There is sugar enough in the world, the Australian minerals are not half worked, and if there were no more pearls or bêche de mer, nobody, except jewellers and gourmards, would ever grieve. Nor do we want any more copper-coloured subjects. We are already responsible in all the continents for some ten times our own number, and, except in India, we have not been successful enough to encourage us in voluntarily seeking for further work. But least of all do we want a position in which we should be thrown into direct collision with Germany or France, under circumstances in which the suspiciousness of our people would give rise to constant panics; and that is the position into which, if we reject Papua, we may be thrown. It is the belief of the Queenslanders, and indeed of all Australians, that if we do not claim Papua, the French, Germans, or Italians, who are regarding all tropical islands with hungry eyes, will seize it, and use it for the establishment of convict settlements. If that is true, a point which the Foreign Office can easily ascertain, annexation is the easier course. Our people, with Germans or Frenchmen established north of Torres Straits—that is, within striking distance of the Australian ports—would always be trembling for Australia, as they now are for India, and would in no long time grow as unreasonably hostile to either of them as they now are to Russia. There would be constant clamour for a stronger Fleet in the Southern Pacific, there would be huge expenditure on fortifications, and whenever a Tory Ministry came into power, the despatch of 10,000 men “to secure Australia” would be represented as an act of vigour. Moreover, the Australians would share these apprehensions in an exaggerated degree, would be moved by every revolution or war in Europe, and would in a few years take upon themselves that hideous burden of the European States, an active foreign policy. We are bound to think for them as well as for ourselves, and to remember that the American Union owes half its progress to the fact that it has no neighbours, and may in practice dispense alike with a standing army and a fleet. It is far cheaper, to use the plainest English, to govern Papua, which can be protected by sea, than to be eternally suspecting France or Germany, and considering every corvette which goes Southward from Cherbourg or Kiel a reason for increasing the British Navy.

This argument of safety might be laid aside, if we were asked to do an injustice, but there is none apparent. We do not, for ourselves, believe that it is best for the savage races to be left ungoverned, for we see that when they have been so left for thousands of years, as in the interior of Africa, they have not only not advanced, but have kept up practices, like slave-catching, head-hunting, and tribal war, directly fatal at once to happiness and progress. If Europe only realised the sum of human misery always existing in Africa, Europe would grow either wretched, or, as is more probable, sanction conquest on a large scale. Granting, however, that the Papuans, who are in the main Negritos—negroes deeply crossed with Polynesian blood—would be happiest left alone, it may fairly be assumed that they will be happier under British rule than that of either Frenchmen or Germans. The French, though they are in a singular and as yet unexplained degree exempt from the pride of colour, are not good masters, and have done little either for the Marquesans, or the Arabs of Algeria, or the natives of Guiana; while the Germans, though as yet they are untried, would probably display a temper very like the Dutch. The Papuans, if they knew the facts, and could vote, would give us a plébiscite, and in doing it, would only be anticipating their own nearly inevitable destiny. There is an element in the question of which no one has yet spoken, because no one now-a-days looks more than ten days ahead, but which is of the last importance to a wise decision. Papua will within two generations neither be English, nor French, nor German, but Australian. The Federal Republic of Australia is a certainty, and when it is born it will claim Papua, even if it has to fight Germany or France. The great isolated Island State, supreme in the South Pacific, will no more bear to see its entrance-gate to the Asiatic world, and therefore to Europe, dominated by a distant Military Power, than the United States would bear France in Louisiana, or Spain in Florida. Dr. Robertson, who last December reported to the Government of Sydney on the necessity of annexing Papua, is probably right in supposing that the greatest city in Australia will grow up on the coast of Northern Queensland, and be the dépôt for all Asiatic produce; but even if it does not, the Straits must remain the grand channel of communication. This is clearly perceived in Australia, where already all the Colonies have petitioned for the annexation, where the Governors one after another are applauding the act, and where the idea of a foreign convict settlement on Papua is regarded with angry horror. The Government, therefore, if it agrees to annexation, will be but hurrying events a few years, and settling peacefully a question which otherwise might have to be settled by an exasperating war. If, upon full consideration, the Government reject the proposal, we shall not blame them, for we have no need of fresh tropical estates, and Australia will soon be strong enough to take her own way in the world; but if they accept, they will save the Southern Colonies from an irksome situation, and the British people from a new source of suspiciousness and unrest. Papua should not be much worse to govern than Fiji, and we have men in hundreds competent to exercise there a wise, a gentle, and a vivifying authority.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL ON “UNEARNED INCREMENT.”

THE Duke of Argyll is over-eager to spring at any one of his former colleagues who errs in the direction of what he deems Radicalism. We do not think that his attempt in Monday's Times to make it appear that the obiter dicta of every Cabinet Minister, speaking as an individual, are the personal concerns of every other Cabinet Minister amongst his colleagues, to be by them carefully weighed, and, if disapproved, publicly disavowed, is at all likely to recommend itself to men of the world of any kind. So far as we remember the earlier Cabinets of the political generation now living, nothing was more remarkable than the indifference of the most successful statesmen in them to the individual expressions of opinion by their colleagues. The notion of Lord Palmerston making himself responsible for every opinion expressed, for instance, by Mr. Gladstone—whose most official utterances he not unfrequently treated with anything but adequate candour and respect—or the late Lord Derby committing himself to all the incidental doctrines developed out of the lively consciousness of Mr. Disraeli, must be, to any one who remembers the history of the Liberal and Tory Cabinets of the last quarter of a century, something positively ridiculous. Read by the light of history, the Duke of Argyll's letter last Monday suggests but one comment,—that the Duke would like to discredit the present Cabinet with the public opinion of this country, and especially to discredit it by holding it responsible for the rasher sayings of Mr. Chamberlain. Whether that rather unchastened desire will improve the Duke of Argyll's standing as a statesman, we venture to doubt. At any rate, while we do not share Mr. Chamberlain's apparent disdain for the historical reputation of Lord Burleigh and Robert Cecil, we suspect that his political economy is somewhat sounder than the Duke of Argyll's, and that the Duke, in his extreme desire to catch Mr. Chamberlain tripping, has rather got out of his own depth in treating the doctrine of what is called "unearned increment."

The Duke's wrath is kindled by Mr. Chamberlain's remark that Lord Salisbury's wealth, like the wealth of most great landowners who have inherited their lands from a somewhat remote ancestry, has grown and increased, while he and his fathers have slept, "by levying an unearned share on all that other men have done by toil and labour to add to the general wealth and prosperity of the country of which they form a part." What difference is there, says the Duke, in this respect, between landowners and any other class? The value of agricultural products, he declares, does not depend more than the value of other products upon the general progress of society. The value of all products depends in some degree on the general progress of society. The labourer's wages rise with the general progress of society,—rise sometimes by leaps and bounds. The capitalist's profit may often rise in the same way. And the Duke might have added that the literary man's success and reward are dependent on the same conditions,—that Lord Macaulay and Tennyson could not have sold their works as they have sold them, to a perfectly uneducated middle-class, and that the Penny Press of the day has been more or less actively appropriating "an unearned share" of profit which is due solely and exclusively to Mr. Forster's Education Act.

Well, all that is perfectly true, but the Duke of Argyll, in referring to the economical doctrine of "unearned increment," has left out the one most important feature of the whole,—the question of the strictness or looseness of the monopoly on which either the exclusive possession, or the gradual distribution of that increment among society, depends. And, indeed, we can hardly exonerate him from want of candour in referring so exclusively to the value of "agricultural" products, which, as he well knows, in a country where Free-trade has prevailed for nearly forty years, present hardly any of the features of the products of a true monopoly. It is not agricultural land, but town land which, for the purposes for which it is bought and sold, presents at the present day in England the features of a strict monopoly, and triples, quantuples, often multiplies within comparatively short periods even ten or twenty-fold in value without any effort of the owner, without the expenditure of capital, indeed without any condition but the application of ordinary foresight on the part of some remote ancestor to "earn" that increment. Now, no doubt, there are other monopolies besides town lands which are absolutely strict and limited. Such are works of art done by hands whose skill can never be approached by any imitator, but they are, on the whole, comparatively few, and there is nothing to be compared with land within or in the neighbourhood of great cities, for the enormous rise in value which accrues to the happy owner during a progressive epoch, without labour or skill of his own. Doubtless, a successful speculator in stocks and shares obtains an advantage of the same kind; only the moment his gains are clearly perceived, they are at once limited by the competition of similar enterprises, which are started for the very purpose of sharing the profits of the mine he has discovered. So it is with "the unearned increment" in that literary profit which the cheaper newspapers owe to the progress of primary education. No sooner does that reach a certain point than other newspapers are started to share their gains, which do succeed in appropriating a considerable portion, if not of the actual gains already achieved, at least of the indefinite increase which might have been achieved, had no such rivals entered the field. The Duke of Argyll is, of course, quite right in saying that in this country,—for near forty years back a country of Free-trade,—agricultural land has not recently risen in value more, perhaps has risen considerably less, than many other kinds of property. It is obvious enough that any owner of funded property who was an owner before Mr. Childers announced his scheme for paying off Debt, must have found himself considerably richer, and richer by an increment which he, at least, had not earned, though Mr. Childers had earned it for him, a few days after that scheme had been announced. But then his "unearned increment" reaches a speedy limit, and is not indefinitely progressive, while the value of a strict monopoly indispensable to the public is indefinitely progressive. The very essence of the doctrine of Mr. Mill that that increase on the value of strict monopolies which is due to the mere growth of population, and to no addition to the intrinsic value of the product itself, is a fair subject for taxation, if you could only find any just standard by which to estimate that increase,—the real knot of the difficulty,—is totally ignored by the Duke of Argyll. No one in his senses wants to deprive any man of the extra value given to his labour, or his abilities, or his ingenuity, or his fidelity, by the general progress of society,—for it is perfectly clear that this extra value is strictly limited by competition, that no sooner is it perceived how valuable it is, than other labourers, other competing abilities, other rival ingenuities, other equally trustworthy fidelities rush into the vacuum; and though they do not deprive the first-comers of their advantage, yet they do prevent them from using those advantages with all the rigour of a strict monopoly. But this is not the case at all with land of which the particular locality,—the proximity to a particular point,—is the essential value. Nothing can increase the supply of such land, while the demand is multiplying rapidly from year to year; and there is no agency in the world by which other members of the community besides the owners, can be made to share the advantage of the leaps and bounds in value which it makes, except a tax; and therefore, could we only provide fairly and without arbitrariness,—which is the great difficulty,—for estimating that enormous and unearned gain, there would be, so far as we can see, no sort of injustice in saying, 'Well, all taxation is more or less of a grievous burden, and it is only fair that those shall contribute most of that burden who have gained exceptionally, without any effort of their own, from the general progress of the community to which they belong.' We quite admit the enormous, we believe the insuperable, difficulty of finding any just standard by which to measure this 'unearned increment.' We quite admit the serious danger of attempting to demand for the State a share in the unearned gain, unless the State is equally willing to bear the burden of corresponding unearned losses. We are not in the least contending for the practical application of Mr. Mill's doctrine to taxation at the present moment, for we believe that application to be at the present moment dangerous and impracticable. But we must point out that the Duke of Argyll, writing as a pure economist, has missed the very essence of the economical question at issue. No one has ever contended that all that a man does not strictly earn by his own labour, but only gains from the progress of society, is a specially suitable subject for a tax. It is most desirable, it is essential to every healthy society, that we should all share freely the advantage of each other's progress; and that is precisely what happens in the rise of wages, in the rise of special profits in special businesses, in the rewards of inventions as they are limited by patents, and so forth. But in all these cases, there is a clear and steady tendency at work which limits the prize accruing to the individual, and which compels him beyond those limits to share it with the rest of the world. That is not true of the value of strict monopolies such as land in the neighbourhood of great cities; nor is it, indeed, true of agricultural land in any country cursed by a strict system of Protection. In both cases the monopolist absorbs the whole "unearned share" instead of dividing it, as public policy requires, with the community at large, and therefore justifies Mr. Chamberlain in contrasting his position unfavourably, as regards public advantage, with the position of those who toil and spin. But that is just the point which the Duke of Argyll absolutely ignores, though that is the pivot on which the doctrine he attacks exclusively turns.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE RATES.

IT is quite natural that the first dangerous division of the Session should have been upon Rates. Rates come home to us all. They are for many classes, indeed for all below the Income-tax level, far heavier than the "Queen's taxes;" they have never been scientifically adjusted; and as they rise with every advance in civilisation, they begin to be severely felt. Moreover, there is just now a certain impatience about them, especially in rural districts. As we have repeatedly warned the Government, the constituencies expected the Ministry to show more energy in reforming local government than they have shown. The electors, it is true, issued no clear mandate, asked for no definite measure, and were, we believe, a good deal muddled as to the exact relation between rates and rural government. But they had for all that a very strong idea that Mr. Gladstone was the very man to put the whole matter straight, to give the counties municipal institutions, and at the same time to propose a Rates Reform which, like his reforms in taxation, should make the incidence of those imposts at once more equitable and lighter. The farmers want to manage their own money; the owners of land and houses do not see why they alone should pay for so many improvements in civilisation, which, like education, for instance, benefit everybody; and everybody wants a readjustment in a system under which, at this moment, the poorer a district is, the more it pays, till Shoreditch is twice as heavily taxed as Belgravia. The electors lump rates in towns, rates in villages, the incidence of rates, and county self-government all together, and with a dim but genuine consciousness of suffering ask from the only man in England who possesses the courage, the influence, and the financial genius to accomplish the task, a radical reform.

The answer of the Government—produced once more on Tuesday night, in reply to Mr. Pell—that it is impossible to do anything considerable towards this reform until the government of rural districts and of London is provided for, is, we believe, quite sound. It is in practice impossible to abolish old rates, and impose new taxes to be expended by local authorities, while nobody knows who those authorities are to be. It is proposed, for example, in some quarters to give up the house-duty, the licence-duty on public-houses, the duties on dogs, carriages, armorial bearings, and guns, nearly £5,000,000 in all, and expend that money in relief of rates for local purposes. But the quota of that money paid in London, probably a third of the whole, would be handed over to nobody knows who, that is, to the extraordinary list of Vestries, Councils, Boards, and Commissions which among them are supposed to govern the Metropolis; while in the counties the money would be paid to the Justices, that is, to men who are not elected by the Ratepayers, or responsible to them. That might be bearable, if the Vestrymen and the Justices were to continue to govern, but notoriously both are condemned. The former are to be superseded by Councillors elected by all London, the latter by Councillors elected by the Unions and other county districts, and the money would, in fact, be paid to ad interim authorities just about to disappear. That would be a mistake, even if the method of taxation were independent of the character of the authorities; but it is not so. Supposing the question that rates are to be supplemented by taxes, upon which we shall have a word to say presently, is taken as settled; the equally large question remains whether the Inland Revenue Board shall levy the taxes and distribute them to the Municipalities, or the latter authorities shall levy them for themselves. There is a great deal to be said on both sides, and something to be said for a composite system, but there is nothing whatever to be said or even thought till we know who the local authorities are to be. One set could be trusted with a Property Duty on the American plan, which, if entrusted to another set, would prove ruinous. It is one thing to allow a steward to pay your bill when you trust him, and another when you do not. The reform of county government must precede reform of rates, even if there were no political necessity for insisting on that order of procedure, and there is such a necessity. The County Reform Bill is a very difficult one to carry. The landed gentry do not like it, and are not likely to like it. The London Bill is also a difficult one to carry. The "City" does not like it, though it may in the end give way. To overcome this resistance, which is backed by the House of Lords, and is in the aggregate most serious, the Government, as Sir Charles Dilke admitted with the utmost frankness, need a motive force, and the motive force is the discontent with local taxation as it exists. Reform that in part, and the motive force will die away, and the Government will be left to encounter the stubborn "interests" assailed, with little or no help from popular enthusiasm and middle-class dissatisfaction with the rates.

It seems to us that this reasoning is unanswerable; but then why is not county reform pressed forward? If it is the condition precedent of all reform, as is clearly the case, why does not the Government introduce its measure, state boldly its whole plan, and insist, under penalty of an appeal to the people, that it shall be carried through? We could not have a better subject on which to dissolve, for, unless we wholly misread the debate, the Government have made up their minds to a proposal of unexpected magnitude, which will burn up opposition like fire. We cannot understand Mr. Albert Grey's speech, which was endorsed by the Government, or Sir Charles Dilke's speech, which is the official utterance of the Minister responsible for local government, or the speech of Mr. Gladstone, who is Premier and more, if the whole Cabinet have not decided on a most momentous change, the substitution as regards all local expenditure except Poor Relief, which always was a burden on the land, of general taxes for taxes levied on rental only. Mr. Albert Grey's whole speech was based on the express assumption that personalty ought to pay its fair share of rates as well as realty,—that, in fact, if we could only manage it, there ought to be a local income-tax. Sir Charles Dilke was still more definite, and, indeed, made a promise which, if the country ratepayers only understood it, would bring them in masses to his side. He said:—"There was one part of his speech with which they [the Ministry] found themselves in much more close agreement. The hon. baronet [Sir Massey Lopes] declared, as the mover of the resolution had previously declared, that persons ought to contribute to local objects according to their ability and means. He agreed with the remarks of the hon. baronet on that subject. There could be no doubt that persons ought to contribute to local objects according to their ability and means, and not only in respect of land and houses. The principle was undoubtedly very difficult to apply, and the manner of applying it always needed deep consideration. There was no difference, therefore, between the Ministry and the hon. baronet as to the principle itself." And Mr. Gladstone said:—"There is a point which I trust those who sit on this side of the House will never forget, in discussing this question. The transfer of rating-charge to the Exchequer, in whatever form it is done, is a question of a transfer from a fund supplied almost entirely by property to a fund supplied in a very large degree by labour. I am far from denying that the general contention on which the hon. gentleman proceeds has truth and justice on its side. We have never denied the principle that there is no call of justice to lay the supply of local wants exclusively on physical property, but this House ought not in the dark to set about clandestinely from time to time and piecemeal, to transfer and hand over to a fund largely supplied by the labour of the country, charges which ought to lie on the property of the country." There can be no mistake about the meaning of sentences of this kind. The Government really intend, if the factions will only let them get to work, to propose, together with a reform of county government and London government, a grand reform of Rates, based upon the principle that, as regards part of the rates at all events—perhaps all rates newer than the Poor-rate—every kind of property is liable, and not lands and houses alone. That is precisely the principle for which every landlord, every farmer, and every poor urban householder has been crying out for the last twenty years. It is as regards many rates, e.g., the education-rate, police-rate, highway-rate, lunacy-rate, and improvement rate, undeniably just. Can anything be conceived more absurd than that a triple millionaire and a Brook-Street doctor should pay equal police-rates, because they inhabit houses of equal size—the case actually happens—and that a hard-driven freeholder of 200 acres should pay the same education-rate as the capitalist who in the same parish is amusing himself with losing money on what he is pleased to call a "home farm" of the same extent? It is the rich man who benefits most, both by police and education, and the rates for them are neither of them, as is admitted by the grants from the Consolidated Fund, liabilities which was purchased with the land or houses. We do not believe that if a working plan for the reform of this evil—a plan such as Mr. Childers could draw, and Mr. Gladstone sanction—were definitely laid before the country, resistance could even be attempted. The County Members would lose their seats, if they tried it, and they know it. So believing, we cannot understand how the Cabinet excuse themselves to themselves and to their followers for their delay, or why they do not place this reform as a whole in the forefront of all their designs. Mr. Gladstone hinted that the difficulty was Ireland, for he could not tax the Three Kingdoms for the benefit of Britain only, and could not be sure that the scheme was applicable to Ireland. We believe he under-estimates for once both the power of justice and the common-sense of the English people. Let him bring forward his scheme as a whole, including Ireland, with power given to Sir Charles Dilke to veto anything monstrous done by a local Board—a power which, as regards the London Council, ought to exist—and he will find that the body of the electors are too heartily in its favour for resistance from any party and, a fortiori, any individual. The excuse about the Budget is only an excuse. The reform need not date till 1884, but it ought to be produced and carried now, before all thought of other changes is lost in the commotion which must be excited by the next Bill for the redistribution of political power.

CONTINENTAL GOVERNMENTS AND SOCIALISM.

WE cannot, we must say, reconcile ourselves entirely to the new form which social improvement is taking upon the Continent. Kings and Ministers have been frightened by the acute discontent of the lowest class, and appear disposed to offer heavy pecuniary bribes for their acquiescence in existing order. We do not deny that they have before them a great precedent, the English Poor Law, which was decreed from above by a domineering Queen and a proud aristocracy, and has, on the whole, succeeded; nor do we deny that an improvement in the condition of the poor is a matter of pressing moment. But we should like to see the remedies come from the people themselves, through their representatives, and not be forced upon them in this way from above. Kings when they make grants are dealing with other people's money, and are very apt to believe that the first object of a State is not to improve the men in it, but to develop in them a habit of acquiescent obedience. Ministers, too, are much tempted under a régime of universal suffrage to buy the votes of the masses at the base of society, without much consideration either for justice or for the principles of sound finance. There is nothing to object to, for instance, in the Message of the German Emperor to the Reichstag, so far as it is a mere exhortation to Parliament to press on "social and economic reforms." The Germans allow their Emperor a kind of paternal position, and are no more affronted by his interference than the English people are by their Queen's counsel to them to abstain for a year or two from eating lamb. But when the Emperor suggests that in order to discuss the social reforms, it will be well to pass a prophetic Budget—that is, the Budget of 1884—and thus to deprive Parliament for eighteen months of its only substantial control, it is impossible not to regard his advisers with some suspicion. Are they anxious about the poor, who are to be relieved of taxes and provided for when sick, or are they planning, through an appearance of such anxiety, to relieve themselves of an irksome and hampering control? It looks very much as if Prince Bismarck, who recently asked for a prophetic Budget, and was refused, had calculated that if he persisted and pleaded the distress of the poor, and the necessity of finding time to consider their case, the Members would be afraid to resist, lest on a dissolution the vote of the lower masses should be thrown against them. If that is so, and the Progressist Members certainly believe that it is so, the German Chancellor is using the social cry not to introduce ameliorations in the condition of the poor, but to secure the support of the lowest class in depriving Parliament of a portion of its power. Suppose that in England, Mr. Gladstone brought forward a Bill containing a grand scheme of Insurance for the Poor, and asked that in order to allow time for that Bill the Executive should for one year remain uncontrolled, should we not doubt his motives? Yet this is precisely what Prince Bismarck has done, at a moment when, as he himself avows, he expects affairs abroad to take a very dangerous turn. He will allege that the Members are not disposed to his Bill, are in fact middle-class men, reluctant to consider the poor; but he forgets or conceals the facts that they are elected by universal suffrage, and that they will not be the more inclined to the poor because they have voted the Budget in advance. He would advance the cause he professes to have at heart much more rapidly by allowing Parliament more control, both over economic legislation and the expenditure. Instead of that, he is trying, with the assistance of the poor, to limit both.

In France, the danger perceptible is of a different kind. The Ministry there does not ask the Chamber to give up any of its powers, well knowing that such an appeal would be hopeless; but it does ask support from the most dangerous section of the people, in consideration of bribes. The Ministry dreads only one portion of the population—the workmen of Paris—and it therefore makes them two offers, one comparatively reasonable, one of a most indefensible kind. M. Waldeck-Rousseau, the Minister of the Interior, is exerting himself greatly to comfort the men of the building trades, who are out of work and inclined to riot. He has, therefore, asked the Crédit Foncier, a company which advances money for industrial undertakings, to advance £2,000,000 sterling for the construction of workmen's barracks, with flats, to be let at £8 a year. This speculation probably will not pay, and as it may be subsequently extended, the Crédit Foncier asked for a guarantee, and were originally promised that of the State. As, however, the Treasury objected to this plan, it was modified, and the Minister now asks the Municipality of Paris to guarantee the loan. That would not be unreasonable or unwise, if the Municipality were free to accept or reject the proposal, but that is scarcely the case. It is elected by universal suffrage, its first object is to keep well with the labourers, and it is quite aware that the project having been pressed from above, the labourers will not bear its rejection quietly. Of course, there is a remedy in the Chamber; but the Chamber is equally afraid of riot which brings soldiers to the front, and so the project will, there is little doubt, be carried through, and the force of the whole State, though not the money of the whole State, will be used for the benefit of Paris alone.

As the Municipality is, in the first instance, to make the experiment, though under a Ministerial impulse, this project may pass; but M. Waldeck-Rousseau intends to go much further. He is inclined, very wisely, to encourage co-operation, and his method of encouraging it is to give great State contracts, by preference, to societies of workmen. Whenever work is to be done, he proposes that "a company" of workmen shall be formed to do it, and when formed shall have this immense advantage over the competing capitalist, that it "is to give no security for the performance of its contract." We are not exaggerating, in any way. M. Waldeck-Rousseau himself made that precise proposal, in those words, to the Commission appointed to consider the subject, and added that, a State contract being of itself a valuable asset, the working coparcenary could have no difficulty in borrowing necessary capital. We never remember to have seen a more dangerous suggestion. It is hardly necessary in this country to show that under such a system the workmen would have a monopoly of contracts, for if they did the work badly nothing could happen to them, and they could, therefore, undersell all competition. They could hardly even be punished for bad work, for the only punishment possible would be to refuse them further contracts, that is, to throw gangs of unemployed and starving workmen on the streets by a direct Ministerial order, and so to reproduce in a most exaggerated form the very danger it is intended to avoid. The Communist idea, that contracts should be abolished and the State do its own work, is better than this, for the State as employer, as experience shows, can, through its right of dismissing individuals, secure very good work indeed. The fault of the English Dockyards and of the French State factories is that they turn out work too good, and, therefore, too costly, for the necessities of the case. M. Waldeck-Rousseau's proposal is not yet adopted, but if it is, it will close State work to private enterprise, and thereby throw thousands out of work, who will form Companies, without capital, give no security, and do the State work, which is to be given to them exclusively, as well or as badly as they please. Moreover, the State will, in a city like Paris, become the great employer of labour, and must always keep its workmen employed, if it be only at polishing shot, under penalty of an émeute in the streets. We suppose, or rather hope, that all these tentatives will end in some reasonable plans for ensuring subsistence to workmen when thrown out of work, and thus diminishing the sense of insecurity which alarms and irritates them; but at present, ruling men seem to have caught only at the idea that the lower classes are dangerous, and that to make them less dangerous, the easiest way is to grant them State or Municipal funds levied by taxation. That is bad political economy, and if it is acted on to any great extent will sooner or later exhaust the resources accumulated by ordinary industry, besides demoralising the workmen, who will speedily perceive that all these exceptional advantages are granted them because they are, in the last resort, the masters of the State. In England, the Socialist proposal is to nationalise land, but it is resisted by all in authority; on the Continent, where they dare not touch the freeholding peasantry, it is to nationalise labour, and authority is visibly giving way.

PENSIONS FOR WAR SERVICES.

IT is unfortunate, though perhaps not unnatural, that the Bill to grant pensions to Lord Wolseley and Lord Alcester should have met with so much opposition. The reasons on which this opposition is founded have a kind of momentary plausibility that is usually enough to catch the votes of some small section of the House of Commons. Some Members dislike the Egyptian War altogether, and why, they say, should they consent, as a matter of course, to burden the taxpayer with rewards to those who carried it to a successful conclusion? Others think that though the war in itself was necessary, a great deal too much fuss was made about it, and the peerages and pensions of the two Commanders seem to them the last and most complete expression of this fuss. Others hold that men should not be rewarded for doing their duty; and what, they ask, has Lord Wolseley or Lord Alcester done more than his duty? Others, again, think pensions a bad form of reward, even supposing reward to be due. The last of these objections we should be quite ready, if it would be of any use, to make our own, though not for the reason commonly alleged. Pensions are a bad form of reward, but not because they burden future generations of taxpayers. That is merely a question for the Actuaries. The nation, it must be assumed, wishes to make a grant which may either be expressed by £2,000 a year for two lives, or by the capital sum which such a payment represents. If it makes it in the former shape, it takes the chances of the pensioner's death, and of his leaving no son. If it makes it in the latter shape, it washes its hands of the whole business at once, and charges the entire payment to the account of a single year. We have no doubt whatever that this last is the best method to adopt. When the grant is first voted, the public gratitude is fresh. The nation knows what services have been rendered to it, and it is anxious to give something in return. But a quarter of a century hence, these services will have passed out of memory. They will be recorded in the histories of the time and in "Peerages," but payments the explanation of which has to be hunted up in books are never very willingly made, and the propriety of continuing them is not unlikely to be called in question. We may hope, indeed, that regard for the national word will never become so weak as to put an end to the payment before it naturally runs out, but even a debate upon the propriety of paying our debts is a thing to be avoided, if such avoidance is within our power. And it is within our power. The present value of an annuity for two lives is a perfectly ascertainable quantity, and there is nothing except habit to prevent us from acknowledging our obligations to Lord Wolseley and Lord Alcester in this way, rather than by pensions. It would have been a very wise move on the part of the Government, if they had brought in a Bill for giving the two Commanders so many thousands down, instead of spreading the payment over an uncertainly and possibly large number of years.

With the objections, however, which relate to the substance, not the form, of the gift, we have no sympathy whatever. Let us grant, for the sake of argument, that the Egyptian War was as unnecessary and as unprovoked as Mr. Labouchere affects to consider it; or that, even if its necessity be conceded, it has been made out to be a much bigger thing than it was. These objections are really objections either to the policy of the war, or to the account which the Government have thought proper to give of it. The proper way of giving effect to them is to turn out the Government which is responsible for what fighting there was, and for the account they thought proper to give of it when it was over. Lord Alcester and Lord Wolseley were not asked whether they thought it right to bombard Alexandria or to take Tel-el-Kebir. They were simply consulted as experts as to what, on the understanding that Arabi and the movement he headed were to be put down, were the right means to take for the purpose. If they could for a moment be held responsible for the ends for which the war was undertaken, there must be an end to armies and to military discipline. What was allowed to the officers could not be denied to the men. Each and all of them would be bound in their several stations to disobey orders which they thought unjust or inexpedient. Every declaration of war would be a signal for a partial mutiny, for there is no war probably which has not furnished some ground in which an ingenious person may find a cause of disapproval. The one question that ought to be raised in connection with the proposed pensions is whether Lord Wolseley and Lord Alcester have played the part attributed to them in bringing the war to an end. The character of the war may be a very proper subject for a hostile motion in Parliament, but it in no way affects the value of the services which Lord Alcester and Lord Wolseley rendered at Alexandria and Tel-el-Kebir. The second class of objectors,—those who protest against what they maintain to be the needless fuss which has been made about our exploits in Egypt,—argue that other and greater exploits have been rewarded with only equal honours, perhaps not even with those. Surely this is not a question to be decided by individual Members of the House of Commons. The Government must be allowed to gauge the service that a successful Commander has done to the State, because only the Government can have the knowledge which makes it possible to gauge it accurately. If a case were to occur, as conceivably, no doubt, it might occur, in which a Government grossly exaggerated the merits of some creature of their own, in order to find an excuse for making him a grant of public money, a mere resistance to the grant would be a most inadequate and inappropriate kind of censure to pass. The real sinners would be the Government, and it is they who should be made to pay the penalty. The pension, it is true, would perish, but it would perish with the Cabinet that proposed it.

The opposition that takes its stand on the asserted impropriety of rewarding men for simply doing their duty, overlooks the system on which officers in the English Army and Navy are paid. That system may be most correctly described as a combination of small dividends with occasional bonuses. The ordinary promotion that lies before an officer who has never seen a battle is altogether inadequate to reward distinguished services in war. Indeed, but for the hope that an officer has of finding himself in circumstances which will give him a chance of rendering these distinguished services, ordinary promotion would hardly be adequate to reward the ordinary routine of a Military or Naval career. Men are found, however, to run this risk—to spend their lives in passing from barrack to barrack and from garrison to garrison—for the pay of an ordinary clerk; or in the Navy, to remain idle for years, in what is really poverty, hoping against hope for a ship, and then to be superannuated, perhaps in their prime, because without this even the slow flow of promotion that actually goes on would come to an end. They do this because the nation prefers to reward them very much on the principle of "No cure, no pay." A mere pittance is gladly accepted all the best years of their life, in order that they may be in the way of honours and pensions on those rare occasions when such things are to be had. This is true of both Services, but it is true of the Navy in a quite remarkable degree. The Army, in time of peace at least, allows a man to remain in England; the Navy does not do even this. To command a ship is probably to be away from home for five years, and then to stay on shore, with half-pay and no occupation, until such time as he is sent to sea again. It is only fair that when a man has an opportunity of earning distinction, it should be such as will at once give him rank and fortune, for that rank and fortune do not represent simply the reward of his specific services. They constitute a prize for which the whole Navy has, in fact, contended, though only one has been lucky enough to win it. The grants and honours are not payments to individuals, but devices for creating spirit in Services to which we entrust the safety and the grandeur of the nation.

THE WORSHIP OF POSITION.

THE Vicar of Selby is a very clever man, who not only loves the process generally known as "taking the bull by the horns," but even the still less common process of challenging a bull which would otherwise shrink from charging at you, to charge at you with its horns. The Church Catechism, he argues, in another column, does mean and ought to mean by your "betters" any one superior to you in station. The old rhyme,—

"God bless the Squire,
And all his rich relations;
And teach us poor people
To keep our proper stations,"

appears to him thoroughly sound morality,—not, of course, that he feels more respect for the mere holding of a higher station than he feels for the worthy fulfilment of the duties of a lower station, but that apparently he despairs of testing the worthy fulfilment of the duties of any station whatever, and takes refuge, therefore, in the regard paid to external appearances as the only feasible mode of fitly recognising some shadow—a very distorted shadow, we should deem it—of the divine order of creation. His argument is that we cannot appreciate intrinsic merit at all, and that no one can appreciate it for us; that rank, genius, talent, beauty, energy, are all qualities more or less inherited, and not earned by any acts exclusively our own; that even wealth, which is a form of power, is usually either inherited or acquired by some specific faculty born with us; and that, therefore, there is no more that is unspiritual in respecting a lord more than an artisan, than there is in respecting a true poet more than a Registrar of births, deaths, and marriages. If we understand Mr. Harper's letter rightly, he regards the relation between a duke and a dustman (say) much as he regards the relation between a mountain and a mound. Both are what it was given them to be, and both are useful in their way; but as it is impossible to avoid having your attention more fascinated by the mountain than by the mound, so it is impossible to avoid having your attention more fascinated by the duke than by the dustman. If honour is due to anybody, it is not for any merit of theirs, but solely for the functions which the long order of the ages has resulted in assigning to them; and so viewed, the functions of lords and millionaires cannot fail to command more interest and more deference than the functions of artisans and paupers. At least, that is how we understand Mr. Harper's terse and vigorous letter, and if we are misrepresenting him, we must ask our readers to turn to it for themselves, and correct our misreading of it.

Now, there are here some most weighty assumptions which we wholly reject. In the first place, we repudiate the notion that we can form no estimate at all of true merit,—in the sense that is, not of the value of human qualities, but of the value of the voluntary use made of those qualities by the trustees of them. We all of us know the difference between the Duke who uses his great wealth as public men should use it, to make the whole community happier and richer by it, and the Duke of whom nobody out of his own set ever hears, except, perhaps, on the racecourse or in the columns of a fashionable newspaper; just as we all know the difference between the artisan who hoards and pushes himself till he becomes a capitalist on his own account, and the artisan who devotes all his leisure to the dissemination of higher habits of life and higher principles amongst his class. Mr. Harper may assert that this very faculty of making the noblest use of the functions into which you naturally enter, is itself only a finer gift of a higher kind; but if he pushes that doctrine to the farthest point, he will find himself denying, what we are sure he would never deny, the ultimate distinction between good and evil altogether, or rather, resolving the distinction between good and evil into the very different distinction between beautiful and ugly, or between pleasant and unpleasant. As a matter of fact, we do not doubt that men discern pretty fairly the difference between the talents into the use of which their fellow-men enter, and the account to which they turn those talents. If so, then in the highest sense we call our "betters" those who turn to the best use the talents,—whether rich or poor,—which they are free either to improve, or to keep unused, or to abuse, and we refuse to regard as our "betters," whatever may be their position, those who seem to us to have notoriously abused their talents, whether those talents were small or great.

That, however, touches but a minute portion of our difference with Mr. Harper. Let us admit that it is a task of great difficulty, about which the world makes the most gigantic mistakes, to discriminate between that part of human conduct for which the agent is really morally responsible, and that part which flows naturally from some intrinsic gift or quality of character and position. Let us admit even, for the sake of argument, what we really deny, that any such discrimination is impossible, and that the only tangible distinction is between the actual circumstances and qualities of men. Still, we should deny altogether that external differences of position represent differences in the esteem or honour due to those who hold them in the same sense in which specific talents, or knowledge, or affections, or even tastes of the higher kind represent such differences in that esteem. Mr. Harper says that the honour a man should give to his father and mother represents simply "the better position in which God's providence has placed them towards him, because towards him they are so largely God's representatives. Honour God's representatives is the underlying principle of the Fifth Commandment, and of all the Church Catechism's instances given in explanation of it." That means, we suppose, that during the first period of their relation the parent is in a better position to know what the child should do, and in a better position to enable him to do it, than the child is to know or act for himself, and that the honour to be accorded by the child rests upon the assumption of that higher knowledge and power in the parent. That we take to be perfectly true, as explaining the attitude of mind in which honour to the parent should begin. But then, in this case, the external difference does signify a very great advantage in power and knowledge, in him to whom the honour is due; and no one in his senses would deny honour to superior knowledge and power, to say nothing of the love which should be inspired by the tender use of that knowledge and power in the parent. The honour here is given to real superiority, first of knowledge, next of power, and lastly, if these are properly used, of care and love. We say the same of the honour due to Kings, Presidents, and Ministers,—indeed, to all who occupy a position of official dignity. Honour is due to them, in the first instance, because from their position they have more knowledge and power than those who are not in such a position; in the next place, if they use that knowledge and power well, because gratitude is due to them for using it well. But we want to know why the respect properly due to greater knowledge, larger power, finer talents, higher tastes, simply because all men are greatly benefited by the use of these qualities, is due to mere superior station, which represents nothing but rank and wealth. If you grant, indeed, that rank means descent from men of great gifts, and that with the descent some share of those great gifts has come down, then honour to rank is intelligible enough. We all honour those whom Mr. Galtton has produced as instances of the partial inheritance of great qualities, in so far as they have actually evinced those great inherited qualities. Unfortunately, however, many of the Peers of this country have inherited their name from men at least as remarkable for bad as for good actions, for poor qualities as for great qualities, and we fail to see the least reason for according special honour to such as these.

And then Mr. Harper goes on to argue that even wealth implies power, and is entitled to the same sort of honour as official power. Well, when wealth has been accumulated by its actual owner, it undoubtedly implies power of some sort, though it may be power so little creditable to the owner that one would much rather be without it than with it. In those cases, however, in which it does imply nothing except energy, shrewdness, perseverance, constancy of mind, without any admixture of mean quality at all, it is clearly entitled to honour, and gets it in much larger measure usually than it deserves. But is this a reason for yielding honour generally to those who are richer and more comfortable than ourselves? In seven cases out of ten at least,—if so few,—the rich have done nothing towards creating their position for themselves, and have really no advantage over the poor, except the advantage perhaps,—if it be one,—of an easier life and less carking cares; while the poor in their turn have all the advantage which a keen sense of self-dependence and of the absolute necessity of effort gives, by way of compensation. It would not be hard to say which class of advantage is the greater. We do not doubt at all that social position and wealth taken alone, and without the powers necessary to gain them for oneself, are minus quantities, which should count for social disadvantage,—we do not say dishonour, because dishonour is not the mere deficiency of honour, but implies moral culpability,—in the estimate of a rational-minded man. Conceive two men of the same calibre of mental and moral qualities in every other respect, one of whom has leisure, a peerage, and £10,000 a year, and the other, heavy professional duties and £1,500 or only £500 a year, and to our mind there would usually be more "honour" in the position of the latter than in the former. The Vicar of Selby's delight in a lord as a lord, is to us, we confess, unintelligible. There are some men in that position who are deserving of the highest honour, many who deserve some honour, more who deserve a little, and a good many who deserve none at all. But looking to the use made by the average English Peer of his rank and wealth, it would never occur to us to feel special honour for him. We suspect that the average standard of life achieved by the Professional class in general is worthy of a great deal more honour than that of the average peer, and for a very simple reason, that the life of toil and duty not self-imposed is much more suitable to the average Englishman, and much better calculated to bring out his good qualities, than the life of leisure and of duties which, so far as they are acknowledged at all, are imposed not by the pressure of circumstances, but by the free choice of the individual. We may charitably join in the prayer for God's blessing on the Squire and all his rich relations, but less because they have earned our blessings, than because they are likely to stand in much greater need of them than those who occupy a so-called inferior station below that of the Squirearchy.

ANOTHER MAMMOTH MILLIONAIRE.

THOSE who watch the new Mammoth Millionaires now coming forward in such numbers from America and Australia, say that one definite reason for dreading them is their incapacity for spending their fortunes in amusing themselves. A man who has made twenty millions sterling, say, by vast "corners" in Railway shares, finds that unless he goes on making money, or is one of those fortunate persons who can continuously devote themselves to an object, the excess to which his fortune transcends that of other rich men is of very little use to him. He can, of course, get out of it all the personal luxury, in the way of fine houses and good eating, and purple and fine linen generally, that he may happen to wish for, but in those things there is for him no special satisfaction. Anybody with, say, £50,000 a year, or other bread-and-butter fortune of that kind, can buy all the personal luxury he can enjoy, including in some places social deference; and the mammoth millionaire wants something more. He wants to feel the value of the difference between his resources and those of the merely rich, to do or enjoy something which they cannot attempt. Elephantine amusements may be amusing, but they are only elephantine, and he is a mammoth, wants larger trees to crash through, a bigger forest to browse in, a deeper swamp in which to gambol and roll. In a little planet like ours this is not easy to obtain. He desires, like the rest of us, to utilise his special advantage, which is the command of the modern form of the wishing-cap in a degree to which no one else can pretend, and it is difficult to wish for anything that nobody with a smaller cap can get. He can travel about if he likes, travel very pleasantly; but so can the ordinarily wealthy man, money beyond a certain amount adding little either to the enjoyment or the conveniences of travel. The present writer was travelling once on the track of an Empress, and was so inconvenienced by her wealth that he watched to see what it gave her. It was very little indeed, nothing compared with what she obtained from her European rank. When crossing the Alps, she swept up for two days in advance every available horse, engaging at one point no less than eighty; but she could only sit in one place in one barouche, and moved, on the whole, no quicker than other people. The huge suite seemed to be merely a burden, choking-up the roads, calling forth tiresome crowds, and sometimes creating wearisome delays. There was a physician, for instance, who actually fell ill, to the loss of eleven hours. The Empress upset the travelling arrangements of a great line for three days by her requirements in the way of a special train and extra precautions; but any one rich enough to hire a saloon-carriage for himself, and pay for a pilot-engine in front, a matter of less than a pound a mile, would have travelled with just as much of personal enjoyment. The Empress's rank, no doubt, helped her greatly in opening inaccessible castles, attracting experts as ciceroni, and securing her near Naples a paradise to live in which no money would have purchased; but the command of millions of itself procured no more than thousands would have done. As to creating a grand place—the idea which Edgar Poe puts into the head of his imaginary millionaire—it is to be done, no doubt, with skill and judgment; but when the colossal once enters into an enterprise of the kind, it becomes unenjoyable. No private man would be happier even in his own thought for creating a Versailles, and short of Versailles, half a million well laid out will do all that is required. To "found a family," in the English sense, is in America or Australia impossible; and a great estate gives comparatively little influence, and, beyond a certain limit quite attainable by any rich man, no particular pleasure. What is the use of owning square miles when nobody will "cap" to you, or vote for you, or recognise your greatness in any way that is not half-hostile? Of course, if the mammoth millionaire is a collector, he can make a mammoth collection; but when once you have acquired all the snuff-boxes, or jade bowls, or fine cat's-eyes to be procured, a thousand more specimens add very little to your gratification. A collection loses its charm when it is magnified into a museum. Besides, all these things cost comparatively little. They can, any one of them, be done to any reasonable extent by a man with a hundred thousand a year; and we are talking of the new millionaires, to whom that income seems respectable poverty. The true Mammoth Croesus is forced to accumulate by the difficulty of getting rid of his money, and soon finds that really to use it with a visible result adequate to the power expended, there is no way except to increase and increase his business operations. That is the reason why, in America, he continues his trade; and why his son, with still greater wealth, will be tempted to continue after him, and to keep on rolling up the snowball, till smaller men declare, as they are declaring now about the Railway Kings, that its bulk is becoming dangerous.

Here is Mr. Jay Gould, for example, the greatest of "operators" in railway and telegraph shares. After making his first "pile," which was not enormous, he had the luck to fall-in with Jim Fiske, and the self-restraint to bear with the vulgar egotism with which that extraordinary character, the only perfectly vulgar man of genius we can recall, irritated all his other associates. Fiske used, it was said at the time by his biographers, to spend hours in Jay Gould's room pouring out plans, till his cooler-brained comrade stopped him to say that some one was worth working out. The suggestions of the daring speculator tripled Mr. Gould's fortune, and when his comrade was killed, he had the sense to use it in speculations which excited less popular hostility than the famous "Corner in Gold." He devoted himself to what was really a hunt for monopolies, the purchase of so many shares in great undertakings that he could raise or depress them almost at pleasure. It is hardly possible, if a man possesses immense means, a head for figures, and ordinary financial courage, not to make money in that pursuit; and Mr. Jay Gould, who is personally, we believe, by no means the worst of his kind, possessed, among his other resources, the element we call luck, and which is, we suppose, in business an intuitive perception of the direction in which profit lies. His monopolies paid him on a scale adequate to his risk. His last stroke was, we believe, to possess himself of a supreme voice in a great part of the telegraph system of the Union, and that turning out well, he suddenly declared that he felt content. He had, the American papers say, amassed twenty millions sterling; and though that may be an exaggeration, there is good reason to believe that he possesses fifteen millions, invested in railway shares, telegraph shares, houses, and other fairly safe securities, returning on an average seven per cent. He recently showed his friends ten millions sterling in shares which he must have possessed for years, and may very well now possess £15,000,000, invested at seven per cent. That is a million a year, after allowing £50,000 a year to pay for competent managing agency, and is three times the nominal fortune and probably five times the available fortune of the richest English nobles, while it is unburdened by those obligations in the way of pensions, necessary establishments, and over-numerous residences which hamper wealthy Sovereigns. What is Mr. Jay Gould, at, we suppose, forty-eight years of age—self-made millionaires in America run younger than in Europe—to do with that very large wishing-cap? He does not want £5,000 a year for himself, he has never sought political power, and he is not a philanthropist. The papers say he is going to see the world in a very comfortable way, that is to say, he is going to visit all places on the sea, in a steam yacht large enough to carry his wife and numerous younger children. He is to be absent three years, and to see everything accessible by water, from London and Naples to Yeddo and Honolulu. He will doubtless see Paris also, and possibly Benares, and other places worth a few hours of discomfort in a railway-carriage. Well, that is, in a way, worth doing. Most of us would like to steam about over earth, at our own will, in a roomy vessel, hampered by nobody, with infinite means of purchasing curios, with the power of leaving pleasant impressions everywhere, and with no sense that the journey would be in any way costly or embarrassing. To see our whole planet, small as it has become, and most great cities on it, in a leisurely, pleasant way, with no rush to catch trains, and no crowds to get through, and no worrying heat, and no special exertion, is as enjoyable a way of spending eight per cent. of one's active life as could well be imagined; and we do not know that, for Mr. Jay Gould, there would be any waste of time. He will learn more in a yacht than in Wall Street, and be taught more by savage tribes, in clothes and out of them, than by New York brokers in gold and shares. But the journey will make no impression at all upon that fortune. Whatever the size of the yacht, £2,000 a month will keep it going, and if we allow four times that sum for purchases, benefactions, and needless outlays of all kinds, we have still only an expenditure of £100,000 a year; and Mr. Jay Gould's trip will, in fact add to his wealth, without any exertion of his own, £3,000,000 sterling, or, at the American rate of interest, an additional income equal to that of a first-class English noble. That is the dangerous specialty of these huge fortunes in personalty, accumulated in countries where dividends are still high; they grow like the prophet's gourd, or children of fifteen. Every day he lives, Mr. Jay Gould has only to do nothing—to sit and muse in his yacht, for instance—and he is a richer man by £2,700, in America a large professional income. Nothing but gambling on a gigantic scale, gambling involving a loss of more than £2,700 every day for years on end, could even appreciably affect such a fortune; while in a generation, by merely investing its interest safely, it could be brought up to a sum the possessor of which could in six months master all the great English railways, or secure immovable ascendancy in the Bank of England. Mr. Jay Gould will probably, being a tired man, do nothing great whatever, or even outré, unless, indeed, he should take it into his head to march up the Congo Valley with an adequate escort to the other side of Africa—£1,000 a day would do that—and live afterwards in American memory as one of the greatest of explorers. That feat would, we think, wipe out the memory of his financial history. But with younger men, wealth like his would speedily produce satiety, and with satiety the hunger to realise the impossible which tormented Nero; and some day or other, one of them will do something which will force the world to acknowledge that the power which resides in wealth, if accumulated in one hand, is as dangerous as any other power. A man with fifty millions is not only a King, but a despot. Imagine a Jay Gould with the ideas of an O'Donovan Rossa, and give a reason why that ghastly suggestion involves an impossibility.

THE FASCINATING SIDE OF SELFISHNESS.

IN the suggestive collection of "Passages from the American Note-books of Nathaniel Hawthorne"—a book which adds interest to all the author's other books, because it gives us a peep into the workshop where they were constructed—there is one sentence at which many readers must have paused to make a mental note of interrogation. It is a sentence which seems to declare that mankind at large has made a mistake concerning a matter about which mistake appeared impossible,—not a matter of argument regarding which we may be misled by reason, or of external fact which may be misapprehended by sense, but of emotional sensation itself. The matter in question is the effect produced by Selfishness upon those who suffer from its manifestations, and there appears little to be said concerning it that would not at once win universal assent. That selfishness is a universally hateful quality seems a maxim not only true enough, but true enough for a copy-book heading,—one of those ultimate facts of human nature which are too well established to need defence, and, indeed, too obvious to need statement. And yet, in spite of this universal consensus of feeling, Hawthorne, in the sentence of which we have spoken, boldly and unreservedly utters the apparent paradox that "Selfishness is one of the qualities apt to inspire love."

Concerning the nature of the special thought that was in Hawthorne's mind when he made the general statement expressed in this enigmatical sentence, we can only form conjectures, which are necessarily unverifiable. The "American Note-books" were, in the main, a storehouse of hints for future elaboration, and many of them were actually elaborated in his finished works. This, however, is not one of the many. So far as we can remember, Hawthorne never returned to the idea of which this note is a memorandum rather than a record; and it therefore remains a riddle, to which we have to find our own answer. The first impulse of the reader is naturally an impulse of contradiction; the statement seems to demand not interpretation, but denial. Nothing, at the first blush, seems more certain than that selfishness is the one quality which is absolutely fatal to love. Irritability or violence of temper, instability of emotion, egregious folly, ingrained dishonesty, repeated unfaithfulness, and various forms of vice, all try love to the uttermost; but numberless facts prove incontestably that it may maintain life in spite of them, because it is possible for any of them to exist in company with that genuine affection which the most abandoned seldom give without getting a return in kind somewhere. But selfishness is exclusive of this, for when fully developed, it is not merely a love of self, but such an absorbing self-love that it simply leaves no room in which any other affection can grow. If there be in existence a single person in whom selfishness is absolutely supreme, the tenderest emotion of which he can be capable is a feeling of mild complacency in those who contribute to the satisfaction of his desires, and so help to make up the pleasantness of his life. Being thus incapable of feeling love, he seems equally incapable of receiving it; we see no crevice in his nature through which tenderness can enter, no outgrowth around which affection can cling.

Still, we are inclined to think that there is a solution to Hawthorne's enigma, a valid defence for his apparent paradox. Selfishness is one, but its manifestations are many; and while the naked quality is always repellent, it is possible for it to attire itself in clothing which shall be positively attractive. Of course, in the majority of cases, it does not so attire itself. There is, for example, nothing to attract in the selfishness of the cold-hearted man whose resources are within himself, who has not enough interest in others either to feel their claims upon him, or to make claims upon them; who does not rob his neighbour, but when the neighbour has been robbed by some one else and lies bleeding on the highway, quietly passes by on the other side. A man of this kind has often many of the sterner virtues, and receives accordingly his tribute of respect; but a warmer feeling does not visit him, and if it did, he would probably close his door against it. Even less is love drawn out by that vulgarer form of selfishness with which we are most familiar, and which is generally in our minds when we use the word. It is not only aggressive, but is often brutal in its aggressiveness. It totally and openly disregards the rights and tastes of others, and is always asserting some real or fancied rights of its own; always setting up its own tastes as the standard by which those around must regulate their lives. No one can mistake it; it puts on no veil, for if its end be attained, it cares nothing for the unsightliness of the means. It is possible that a man whose ruling characteristic is of this type may have love bestowed upon him—indeed, some of the most pathetic tragedies of life arise from such bestowal—but he does not win the love that he receives; it is a free gift, or rather an offered sacrifice, and in no sense is it true that the selfishness inspires the love.

There are, however, other forms of selfishness, so cunningly veiled that they often pass without recognition; or if the veil do not altogether hide the ugly reality beneath, it so transfigures it as to give it an inexplicable charm. If the word might be applied to a being in whom the moral sense is quite undeveloped, we might say that a very young baby is the most absolutely and frankly selfish of mortals. It insists upon every desire being gratified, and cares nothing whatever for the inconvenience or even the pain that such gratification may entail upon its vassals. And yet the person who suffers the most from these demands, the mother, is the person who loves the most; and it is not fantastic, but quite reasonable, to attribute the unique intensity of her affection to the very constancy of these demands, to her recognition of the fact that the little life is sustained in health and happiness only by the warmth of her heart and the activity of her hand. This is the explanation of the double sense of the word "care," when used as a verb. It is in caring for her baby, in the sense of taking care of it, by protecting it on every side, and allowing it to know no unsatisfied want, that she comes to care for it so intensely in that other sense of being drawn to it by affection; and it is, indeed, impossible to find a genesis for the peculiar love of the mother, unless we can trace it to the mother's pains and burdens.

Now, there are men and women who throughout their lives play consciously the part which the baby in the household plays unconsciously. They pose as the poor, helpless, unprotected member of the social circle, the baby of the family; and if the rôle be skilfully maintained, the results are frequently the same as in the case of the long-robed tyrant of the cradle. They manage, like him, to impress the surroundings with the feeling that from them nothing is to be expected, but that to them everything is to be rendered. They are not, like the exigent little morsel of humanity, vociferous in their demands; but they have a quiet way of taking it for granted that every one wishes to do just what they desire to have done, which is as effective as the baby's wrathful cry or mournful wail. Few people who find themselves thus credited with an unfailing store of self-abnegation can refrain from an endeavour to live up to their reputation. "This afternoon," says the student, "I ought to write the chapter of my book for which the printer is waiting; but I know poor Mary expects me to offer to take her out, and it would be brutal to disappoint her." "I should like to go to the concert to-night," says the young girl, who hardly ever has an evening's enjoyment; "but if we all go out, there will be no one to read aloud to Uncle Edward while he smokes his cigar, and I know he will be hurt." And so poor Mary and Uncle Edward get their own way, and are, moreover, thought of pityingly and tenderly as people who need to be "compassed about with sweet observances," and who suffer keenly when they are withheld. True, they suffer in silence, but there is a look of disappointment which is harder to bear than any words of reproach; and how cruel to call it up, when it can so easily be kept away! And so, out of pity and the multitude of little services which pity prompts, springs a genuine affection, of something the same kind as that of the mother for the baby. Love, indeed, is not given for love half so often as it is given for musical tones, and soft touches, and sweetly-urged claims. Affection tends to fix itself, not upon those from whom we receive gifts, but upon those who receive gifts from us. The irresistible appeal, made, not with rude demand, but with touching confidence, calls out the most generous part of our nature; the best and noblest of our capacities—that of sweet self-renunciation—becomes inextricably associated with them; and as they become bound up with our loftiest ideal, they become the recipients of our purest love. With no feeling into which the thought of self does not enter, they attract the ardent affection of unselfish souls, and their very demands are the weapons with which love is conquered.

There are people in whose lives selfishness assumes another disguise, which equally justifies Hawthorne's statement. They are people of the pure, pleasure-loving nature, refined and sensitive, with keen æsthetic appreciation, and an intense delight in all harmonious and tranquil life. Really caring for no pleasure but his own, the man who belongs to this species is too tremblingly alive to be able to feel pleasure while in view of pain. He will, if need be, sacrifice everything and everybody to the satisfaction of his tastes, but of these tastes the most noteworthy is for a life of Epicurean calm. The storms which surround the course of the aggressively selfish man would mar his keenest delights; it is absolutely essential to his happiness that his social atmosphere should be peaceful,—stirred by gentle breezes, but never agitated by tempests. To secure this, he must be pleasure-giving as well as pleasure-getting, the giving being, indeed, a needful preliminary to the getting. To scatter gladness among others is not more truly the aim of the benevolent man than it is of the man of whom we are speaking; but with this difference, that in his case it is not an end, but simply a means to the supreme end,—the making of his own life comfortable.

The man who is not only selfish, but sensitive, must consider others, must endeavour to make himself and the circumstances over which he has control pleasant to them. This is simply a necessity of his nature. Pain of all kinds is distasteful to him, and as his finely-made organism compels him to feel the pain which he sees, he must needs exclude pain from his presence. The unjust judge of the parable was a specimen of this type, though an imperfect one. When the woman came with her pleading again and again, he said,—“I will grant her request, lest by her continual coming she weary me.” Her happiness was nothing to him, until it was brought into a certain definite relation to his own. Had he been a more typical example of the species, he would not have waited for repeated demands; had his sensibilities been more acute, they would not have needed the stimulus of importunity; he would have seen and foreseen the whole state of the case, would have yielded graciously to the first and least pressing request, and so would have won a rich store of ungrudging gratitude and humble affection. For in these matters people are, perhaps happily, very easily deceived. If appearances be pleasant, they are not careful to look for an unpleasant reality behind them; and if they get kind words and considerate actions, if, indeed, they get nothing but pleasant common-places of courtesy uttered in feeling tones, they are ready to give their hearts away, with a full belief that there is a heart waiting to be taken in exchange.

Though Hawthorne did not elaborate his own hint, it has been elaborated by other writers of fiction. Charles Dickens and Alphonse Daudet, in their portraits of Harold Skimpole and M. Delobelle, have done justice to the selfishness which cunningly plays the part of the grown-up baby, and ingenuously casts all its cares upon other people; and in Tito Melema, George Eliot has given us a subtle and veracious study of the other and more complex type of which we have spoken. Tito is an admirable embodiment of Hawthorne's thought. An inferior author would have told us that Tito was fascinating and loveable, but the value of George Eliot's portraiture lies in the subtle manner in which she enables us to feel his power, and to analyse the elements out of which it was evolved. She has shown us how his peculiar attractiveness was the inevitable result of his peculiar form of selfishness. Absorbing pleasure, he must needs radiate it, and his mere presence brought indefinable satisfaction. The account of the early days of Romola's love for him enables us to realise the true nature of this gift, and to understand something which is almost unsusceptible of expression, save by actual representation. The nearness of such a joyous, joy-loving nature gave to Romola's life a light and colour it had never possessed before, and she could not but love him who had glorified her world for her. And yet “the trail of the serpent was over it all.” She, like Baldassarre, found out the truth, when the finding could bring only pain. She found that the pleasure he gave, in so far as it was a conscious gift, was given simply for the sake of its reflex action upon himself. He was glad to diffuse delight, because it made his world delightful. He could not keep pain away for ever, but he would do so for a time; he would make the most of the noon, and ignore the inevitable night. When brought to bay, his selfishness came out in its naked repulsiveness; and, unable to gain any new delight from the contemplation of her delight, he never hesitated to purchase safety at the price of her pain.

When a woman like Romola is attracted by a man like Tito—and attracted she surely will be, if he cross her path—there is a tragedy in preparation. The veil of superficial graciousness cannot long hide from some eyes the features behind. A really great nature will sooner or later see through it, and then, save for the strongest, there is nothing left but despairing faithlessness. Smaller souls—souls like Tessa—may be deluded for ever, and in their delusion will be happy; but for Romola and Baldassarre there is a great blank in the universe, and their poor consolation is that woe has brought wisdom, and that they have learned the lesson of Hawthorne's paradox.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE AFFIRMATION BILL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE “SPECTATOR.”]

SIR,—The proportion of the Clergy of the Establishment who are “Liberal” is undoubtedly a small one, but I hope and believe that the large majority of that minority are heartily at one with the opinion expressed in the Spectator of last Saturday, namely, that there is a deep religious motive in doing plain, political justice; and further, that that religious motive should be all the deeper, when the act of justice involves the fair treatment of one whose views on several subjects are personally odious.

The determination, therefore, of the Government not to make the Affirmation Bill retrospective, though probably a good party move, does not commend itself in any way to my religious sense of the justice of the case. The very essence of Liberalism seems to be bound up in this question of the Affirmation Bill, and the mere accident of the Northampton electors' choice has brought it to a focus. What is Liberalism, unless it means that civil liberty shall not be conditional upon religious belief? What is Liberalism, if it attempts to fetter constituencies in their freedom of election?

Then, too, another and quite distinct consideration influences me in giving any support in my power to the principle of the Affirmation Bill, and that is the usually profane character of all oaths. Having had several years' experience as a magistrate before taking Holy Orders, I can honestly say that I do not believe that one in twenty of the oaths taken before me were prayers. Putting aside all cases of perjury—and perjury in alibi cases at petty sessions is very common—what can be a greater insult to the Deity than the lip-smack of the Holy Gospels, and the heedless repetition of the set phrase by the tongue of the average policeman or gamekeeper? If “So help me, God,” is not a prayer, it is at the best an “idle word,” for which the utterer will have to give account. Anything, therefore, that tends to lessen the repeated breaches of the Third Commandment, that are, alas! so common in our Courts, whether of petty session or of the High Court of Parliament, ought, I think, to receive the warm support of a religiously-minded clergy.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE REVERENCE FOR RANK AND WEALTH.

SIR,—Out of,—

"God bless the Squire,
And all his rich relations,"

I made most of my sermon this morning. With your leave, I should like now to make a letter out of it. I, for one—or, since every one represents a class, let me rather say we—very much like to have "our betters" to look up to; and by our "betters," we mean not merely men of more merit than ourselves—how are we to determine that, or who is to determine it for us?—but those who by birth, office, rank, power, yes, and riches (a very effective form of power) are in a better, that is, a superior, position to our own. Why should a man honour his father and mother? Not, surely, for his judgment as to their better merits, but because of the better position in which God's Providence has placed them towards him, because towards him they are so largely God's representatives. Honour God's representatives is the underlying principle of the Fifth Commandment, and of all the Church Catechism's instances given in explanation of it. We (my class-fellows and I) are well content that there should be superiors and inferiors, were it but that without them the world, to use Dr. Johnson's phrase, would be so "mighty flat." And as to a scale of superiority according to men's personal merits,—what are personal merits? It is no merit in a man to have been born of a great family. Is it any more a merit in him to have been born with great talents? Is it any more a merit in one man that he is a born orator or a born poet than it was sin in that other man, whom the Disciples inquired about, that he had been born blind? And in like manner, as to great natural energy and industry, or, in women, as to great beauty. To all of these alike applies St. Paul's question,—"What hast thou that thou didst not receive? Now, if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory as if thou hadst not received it?"

"Honour all men." Yes, for all are God's representatives. But St. Peter does not say, honour them all to an equal extent. To respect a working-man, as such, is very well; we do it, and delight in doing it. But to respect a lord, as such, is equally well,—nay, more than equally. We would not walk into a snail's shell without first knocking at the door, any more than into Windsor Castle. But the Castle has limits larger than those of the shell. And manifold damage would be done by cutting up the Castle into snails' shells. The mound and the mountain, as portions of the entire earth, are of one nature, and scarce differ in dimension. Yet it is a long look upward to the mountain from the mound.—I am, Sir, &c., F. W. HARPER.

Selby Vicarage, Third Sunday after Easter.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Can your correspondent, Mr. Hume Elliot, or his friend the Wesleyan minister, tell us the name of the squire mentioned in the former's letter to you dated the 9th inst.? Was it by any chance Sir Joseph Bowley? Sir Joseph's biographer states that Lady Bowley introduced pinking and eyelet-holing among the men and boys in the village, as a nice evening employment, and had the lines,—

"Oh, let us love our occupations!
Bless the Squire, and his relations;
Live upon our daily rations,
And always know our proper stations," set to music, on the new system, for them to sing the while. Surely the squire in question must have been Sir Joseph Bowley, or else the young Wesleyan minister was cruelly hoaxing your correspondent.—I am, Sir, &c., C. A.

IRISH EMIGRANTS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In answer to the letter in this week's Spectator, I may say that lately I went from this to Moville, in one of the tenders, with 500 emigrants on board, and can testify that it at least was a "thoroughly cheerful occasion." I was deeply interested, and watching closely, but did not see a tear shed, either by the emigrants, or their friends assembled to see them off. I felt the scene sad and solemn, but, I believe, was only joined in this feeling by one grey-headed man, who was saying good-bye to some of his family. Instead of "sorrowful lamentations," handkerchiefs were waved, hearty cheers were exchanged, and I heard many laughs and jests.—I am, Sir, &c., Londonderry, April 16th. GRIANAN.

BOOKS.

MR. FOOTMAN ON MODERN UNBELIEF.*

THIS is perhaps the calmest, the most courageous, and the steadiest effort to look modern unbelief in the face which we have yet had from a clergyman of the Church of England. Inadequate, of course, Mr. Footman knows it to be. The limits of two lectures of this kind are confessedly inadequate to state fully the most critical points either of the unbelief of the day, or of the reasons against that unbelief. We ourselves should have insisted on some points under both headings as of primary importance which Mr. Footman has ignored altogether. We should have assigned a somewhat different proportion of value to other points. But differences of judgment on matters of this kind are absolutely inevitable, and we never differ with Mr. Footman without feeling that his judgment may be weightier than our own. There is in his little book a steadiness and a resolution to see the worst of his opponents' case, and to see it without hysterics or affected horror, which gives us the greatest confidence in his judgment. And in his "reassuring hints," though he omits some heads on which we should have laid great stress, and insists more on others than we should have insisted, he never takes a weak point, or, to use Sydney Smith's old simile, attempts to keep out the Atlantic by trundling his mop.

In noticing this book, we can but give, first, an instance of the manly and vigorous way in which Mr. Footman faces the facts of unbelief, then, of the pertinence and thoughtfulness with which he meets the principles of that unbelief; and, finally, say something of points of the case which, even in his short review of the subject, we wish that he had not ignored. It would be hard to sum up the modern argument against divine design in Creation, we think, more forcibly than Mr. Footman manages it in the following pages:—

"Do you not think, we may say, that there is evidence in nature, including the structure of our human frame, of design, of a purpose? Were not, for instance, the lungs adapted for respiration? No, says Professor Clifford, in a popular essay, or Sunday lecture, 'you must distinguish, you must not argue as you would about the design of a corkscrew. A corkscrew was made by man with a purpose in his mind. No one made our lungs. The respiratory apparatus was adapted to its purpose by natural selection (i.e., by the gradual preservation of better and better adaptations, and the killing off of the worse and imperfect adaptations).' This is 'an unconscious adaptation.' This is said in a lecture delivered to hundreds, printed and lying on the drawing-room tables of hundreds. Not only so, Mr. Bradlaugh, in the twentieth thousand of a pamphlet just published, points out that in his opinion the argument from Design does not prove the creation of something out of nothing, because all you have is the adaptation of what are already pre-existing substances. He quotes, too, in this same paper (twentieth thousand) from a man who did much to popularise materialism, G. H. Lewes, 'There is not a single known organism which is not developed out of simpler forms. Before it can attain the complex structure which distinguishes it, there must be an evolution of forms which distinguish the structures of organisms lower down in the series. On the hypothesis of a plan which prearranged the Organic World, nothing could be more unworthy of a supreme intelligence than this inability to construct an organ at once, without making several tentative efforts. Would there be a chorus of applause from the Institute of Architects if such profound wisdom as this were displayed by some 'Great Architect' of houses? One of the great characteristics, you see, of our modern unbelief is that it finds for itself a popular voice with such amazing rapidity. Therein lies its danger to men for our time. It is hardly out of the lips of the student before it is in the ears of the multitude. The philosophical speculation, especially if it have in it a dash of an ironical innuendo, is so soon thrown in as a 'new light' among the passions and prejudices of the crowd. We miss no small part of the significance of the situation, if we ignore this most striking acceleration of the pace at which the sceptical, the atheistic, the anti-Christian ideas are moving from class to class in this one generation. But I have quoted this arraignment by Lewes and Bradlaugh of the processes of Infinite Wisdom, not only because it seems to me (circulated as it is by tens of thousands) to be one of the most dangerous and deadly of the weapons of Atheism, but because it leads me briefly to notice that Pessimism which would destroy all one's joy in the works of God, and in the old tradition that the earth is full of the goodness of the Lord. It is very important in this respect to notice how thoroughly the method of attack is changed from that of the Deistic controversy of the last century. Then it was the glorification of Nature, in order to depreciate the arguments for the need of a Revelation, with which Christianity was assailed. Now, we find ourselves depreciating Nature, and finding in her alleged imperfections and apparent cruelties an argument against the benevolence or against the omnipotence of God. One is reminded of the assertion of a once distinguished lawyer, circulated in a widely-read magazine article after his death, that there was so much pain and misery in Nature, that if he knew she were about to perish, and if, by lifting his finger, he could save her from annihilation—he would not lift it. One is reminded of the doctrine of Schopenhauer that the world is the worst of all possible worlds, and that annihilation (almost equivalent to the Nirvana of Buddhism) is the highest end of man. One is reminded, too, of a more popular philosopher, Hartmann, who determines, not with a yawn of ennui, but philosophically, that existence is in itself an evil, in proportion as its range is larger and you know it more. The whole constitution of the world (so stupidly does it work) would be an unpardonable crime, did it issue from a power that knew what it was about, which, of course, upon the Materialistic theory, it does not. But one is reminded, still more forcibly, of that tremendous indictment which Mr. Mill (a still more popular philosopher) brings against Nature, in the first of these celebrated and widely-circulated essays, which contain the explosive shell with which my Cambridge friend threatened me some years ago, as certain to be thrown into the Christian camp. 'In sober truth,' says Mill, 'nearly all the things which men are hanged or imprisoned for doing to one another, are Nature's every-day performances.' And let us remember, this short but trenchant sentence is a fair specimen of the conclusions of the whole paper. In short, I know not in the whole range of English literature a more tremendous catalogue of charges against Nature, than that which this essay contains. It will take a good deal of preaching to undo its effects on men, and yet it cannot be ignored with impunity."

* Reasonable Apprehensions and Reassuring Hints: Being Papers designed to attract Attention to the Nature of Modern Unbelief, and to meet Some of its Fundamental Assumptions. By Rev. Henry Footman, M.A., Vicar of Norton, Lincoln. London: Field and Tuer; and Simpkin, Marshall, and Co. 1883.

Nor do we think it would be possible to meet the force of that statement more powerfully and wisely than Mr. Footman meets it, in the corresponding passage of his second lecture:—

"The thought of the pain, of the apparently undeserved and hopeless and useless suffering of which this earth has been for countless ages the theatre, is a thought which generates harassing and harrowing questions, as to the goodness of God; and apart from the Revelation of God in Christ, I must own I know of no answer to those questions, no answer which even hope itself can seize on as completely reassuring. I suppose that each man has some difficulty, some thought which weighs at times very heavily, and which he feels as too heavy to be rolled off without the aid of the Christ who has redeemed him. Such a difficulty, such a heaviness assails my own mind at times when I think of the indifference, the apparent cruelty, the devouring maw, of Nature's laws. As a Christian, indeed, I can afford to look at this awful thought steadily and often. Nay, if I want words to express my sense of the incubus which seems to lie upon the Universe, and which suppresses at times the Hosannas of rapture, I can find none so apt as those of the great Apostle, when he tells us that 'the whole creation groaneth and travaileth together in pain until now.' But at the same time, I must candidly avow that, on the ground of 'Natural Theology,' I am frequently embarrassed as I think of the problem which it sometimes ventures to solve, that of the Character, the Nature, and the Disposition towards the sentient Creation of the Eternal God. This being the case, I shall revert to this painful and difficult matter again, in the second division of this paper, in which I shall have to bring into prominence the more strictly Christian aspect of the whole subject. In the few remarks which follow here, we shall try to offer only the considerations which Natural Theology seems capable of affording or suggesting on this point to her students. In the first place, I think we learn from contemplation and study of Nature, that the production of pleasure, or of the pleasing or soothing sensations of which animal life is capable, is not a paramount object of its Author and Governor. As things are now, and as things have been so far as we can trace them back, the process of creation and of development seems too terrific to permit us to rest in what I may venture to call the Hedonist view of God. Neither does it seem to me that Nature indicates that the paramount object of its Creator is the preservation of individual sensitive existence, except for a very limited period, nor even that of any one type or species, except for a correspondingly limited period. If no being can be called good in whose works and ways one or other (or both) of these ends cannot be discovered as their final cause, then I do not see how from Nature alone you can say that God is good. I speak with great diffidence, with great deference, but so far as I can see, the law which is paramount, and the furthest reaching in Nature, is the one which combines into one decree these two clauses: 'Be fruitful and multiply—slay and eat.' And the main object, if I may venture so to construe in inadequate language the apparent object of an Infinite Mind proclaimed in facts, seems to be the production, through sacrifice, of higher life out of the death of the lower. The more I read and think and try to observe of 'Nature,' the more deeply does this view of God's work in Nature seem ingrained in me. This may at first seem rather a melancholy conclusion, and it certainly does add a sadness often to my daily life, even to my daily meals, but it adds, too, a sacredness to them, and helps me to find an answer to my friend who asked as we sat down to feast together, 'Why should this act of all others be made religious in this arbitrary way by "grace?"' If then this be the teaching of Nature as to the end of its Creator's work in her, we can see how readily she lends herself to the charge or the suspicion of cruelty or indifference to suffering,—especially in the ears of those who go to Nature with a feeling that if her god were good and benevolent there would be no pain inherent in her system at all. On the other hand, if we fully recognise the purpose which, as I have said, Nature seems to lead us to infer is paramount in the mind of her Author, we shall be very much struck with the immense and incalculable amount of happiness which prevails in the sentient creation at any given moment, and which has prevailed upon the earth through countless ages of prehistoric times. The feeling which will then attend our contemplation of Nature will be one of wonder that a design and a method which, prior to experience, we should have said must be attended at every turn by individual suffering, and must have almost excluded pleasure from the universe, should yet have been executed in a manner so wise and so kind as to have filled the earth with such a vast aggregate of pleased and enjoyable existences."

The difficulty in this suggestion is not to understand how pain may and often does minister to the higher life of those who unquestionably have a higher life than that of pleasure or pain, but how the almost intolerable pain of creatures which, so far as we know, have no such higher life at all, and which suffer in a manner which does not even admit of their transmitting a nature annealed by endurance to their posterity,—the pain, for instance, of the giraffe flying through the desert with a panther draining its life-blood firmly seated on his back,—can be even subsidiary to a higher purpose at all. We can see that a destructive instinct does answer good purposes in the evolution of the higher nature, and that it is not easy to conceive the existence of such an instinct, in such a world as ours, without some consequences which are purely grievous, such as the long agony which individual creatures may suffer in the act of dying. But the experience which we have of sacrifice which is healing, ennobling, the very highest thing we can conceive, can hardly reconcile us to instances of lonely animal suffering which are absolutely unknown to all creatures except the victim itself, and which leave no moral trace in the universe when the suffering comes to an end. Nevertheless, it may be fairly said that the knowledge which we now have of the immense value and meaning of sacrifice in the higher planes of the moral world, should make us hesitate to dogmatise on appearances even in the cases where suffering seems to answer no end at all. Little as we know of the ultimate end of animal life, we are founding an argument on our ignorance only, when we assume that there can be no after-life for the lower victims of innocent suffering, no after-life in which the mere endurance of great suffering may answer some considerable purpose, such as we often see it answer in the higher world of human consciousness. A priori, one would have supposed that the higher and more sensitive the nature, the worse would be the evil of suffering. As we know that this is false in the case of man, to the secrets of whose nature we have a real access, it would be very rash to assume that in the case of those creatures to the secrets of whose nature we have no real access, no good purpose is answered by the sufferings they undergo. At all events, Mr. Footman's suggestion puts the matter in its true light. Undoubtedly, the first purpose of the Creator has not been the production of happiness, but the production of something to which happiness is quite subordinate; and only those, therefore, who can assure themselves that the production of happiness is the only legitimate end of moral action,—an assumption absolutely contradicting the teaching of Revelation,—are in a position to arraign the Universe as a failure. We may add that any one who can feel sure of such a doctrine as this must be one of the poorer thinkers of the world, and not worthy of much intellectual respect.

And now let us say a word on the few central points which, as it seems to us, Mr. Footman has ignored, on both sides of the picture. And first, we think he has laid too little stress on the materialistic, as distinguished from the agnostic, view of Nature. It is quite true that the two views are inconsistent; that you cannot first plead that there is no such thing as "cause" at all,—that "cause" is an illusion of the mind, and can mean nothing but "invariable antecedent,"—and yet appeal to the primary physical forces of the universe as the sole and sufficient causes of all the intellectual and moral life which appears to come out of them. The two views are perfectly inconsistent, it is true. It is also true that the former or agnostic view is, as Mr. Footman has duly perceived, much the more formidable philosophical form of doubt of the two. But we believe it to be for popular purposes far the less effective form of doubt. A truncated, inadequate cause,—like material force,—is much more intelligible to the popular mind than Hume's agnostic view that "cause" is an illusion, and that we know really nothing in the world in the nature of causes except uniform antecedents. The real explanation of creeds like Mr. Bradlaugh's and those of the Freethinker is not Hume's philosophy, but the idolatry of material force, the picture of the Universe as an iron chainwork of physical destiny from which no atom, and no mind,—mind being assumed to be nothing but an inexplicable backwater of atomic forces,—can escape. It is this which overawes the popular imagination. It is this which drives men to regard themselves as mere puppets in the hand of some over-mastering power which, though itself unintelligent, enslaves the intelligence to which it has unwittingly given birth. It is not science as a thinker like Mill understood science, but science as the ordinary mechanician understands it, which so subdues the imagination of men as to charm away that consciousness of true inward power which, whether it be exerted or not exerted, is either exerted or not exerted at their own discretion. And just as Mr. Footman has more or less ignored the fatalistic side of the popular materialism, so it seems to us that he has ignored the true antidote to it, in that ineradicable consciousness of man's power to change his own destiny which dispels the dream of fatalistic materialism, and shatters, in thousands of millions of places at once, the iron framework of the Materialistic as well as of the Agnostic creed. Mr. Footman insists admirably on the absolute knowledge of personal identity as confuting the agnostic philosophy which disowns all knowledge of true Being. We wish he had insisted also on our equally unconquerable belief in the power of the will either to resist or not to resist the solicitations which so often beset us,—i.e., in our power to make our destiny other than we actually shall make it, and in our former power to have made our destiny other than we actually have made it. To any one who can eradicate—as some Necessitarians fancy that they have eradicated—this belief, either the agnostic or the materialistic fatalism is, of course, credible; to him who owns that he cannot eradicate it without weaving a thread of positive insanity into his moral life, every sort of fatalism and every kind of final agnosticism becomes incredible. Dr. Chalmers's idea of the divine cause as the one root of all-embracing law—so much admired by Mr. Footman—seems to us to approach dangerously near the Pantheistic fatalism which philosophically annihilates man, in order to make more of God. Another very strong confutation of materialism of the vulgar kind is to be found in the unquestionable facts more and more thoroughly verified by science every day, as Mr. Gurney and Mr. Myers are proving, which show that intelligence often works, where there is no physical organ of intelligence,—no brain and body present to explain it.

Another point on which Mr. Footman might, we think, with profit have enlarged more than he has done, is the strong testimony of human language to an origin of human nature in something not below, but above man. If, according to Hume and the sceptics generally, the words 'cause,' 'duty,' 'liberty,' 'effort,' are full of illusion—if the chief duty of philosophy, in fact, be to explain them away, and show how much less they mean than they are popularly supposed to mean—may we not fairly ask how, then, in the name of all that is reasonable, words grew into our language which filled it with a mystery and idealism and a sense of the supernatural, for which there was absolutely no ground,—why, if human words come only as the stammering utterances of animal life awakening for the first time to its own powers, and groping after something like rational self-guidance, they embarrass us with a whole heaven of divine obligation and a whole philosophy of inverted significance, for which there is no basis? It has always seemed to us that the testimony of those little words 'why,' 'because,' 'will,' 'must,' 'can,' 'ought,' to a class of notions which, if they represent pure illusions, could hardly have got into our minds at all, is decisive as against the philosophy either of pure agnosticism or pure fatalism. These, however, are mere suggestions of central points which we think Mr. Footman might have improved his manly and thoughtful survey by including within his range. None the less, we recognise gratefully the vigour and candour of his two papers, and recommend them to the Clergy of all denominations as worthy of their respect and emulation.

DIARIES OF PRINCESS AMALIE OF SAXONY.*

FREQUENTERS of the Royal Theatre at Dresden before 1870 must have been familiar with the figure of an old lady who, on most nights when a good performance was given, could be seen sitting in an armchair in the royal box. Occasionally, plays were acted that bore the author's name of "A. Serena," and then spectators would send friendly glances up to this lady's seat; for she was none other than Princess Amalie of Saxony, who, under this pseudonym, wrote a series of comedies and dramas. Many of these hold their own to this day on the boards of the German stage, while five were ably translated into English by Mrs. Jameson, as excellent pictures of German social life, and yet another six were translated anonymously some years after. And good pictures of German life they are, for the author, princess though she was, laid the scene of her plays, with few exceptions, in higher circles; and she certainly caught the tone, reproduced the conditions, the modes of thought and feeling, that characterise the German middle class, with surprising fidelity. On the death of this princess, there were found among her papers twelve large volumes of journals, kept from her childhood till shortly before her death, thus extending over nearly seventy years of the most painful, but most interesting period of German history. By permission of the present King of Saxony, Robert Waldmüller, the accomplished poet and novelist, has been allowed to publish extracts from these diaries, and a very attractive book they form. The period of the Napoleonic disorders in Europe were the times when the saying is more than commonly true, that "uneasy lies the head that wears a crown." We know much of this from the historical point of view, but it has hitherto been little given to us to know how the prominent sufferers in the drama felt, what they thought and experienced. Here, in the diary of this intelligent Saxon princess, we encounter an often laconic, but most graphic presentation. Were the volume not otherwise interesting, it would be interesting on this account alone. But it abounds in attractive features, in the pictures it gives of the life of the times generally, of the simplicity mingled with rigid etiquette of the Saxon Court. Moreover, the Princess was a great traveller; she visited Italy ten times as guest of her sister, married to Archduke Leopold; she visited Spain, to stay with her sister Josepha, Queen-Consort of Ferdinand VII.; she came in contact with most of the notabilities of her day, and a brilliant galaxy of names gleam across her pages. Goethe, Napoleon and his Marshals, the little King of Rome, Louis Napoleon, Charles X., three Popes, Cardinal Antonelli, Nelson, Metternich, Washington Irving, Scribe, and many more. Indeed, in an idle moment, the Princess once amused herself with summing-up the famous people she had known, and the famous people she had visited; the former number amounted to 472, and the latter to 398.

Princess Amalie was the eldest daughter of Prince Max of Saxony, brother to the childless King Anton, whose wife became a mother to her and her brothers and sisters, when an early death deprived them of their own. Their home was the royal palace at Dresden, and here, in the midst of a Court distinguished by its love of culture, the Princess early imbibed that taste for music and literature that led her to exercise her powers in both arts, and eventually to become something more than a distinguished dilettante in one. She was allowed to remain unmarried, though various eligible partis were offered to her. She did not wish to share the fate of most princesses, and enter upon marriage without love. In one of her dramas, with evident reference to herself, she makes a princess say to her royal mother,—“I have been permitted intimately to gaze upon the majesty of the Throne from early childhood, and it can neither tempt nor dazzle me.” Her simple, direct, amiable nature is further reflected in another passage from her plays. She makes her heroine say:—“There is other happiness in life besides that found in love.” “And what is that?” “Pleasure in the joys of others.” The same unadorned straightforwardness characterises the diary of the Princess.

Amid the wealth of material contained in this volume, we can only dip here and there. It is amusing to read that Prince Max was one of the first persons to have his children inoculated. Princess Amalie narrates how they were kept three weeks in quarantine in a separate building, their parents being only allowed to speak to them through the window. The operation was regarded as most serious, the doctor handsomely remunerated, and, in accordance with the taste of the time, a memorial “repos” was built in the Park, bearing the inscription,—“Dis au promeneur, que tu n'existes qu'en mémoire de l'inoculation heureuse,” &c. The Princess was only twelve when Napoleon occupied Saxony and visited Dresden. With heart and soul she was attached to the German cause, and so were her brothers and sisters. Herein they differed from their Royal uncle, whose fidelity to Napoleon was, later on, to cause annoyance to his family. The girl notes the various victories of the Emperor in tones of despair in her diary. In 1809 she had to fly with her family from their capital, the first of several such sad journeys that they were forced to take during the ensuing years. To the privations they then suffered, the contact they had with common life, the Princess ascribed her knowledge of conditions outside the charmed circle of a Court. Many a night she had to sleep on straw; on the first occasion they were thankful to get shelter in some wretched rooms, and to sleep upon chairs. During the conference of potentates held at Dresden in 1812, the Princess frequently saw Napoleon. Of his impatience she has preserved a characteristic anecdote. "On May 25th," she writes, "boar-hunting at Moritzburg. Napoleon found the déjeuner too long, so he said quite suddenly, 'Que l'on serve le dessert,' which was at once done, so that the roasts were never brought on, much to the annoyance of Aunt Elizabeth." A few months later, the family were once more seeking safety in flight, suffering much bodily discomfort and yet more mental torture from the contradictory and disquieting rumours that reached them from Saxony. In June, 1813, they were back in their beloved Dresden. "Heaven grant this may prove my last flight journey!" she writes, a wish not to be fulfilled. For the time being, Napoleon was more master of the situation than ever. He had taken up his temporary abode in Dresden, and ruled in autocratic fashion. At his State banquets, held in honour of his victories, he insisted on the presence of the whole Court, the gentlemen placed on one side of the room, the ladies, including the Princess, on the other; all obliged to stand and watch the tyrant dining. Napoleon's day was kept with great pomp. The Princess wonders if it be an omen that the firework initials "N. and M. L." become accidentally extinguished on the Elbe. Napoleon himself communicated the news that he was about to wage war against Austria to the Princess Theresa, the wife of Prince (afterwards King) Antony. Very characteristic is the story of how, when she came into his presence, she found him standing on one leg and kneeling with the other on a chair. In nonchalant fashion, he addressed her with "La Princesse Thérèse sera fâchée contre moi, parceque je fais la guerre à sa famille, mais elle doit y être accoutumée." "On ne s'accoutume pas à ces choses-là," replied the lady, with firmness and presence of mind. The reply scarcely pleased the Emperor. This time the children of Prince Max did not leave Dresden, and Princess Amalie became acquainted with all the horrors of war in close proximity. Of the misery that prevailed in the city she furnishes a touching picture. Dying soldiers were to be met staggering in all the streets. Even the royal conservatories were full of wounded. Bread ran short, the captives suffered the pangs of starvation, and wherever it was possible they would let down their caps, gloves, or whatever else they could turn into bags, and solicit alms from the passers-by. The royal family were absolutely cut off from all intelligence. Not till October 27th did they hear from a journeyman that Napoleon had been defeated at Leipzig, and even then the news was so mere a rumour that they dared not credit it. Once again the family of Prince Max had to seek safety in flight, and nearly two years were passed by them in Prague, shunned by their equals as allies of the French, whom in fact they detested as cordially as the other European Sovereigns did. This pained the Princess exceedingly. On learning the entry of the Allies into Paris, she notes,—"If only he has not set them some trap." "The peace vexes me," she records afterwards, "for France remains larger than before." When Prague illuminated in honour of the event, she writes:—"It was a splendid spectacle, but it hurt me, so that I left the windows. All are glad, for all there is peace, but we alone are pursued and shunned." She wept so much for the fate of her country and its king, her uncle, that she injured her eyesight, and could not read for a time, and scarcely write. She even took the bold step of inditing a private letter to the Emperor of Russia, entreating him to intercede for her beloved uncle, "Hélas!" she says, "s'il faudrait une victime, je me devouerais volontiers aux malheurs qui menacent ma famille, pour l'en préserver." She does not say, and probably she did not know, that the preservation of Saxony after the overthrow of Napoleon was chiefly due to the diplomacy of Talleyrand. Very interesting is the account the Princess gives of the first meeting of the Emperor of Austria with his daughter, after Napoleon's abdication. She calls it "terrible." "For the first moment, the two stood opposite each other like statues. Then the little one began to play with the Emperor's sword, upon which father and daughter wept. After the peace of 1814 the family continued to live their quiet domestic existence, writing and acting plays and operettas. Various marriages of the younger members brought about festivities; the quaint ceremonies that took place are recorded by the Princess.

Of the various visits paid by her, that to the Court of Madrid is the most entertaining. She paints most humorously the medley of etiquette and informality that characterised it. Thus, when the family dined en famille, "the princesses appear in the deepest négligée, the Infanta generally with her hair in curl-papers; no one waits for any one else, everybody helps himself without ceremony." By way of greeting, the members of the family only address each other by their Christian names. "When many of them come into the room together, this sounds like some litany," writes Princess Amalie. The whole tone of the Court appears to have been touched by this strange mixture of ancient formality and modern innovation, and the taste displayed was equally bizarre and confused. The aristocracy cared only to witness translations from French melodramas; Calderon was played solely to an audience of workpeople. Grotesquerie in every shape and form was eagerly cultivated by the better classes, with some strange results. Thus the Princess tells of a house that was built in the Chinese style; an obelisk stood in front of it, upon the roof sat a statue of Dante, the principal salon was painted like the inside of a ship, the bed was an organ that played when lain on, and so forth.

In 1850, after a happy and varied life, divided between literature and friends, the Princess had the misfortune to lose her eyesight. An operation partially restored it, but she had to save her vision, and the entries in her diary become scantier. The war of 1870 broke her heart. She had lived to see another Napoleonic war against Germany; she remembered too vividly the sufferings inflicted by the first; she could not share the Army's hopes of victory. On September 18th she was gathered to her fathers.

SIMCOX'S HISTORY OF LATIN LITERATURE.*

A DOZEN years ago a good history of Latin literature was one of the most marked desiderata of the student. There was no work even professing to give a complete survey of the subject which showed any considerable literary power, or which could claim to be at all abreast of the best current knowledge. Since that time, several attempts have been made to fill the gap. Teuffel's history has been translated with fidelity, if not with elegance, by Dr. Wagner; but invaluable as Teuffel's work is for its conscientious and laborious collection of facts and references, there is probably no Englishman living who has read it through, or who would not shudder at the thought of doing so. Mr. Cruttwell has published a careful and scholarly work, and Dr. Schmitz a not less scholarly but slighter sketch, which are well adapted to meet the needs of the classes of readers for which they are severally intended. But still, there was room for a fuller treatment of the subject from a different stand-point, and Mr. Simcox was warranted in assuming that his labour would not be wasted, if he once more took up the theme. His work is, indeed, its own justification. It is not easy to determine what should be the limit assigned to a history of Latin literature. If we include all the literature written in the Latin language, we run out into the infinite (as Aristotle has it), and find ourselves committing trespass on many an alien field. On the other hand, if we limit it to the classical literature commonly studied in our schools and colleges, we exclude not a little that is of great importance, both for the history of human thought, and also for the proper understanding of the literature as a whole. Mr. Simcox has hit the happy mean in the line which he has drawn at Boethius. He is thus enabled to trace the literature of Rome, not only through its stages of development and decay, but also in its temporary revival with fresh vigour, after a period of barrenness; and to show his readers how the old forms were remodelled to express the new thought of the early Christian writers. Thus not only Fronton and Gellius, but also Jerome and Augustine are brought within his view, and he does not pause until the feeble productions of writers like Eunodius and Maximianus have made it plain that "it was time that Latin literature should retire into the cloister, that Latin civilisation should become a memory." Over all this wide expanse Mr. Simcox guides us with the firm step of one to whom the ground is really familiar. It is quite refreshing, in these days, when the claims of many forms of literature, to say nothing of the rival urgency of science, are so distracting, and when we have to be content too often either with second-hand compilations or with the monographs of specialists, to find an author who has plainly read largely for himself, and who is giving us his own fresh impressions. His knowledge is, of course, more complete in some departments than in others, and there are some striking instances of inequality of treatment, of which the writer is himself not unconscious. There is also one serious fault, which a critic cannot leave unnoticed, and which may as well be disposed of, before we pass to the pleasanter and not less imperative function of appreciation. Mr. Simcox professes to have written in order "to do something towards making Latin literature intelligible and interesting as a whole to the cultivated laity who might like to realise its literary worth, whether they read Latin or no." He has, therefore, avoided all parade of learning, and page after page is to be found unadorned with a single reference. For the benefit of the student, he has prefixed to each volume chronological tables, giving the dates of all important writers, and the principal contemporary events, with remarks appended as to the best MSS. and editions. This only supplies to a very small extent the means for verifying statements made in the text. But it is a more serious fault that the tables have been revised with such great and, considering the available subsidia, such surprising carelessness, and the information given is so capriciously distributed, that they often prove most untrustworthy guides. The date of Cicero's study at Rome under Molon (here called Apollonius Molon, which, if we may trust Strabo, is the name of "two single gentlemen rolled into one"), is not that accepted by the best authorities; nor is there any reason to suppose that Cicero wrote "four books on rhetoric, of which the two now extant (De Inventione) form part." No remark is made as to editions of Cicero, Cæsar, Sallust, or Horace; for Livy the student is sent only to Drakenborch, which, with all its merit, is far inferior in its text to Madvig, and for practical use to Weissenborn, pronounced, by no incompetent judge, one of the best editions of any classic. For Ovid, Burmann is named; with Merkel for the text; but no notice is taken of Riese, of Haupt for the Metamorphoses, or Palmer for the Heroides. For Propertius, again, no edition is named, though Hertzberg's edition is a perfect mine of learning; Paley's is an excellent book, and Palmer's one of the most brilliant contributions to contemporary scholarship. Umpfenbach's Terence is ignored; and so is all the work of Baehrens. One of the most eminent of the German Latinists, selected as successor to Ritschl at Leipzig, appears under three different forms. Ritter's edition of Tacitus of 1864, and Schaefer's of Pliny's Letters of 1868, are unlike unknown to us. Nothing is said of Studemund's Gaius, or of Hertz's Gellius. Under A.D. 416 we have the enigmatical statement, "Osius dedicates his Rivellas : Teubner, Leipzig, 1871," of which we cannot offer even a conjectural interpretation. These things ought not so to be. They leave an impression of carelessness, which, it is only fair to add, there is little or nothing in the text to confirm, and ought to be carefully corrected in a second edition. A gentle protest may, perhaps, be allowed against the undue neglect of the linguistic side of the literature. A reader would hardly gather from Mr. Simcox's pages that Virgil was one of the most accomplished artists in words to be found in any literature. He would certainly learn nothing of the idiomatic vigour of Plautus, or the fresh and tender grace of Catullus at his best; nor would he suspect, at the other end of the scale, what a queer, mongrel diction it is that in Apuleius has to pass for Latin. We may note in passing, too, that nothing is said of Quintus Curtius, of Columella, or of Celsus, all three writers quite as much deserving mention as many who are fully discussed. But when all deductions have been made for occasional slips and for inequalities of treatment, the book remains a highly creditable piece of patient and intelligent work, and a real contribution to the history of literature. Mr. Simcox strikes us, indeed, as somewhat less happy in his treatment of poets than he is when dealing with prose writers. In his desire to avoid the sin of gushing enthusiasm, he appears to have occasionally forgotten that the duty of a critic is quite as much to teach us what to admire, as what to censure. Thus he gives a clear analysis of the argument of the great poem of Lucretius, and points out with great acuteness its weak points as well as its strong ones. He says, very justly:—

"The six books on the Nature of Things deserve more attention than they have always received, as a very fresh, vigorous, and earnest contribution to the formation of opinion; it (sic) is quite as able, as interesting, and as telling, as many of the great books of the eighteenth century, which, eighteen hundred years hence, are likely to seem as preposterously incompatible with true knowledge as Lucretius seems now. . . . As a thinker, Lucretius ranks with men like Vico, rather than with men like Rousseau or Montesquieu; he gathers up much of the thought of the past, he anticipates much of the thought of the future, but he is not a leader or director of the thought of his own times."

True enough, but is it for this that Mrs. Browning calls him

"chief poet of the Tiber side, by grace of God," for this that Niebuhr ranked him higher than Virgil, for this that Goethe expresses for him an almost unbounded admiration? It is to be feared that Mr. Simcox's two-and-twenty pages will leave a reader who comes fresh to the subject utterly unable to imagine any reason why Lucretius is accounted a poet at all, except that he had a certain power and flow of versification. Catullus comes off no better; there are some remarks, just enough in themselves, on some of his weaker points, but what we complain of is that no one would imagine after reading Mr. Simcox's criticisms that the poet so dealt with was simply the most tender and passionate master of song between Sappho and Burns or Béranger. The inadequacy of the treatment here given to these two poets will seem all the more painful to any reader who has in his memory Professor Sellar's sober but still most sympathetic studies. Virgil and Horace receive, the former perhaps a little less, the latter a little more than justice; but Mr. Simcox seems nowhere quite so much at home as among the poets of the Silver Age. It is not unnatural to suppose that his own style, often epigrammatic, and invariably thoughtful, but not always either easy or clear, has been tinged by his study of writers who, whatever their faults, are always pointed and ingenious. There is a completeness of appreciation, not only of Martial and Juvenal, but also of Petronius and of both the Plinies, which seems to be wanting in the case of some earlier and greater writers. His treatment of Statius necessarily suffers by the inevitable comparison with Professor Church's admirable essay. But it is impossible within the limits of a brief notice to criticise the criticisms passed, with more or less of detail, on some scores of writers. Let it be said, in conclusion, that Mr. Simcox's two volumes contain a history of the best thought of men, as expressed, for little short of a thousand years, in the Latin language, such as has not hitherto been accessible to the English reader. The form in which that thought has been expressed has been sometimes insufficiently appreciated, or, at any rate, imperfectly interpreted to the reader. But the substance of it has been reproduced with a diligence, accuracy, and intelligence which call for warm recognition at the hands of all who know how to value honest work.

MR. GEORGE MACDONALD'S LATEST BOOKS.*

MR. GEORGE MACDONALD is as prolific and, within what is now a well-ascertained orbit, as versatile as ever. The first of these volumes is a collection of very miscellaneous papers, some critical, some didactic, and one or two of a kind to which it is difficult to give a name; while the second is one of those works of pure imagination, intended primarily for children, but not less interesting for adult readers, in which perhaps, more than in any other class of Mr. MacDonald's books, the bright, consummate flower of his peculiar genius blooms most fully and flawlessly. Like most writers who in their work accentuate rather than disguise a well-marked individuality, Mr. MacDonald has in his time encountered a good many hostile critics, and it seems rather a pity that he should to so great an extent have given the enemy occasion to blaspheme, by the singularly unhappy title which he has chosen for his volume of essays. The word "orts," though it appears with tolerable frequency in the English literature of about three centuries ago, has, save in certain districts, become entirely obsolete, so much so, that two writers whose names are known to all cultivated readers have expressed to the present reviewer their entire ignorance of its meaning. Such prominent use of a word of this character is always open to objection, on the ground of obscurity or affectation; but the objection may fairly be set aside, in cases where the word in question has special force or appropriateness. Here it has neither. By "orts," we understand not merely fragments, but worthless fragments,—indeed, it may be said that while the word sometimes loses its significance of fragmentariness, as in the cases where it is used for the lifeless remains of the dead, it never, so far as we know, loses its significance of worthlessness, and perhaps the substantive "refuse" may be considered its true modern synonym. Mr. MacDonald confesses that he himself has had a doubt of the appropriateness of the title, and it is unfortunate that this doubt did not arise until it had been printed through the volume.

This, however, is comparatively a trifle, and is of more importance to the author than to his readers, who do not care much what a book may be called, so long as it is worth perusal; and, provokingly unequal as Mr. MacDonald is, it would be impossible for him to produce a work of which this at least could not be said. The Orts which are gathered together between the boards of the volume are so varied in character that it is difficult to comment upon them in mass, for though they lie together, they do not amalgamate, and have no unity, apart from that which necessarily belongs to all the utterances of any single mind. We do not share the prevalent feeling against the republication of magazine articles in book form, for whatever is really worth reading once is worth reading twice; but we do think that in making such collections care should be taken that either in substance, in form, or in both, the collected papers should have something of a common character, and should not present the appearance of a mere olla podrida. This mistake has been made in the compilation of Orts, and to it must be attributed the necessarily desultory character of our remarks upon it.

The place of honour in the volume is given to two articles which have been reprinted, if we remember rightly, from the British Quarterly Review. One deals with "The Imagination, its Functions and its Culture;" and the other, entitled, "A Sketch of Individual Development," will be remembered by many readers as a remarkably interesting illustration of the manner in which the faculty described in the preceding paper may be utilised for the highest spiritual purposes. In Mr. MacDonald's analysis of the essential character of imagination there is both subtlety and solidity of treatment; and thoughtful young readers in particular can hardly fail to receive instruction of permanent value from the writer's exposition of the function of imagination in those regions where they have not been wont to suspect its presence. Still, as a whole, this essay travels over familiar and well-trodden paths of thought, and, though it contains passages written in its author's best and most characteristic manner, is, we think, less noteworthy than the study which follows it. "A Sketch of Individual Development" is full of fine suggestion and mental stimulus, and the only limitation of its practical worth—a limitation which was perhaps unavoidable, save by an alteration of the whole scheme of the paper—lies in the fact that the imaginary person whose mental and spiritual history is sketched with such masterly veracity of insight does not represent an ordinary, but an exceptionally fine type of human nature, resembling less the Smith or Jones of common life than such a character as Mr. MacDonald's own Robert Falconer. We mention this merely as a hypothetical objection, for possibly a sufficient answer to it might be found in the plea that only in the more complex and finely strung natures do the successive stages of typical human development present and differentiate themselves with sufficient distinctness for recognisable portraiture, and that in all regions of study we best understand the ordinary individual when we have previously familiarised ourselves with the ideal type. The early portion of the paper, which deals with the dawn and growth of consciousness, is specially beautiful, but indeed there is no part of this thoughtful paper that will not repay the study of those whose own "individual development" is sufficiently advanced to enable them to enter into it. Only at one point of Mr. MacDonald's imaginary biography do we find ourselves doubting the inevitableness of a recorded stage in his hero's spiritual progress. He writes:—

"And now, probably at school, or in the first months of his college life, a new phase of experience begins. He has wandered over the border of what is commonly called science, and the marvel of facts multitudinous, strung upon the golden threads of law, has laid hold upon him. His intellect is seized and possessed by a new spirit. For a time, knowledge is pride; the mere consciousness of knowing is the reward of its labour; the ever recurring, ever passing contact of mind with a new fact is a joy full of excitement, and promises an endless delight. But ever the thing that is known sinks into insignificance, save as a step of the endless stair on which he is climbing, whither he knows not; the unknown draws him, the new fact touches his mind, flames up in the contact, and drops dark, a mere fact, on the heap below. Even the grandeur of law as law, so far from adding fresh consciousness to his life, causes it no small suffering and loss. For at the entrance of Science, nobly and gracefully as she bears herself, young Poetry shrinks back, startled, dismayed. Poetry is true as Science, and Science holy as Poetry; but young Poetry is timid, and Science is fearless, and bears with her a colder atmosphere than the other has yet learned to brave. It is not that Madam Science shows any antagonism to Lady Poetry; but the atmosphere and plane on which alone they can meet and understand one another is the mind and heart of the sage, not of the boy."

large a generalisation. We feel inclined to ask, "What boy?" and to answer, "Certainly not the boy of the quick, imaginative sensibilities which in preceding pages Mr. MacDonald has described as the inheritance of his hero?" As a matter of fact, the question whether in such or such a person Science shall or shall not expel Poetry does not seem susceptible of being answered by a mere enumeration of years, but depends upon the existence or non-existence of qualities which may be very early developed, or may remain undeveloped to the close of life. Just as physical cold may be long resisted by the man who has made himself thoroughly warm before exposing himself to the sharp frost or the piercing wind, so the chilling influences of the mere dead facts or mechanical laws of science may be successfully repelled even by a boy who is protected by the warmth of imaginative apprehension; and, to carry the figure still further, we might even say that just as there is no more grateful glow of animal heat than that caused by long conflict with a cutting north-easter, so there is nothing more vivifying to an imagination that is really alive than a turn out of doors into the dry, keen, bracing air of science. This, indeed, is the recorded experience of many, and to mention only one name by way of example, it is clear from the recently published record of the early years of Sir William Rowan Hamilton that he, as a youth, found even in what will seem to most people the arid desert of pure and applied mathematics both nutriment and stimulus for his imaginative nature.

The elaborate study upon which we have only been able to make one brief comment is followed by three very interesting essays on Shakespearian topics, which must perforce be treated with similar brevity. The first, "St. George's Day, 1564," is devoted to an exposition of the character and mind of Shakespeare, as made manifest in his life and works; the scope of the second is made sufficiently apparent by its title, "The Art of Shakespeare, as Revealed by Himself;" and the third, "The Elder Hamlet," is a reconstruction of the murdered king, in his habit as he lived, from suggestions found in the utterances of his disembodied spirit. Much in these papers will be familiar to hearers of Mr. MacDonald's spoken lectures, but much more is, we think, entirely new; and in the new portion, as well as in the old, will be found a large mass of acute and illuminating criticism and comment, with here and there a passage which we cannot but think strained and fanciful. When, for example, there are so many obvious and unmistakeable proofs of Shakespeare's familiarity with the Bible, what could possibly seem more far-fetched than the following?—

"Macbeth on his way to murder Duncan says,—

'Thou sure and firm-set earth,
Hear not my steps, which way they walk, for fear
Thy very stones prate of my whereabouts,
And take the present horror from the time
Which now suits with it.'

What is meant by the last two lines? It seems to us to be just another form of the words, 'For there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; neither hid, that shall not be known. Therefore whatsoever ye have spoken in the darkness shall be heard in the light; and that which ye have spoken in the ear in closets shall be proclaimed upon the house-tops.'

It may seem rather unfair to quote only passages to which we take exception; but they seem to stand out more prominently, in virtue of their very infrequency, and were we to discourse upon the many things in these papers which strike us as specially true or beautiful, we should be puzzled where to begin and where to stop. Of the remaining essays in the volume, some are mere specimens of magazine padding,—good of its kind, but still padding, and hardly deserving preservation. From this criticism we must, however, except a reported lecture on "Wordsworth's Poetry," which concerns itself mainly with Wordsworth's treatment of Nature—or perhaps it would be more correct to say, with Nature's treatment of him—and an admirable exposition of the spiritual significance of Mr. Browning's Christmas Eve, which is interesting, not merely as an interpretation of one poem, but as an aid to a comprehension of the poet's general method. Of the two noble discourses which find a place at the end of the volume, we need say no more than that they are worthy of the author of that collection of Unspoken Sermons which has been to many readers one of the most inspiring of books.

Of The Princess and Curdie we have left ourselves little space in which to speak; but, happily, Mr. MacDonald's genius as an imaginative tale-teller for children has been so widely recognised, that it is unnecessary to do more than to announce the appearance of a new fairy-story from his pen.

Curdie is not unknown to the author's juvenile friends; he is already one of their heroes, and this story is the record of how he encountered enemies almost more dangerous than his old foes, the goblins. The incident of the pigeon which has been wounded by Curdie's arrow, and which serves to restore him to his better self, is beautifully told; and all Curdie's interviews with the wonderful great-grandmother of the princess, who constitutes herself his "guide, philosopher, and friend," are not only charming, but full of subtly-conveyed spiritual teaching. In place of comment, which would at the best be ineffective and expatiatory, we extract one of the few quotable passages in the story. It comes just at the beginning, and is a description of mountains that any imaginative boy or girl will, or at any rate ought to, enjoy with a great enjoyment:—

"I will try to tell you what they are. They are portions of the heart of the earth that have escaped from the dungeon down below, and rushed up and out. For the heart of the earth is a great, wallowing mass, not of blood, as in the hearts of men and animals, but of glowing-hot, melted metals and stones. As our hearts keep us alive, so that great lump of heat keeps the earth alive; it is a huge power of buried sunlight, that is what it is. Now, think, out of that cauldron, where all the bubbles would be as big as the Alps if it could get room for its boiling, certain bubbles have bubbled out and escaped,—up and away, and there they stand in the cool, cold sky, mountains. Think of the change, and you will no more wonder that there should be something awful about the very look of a mountain; from the darkness—for where the light has nothing to shine upon it is much the same as darkness—from the heat, from the endless tumult of boiling unrest, up, with a sudden, heavenward shoot, into the wind, and the cold, and the star-shine, and a cloak of snow that lies like ermine above the blue-green mail of the glaciers; and the great sun, their grandfather, up there in the sky; and their little cold aunt, the moon, that comes wandering about the house at night; and everlasting stillness, except for the wind that turns the rocks and caverns into a roaring organ for the young archangels that are studying how to let out the pent-up praises of their hearts, and the molten music of the streams, rushing ever from the bosom of the glaciers fresh-born."

FLETCHER OF MADELEY.*

THIS latest and largest memoir of the saintly Fletcher of Madeley is a very poor book on a very interesting subject. Considered as a contribution to biographical literature, it is so complete a failure, that were it not for the charm of Fletcher's own character—a charm which, though minimised, cannot be destroyed even by Mr. Tyerman's treatment—we should be content to confine our notice to a brief expression of disappointment; but it is clearly impossible to treat in so cursory a manner the most inadequate portrait of so noteworthy a figure. Some partial explanation of Mr. Tyerman's want of success may perhaps be gathered from a rather curious sentence in his preface, in which he says, "I have no artistic talent; and if I had, I should not employ it in writing biographies." These words are somewhat enigmatical, but it seems clear that Mr. Tyerman is speaking contemptuously either of "artistic talent" or of "biographies," possibly of both; and whichever of these hypothetical explanations be correct, it is needless to point out that the writer of such a sentence was hardly the man to undertake the task of preparing such a volume as this. Were it not for some sentences here and there which forbid the supposition, we should be compelled to regard Mr. Tyerman as blind to the one thing in Fletcher which made his life worth writing at all. The world, or rather that portion of the world which is in any way interested in the subject of this memoir, is interested in Fletcher as a beautiful type of saintliness, not as an Arminian controversialist; and yet, of the twenty-six chapters in Mr. Tyerman's volume, no fewer than ten are devoted to a record and exposition of Fletcher's voluminous and now utterly uninteresting contributions to the fierce discussion which raged so long between the followers of Wesley and the little group of Calvinists who gathered round that devout but self-willed woman, Selina, Countess of Huntingdon. In justice to Mr. Tyerman, we give his apology for, or rather his vindication of, this very wearisome portion of his work. He writes:—

"The chapters respecting the Calvinian controversy may, to some readers, be somewhat dry; but they could not be omitted, because that controversy was the great event in Fletcher's life, and hastened his death. Besides, it was by his publications on this subject that he rendered service to Wesley and the Methodist Movement which neither Wesley himself nor any other of Wesley's friends could have furnished. I have refrained from discussing the truths which Fletcher's pen defended; but I have said enough to indicate what the doctrines were which created Methodism, and which alone can perpetuate its spiritual life and power."
